Why not? What is the object of the creation of Government? What is it for? For what is it that I along with the rest of us agreed to establish a central Government, to pay taxes, and to clothe men with authority over us? It is that they may stand sentinel over our rights; that there is a fixed, permanent organization to which the citizens are pledged and agreed; and that the moment any other and adverse organization, no matter where it comes from, no matter by whom originated, makes its appearance, the Government which we have instituted for our protection, knowing that we as single men cannot contend against organizations, is bound to put it down and to protect us. But who ever heard of a man who was compelled to obey a usurping organization, compelled because that organization might have hanged him had he resisted its decree, being subjected to punishment for that enforced obedience when the legitimate power came into possession of the scepter? To assert such a thing in a court of justice is to assert an absurdity and to make a man ridiculous, not only in the eye of the law, but in the eye of the jury.

Then, in answer to the question who committed treason in the late war, I say they committed treason who, when they were not commanded by a State and when they were in a position where a State could not compel them to obey, made war upon the United States at a time when the United States could afford them protection. They were the persons who committed treason, and not those who acted in other circumstances; that is according to my theory, according to the northern theory, according to the Websterian theory as against the Calhoun theory, according to the theory of the sovereignty of the Union, not according to the State sovereignty theory. If you adopt the State sovereignty theory, as I think my Radical friends have adopted it everywhere, then no inhabitant of a State can commit treason after the State herself determines to dissolve the connection between herself and the General Government.

I have contended on this floor uniformly that the tie of allegiance was direct between the General Government and the citizen, and that while the citizen owed allegiance to the General Government the General Government owed him protection; that if the citizen was charged with a crime he was entitled to protection. What is that protection? The protection of the citizen is that when he is charged with a crime he has a right to be tried by due process of law. I have been taught from infancy—I never heard it disputed—that in that consisted American liberty. What is it that makes Great Britain to-day proud, resplendent, and free above all the nations of the earth? It is the same thing which gave to the Roman citizen in the time of Paul the right of what?—protection in return for his allegiance. Who dares scourge an Englishman? Who dares or ought to dare to-day touch an American citizen except in pursuance of the judgment of the law? I say to Senators that whenever they admit away and give up this great fundamental principle of their Government, they are recreant to their country; recreant to the sires that gave them being, recreant to their history, recreant to their traditions, and recreant to everything that ought to ennoble and give us a place among the nations.

Then, I say that wherever direct allegiance is owing, the person owing it is directly responsible. If the allegiance between citizens of the rebellious States and this General Government was direct and immediate, you have no right, you can have no right, to impose any penalties upon them except in pursuance of law; and all your talk about States committing suicide or forfeiting their rights is Calhounism, is nullificationism, is secessionism, is State sovereignty in its very worst ismistic form. It cannot be. If I owe direct allegiance to a Government and I am charged with a crime, the very first question is am I guilty; and whether I am guilty or not, if I owe allegiance to the Government, the Government is bound to protect me in the trial of that issue. Now, I ask my honorable friend from Wisconsin whether that is not good law; whether that is not part of the protection which is the reciprocal quid pro quo for the allegiance? Have I not a right to come up to my Government face to face and say, "You allege that I have committed a crime; now I demand of you if I owe you allegiance that you shall give me protection." What protection? Protection until the issue of fact is tried. If it is not that, what is it? If it does not mean that, what does it mean? If it does not mean that, where is liberty, where is security? If any Senator on this floor is charged with an offense by the United States Government, has he not a right because of his allegiance to say to that Government, "I cannot be put upon trial until I am first indicted by a grand jury, and no penalty can be imposed upon me until a petit jury under the instruction of a judge learned in the law finds me guilty; and even then no penalty can be imposed beyond that which you yourself affixed to this offense before the offense was committed."

Mr. HOWE. The Senator addressed a question to me just now which I should answer if I felt at liberty to engage in the debate with him, but I cannot consent to be catechized and then be stopped in the answer. If the Senator wants me to answer specific questions he must allow me to do so.

Mr. COWAN. Now, Mr. President, I will come to Nebraska. This Union is composed now, I believe, of thirty-six States according to one theory and twenty-six according to another. It is utterly and totally immaterial to me for the present argument which of these two hypotheses is adopted. The reasons which I shall offer I think are potent to show that the people of the Territory of Nebraska are not a State now and have no good reason to present why they should become a State, while there are a great many very good ones to show why they should not be so.

Mr. President, when the Union was first formed it was composed of great States and small States; but it being a matter of great importance that it should be formed, a matter of paramount importance, indeed, remarkable concessions were made to the small States, made to the State which you, sir, [Mr. ANTHONY in the chair,] so ably and honorably represent here, one of the smallest in the Union—made to the State which my honorable friend on the other side [Mr. SAULSBURY] so eloquently and forcibly represents here at times—great concessions made to Rhode Island and made to Delaware. Although small States, weighing nothing in the great scale compared with Pennsylvania, Virginia, New York, and others, yet it was conceded to them that upon this floor they should have an equal status with the greatest, or in other words, that they should have an equal representation in the Senate with the great States. That was a concession to procure the formation of the Union; but it imposed no obligation upon the States of the Union afterward to admit insignificant members upon the same terms. Nobody will pretend that if Nova Scotia, or a part of Nova Scotia, or a part of Canada fifty miles square with one hundred thousand inhabitants had come forward and proposed to ask admission into the Union the States would have been bound to admit her. Because we made that concession to your State, Mr. President, because we gave it to other small States, it is by no means a sequitur that we shall give it to every insignificant fraction of people who come here in these troubled times to seek for power so momentous as this is.

Then I say we are perfectly free; we are not bound by precedent; we are not bound by any obligation to admit the people of Nebraska to the privileges of a State at this time. It is wholly a question of policy, and another question to which I call the attention of some of my Radical friends, a question of fairness. I believe that they plant themselves now entirely and totally upon the ground of fairness. The Constitution is to be overridden where it is in the way, laws are to be set aside, everything is to be made to yield to the question of fairness. Well, I propose, first, to look at it upon the question of fairness.

What is there fair in it? Is it fair that eighty-eight thousand people—and for the sake of making it better and so that I may not misrepresent my honorable friend from Ohio, I will say one hundred thousand all the way through—is it fair that one hundred thousand people should have the same right upon the floor of this Senate that three million people have or that four million people have? I ask is it right? Can any man say that that is fair? It is so far from fair that it is absolutely preposterous; it is presuming.

And, Mr. President, let me say to you another thing. The questions which interest and which agitate the great States are not felt in the smaller and particularly in the far western States. It is utterly and totally immaterial to Nebraska how she may vote on some great questions involving the very safety of the Union; whereas it is matter of most momentous issue to Pennsylvania, to Maryland, to Virginia. Take if you please the question of negro suffrage, which now agitates the country from one end to the other; what do the people of Nebraska care about negro suffrage in their Territory? Is that the Territory where there was only one negro to agitate this matter, and since that he has died? I do not know whether that is the Territory or not, but we have heard of such a Territory about which there was a great ado that the negro ought to vote, and it turned out that there was only one negro in it; and before the question was decided here in the Senate he had died, and that settled it. [Laughter.] I say what possible degree of interest could the people of Nebraska take in the question whether negroes voted or not? Even in Boston they had not enough the other day, when they turned over with the Democrats, to give them a majority as I understand. Even in Boston, where the negro is such a favorite that he is taken and cooked and caudled, and tried to be whitewashed and made into somebody, and where he is elected to the Legislature and all that—even in that attractive spot where one would suppose every hungry, thirsty Ethiopian, who was "stretching out his hands to God," would go—even there they have not enough to give the Democrats a majority when they vote with them.

But Nebraska! Why, Mr. President, the question whether the negro should vote in Nebraska is of no moment whatever. I question whether there are a dozen men in the Territory that would snap their fingers for the difference whether they did or did not vote, because whether they did or no the effect produced would be inappreciable. But when the question comes to the District of Columbia, when it comes to the State of Maryland, when it comes to the State of Virginia and the southern States, then it does become a question, and one of great import—a very different question from that which it is supposed to be here. Gentlemen upon this floor voted the other day to give the negro suffrage in the District of Columbia because they said he was entitled to his share in the Government. It is not a share, it is a question whether he or the whites shall rule. It is not a question whether they shall rule jointly; it not a question whether one shall rule in part and the other in part; but it is a question which of the two races shall rule. Does any man believe that in this District or in any of the southern States, or where negroes are very abundant, where there is any chance of competing with the whites, but where if they had the majority they would rule; and does any man doubt but that where they have not the majority the whites will rule? To say otherwise is to ignore the whole history of affairs. Do you suppose that the negro would not deprive the white man of a vote in the District of Columbia if he had the chance? Why not? I only compliment his good sense when I ask why not? Certainly he should, because he knows, even the instincts of a semi-barbarian will teach him, that this is a question not of sharing dominion, but it is a question as to which shall have dominion.

Then I say as to the other States of this Union these are important questions, most important, vital, lying at the very base and foundation not only of their society, but of the organization of that society and the happiness of the people. Who shall decide them? People who are not interested or people who are; people who are in sympathy with those in contact with the evil or people who have never felt the evil and who know nothing of it, and who are moved merely by political theory and political hypothesis and party bias.

Wherever these questions arise it becomes of the utmost importance to the older States, and I say to New England look well to your borders; you may be cooking a kettle of fish that you will not be willing to eat yourselves, by creating corporations of this kind. How many of these people are there? A hundred thousand people I have agreed to set them down. Suppose there are a hundred thousand American citizens in Nebraska, you ask have they not a right to be represented. I say, certainly, under certain circumstances. But look to the State of New York which has four million people; two million of those people have no representatives on this floor. Your system does not provide for the representation of minorities. Who represents the minority of New England on this floor? Are the hundred thousand people in Nebraska to-day better than the one million of people in New England who are not represented here? Have they rights higher, holier, more sacred? And yet who represents those minorities? Who represents the minority in New York, I ask again? Who represents it in Rhode Island? Who represents it in New Jersey now? Who represents it in Ohio? Who represents it in Illinois? Who represents it in Missouri? You talk about representation and you talk about fairness; but if you come to count the millions that are unrepresented here, your claim for Nebraska will sink infinitesimally into the distance; it will be invisible; it will be what mathematicians call a vanishing point; you will see no more of it.

Now, I ask, when there are millions of people of intense beliefs, of the same rights in this country, upon whom the same burdens are imposed, who have to bear your arms in the field of battle, who have to pay your taxes, and who have to obey the laws you make, and who are yet totally unrepresented here, with what face can a man come on this floor and ask for power here to be given to eighty-eight or one hundred thousand people in Nebraska? That is not the worst of it. It is not a hundred thousand people in Nebraska, but it is fifty thousand plus one hundred out of that one hundred thousand. Pennsylvania as well as New England is very much interested upon the question of a protective tariff. I believe the State of Ohio wants a protective tariff. Now, what would you think, sir, if the whole system of protection and non-protection, of free-trade or the American system, were to be put into the balances and the protective system should kick the beam because the Senators from Nebraska were thrown in? What would you think of it when you came to ask why they did it? Perhaps they would say, "We do not know; we cannot give any particular reason except that we have a great Territory there and not very many roads; we want to build railroads and get iron as cheap as possible and therefore we go for free trade."

What would Pennsylvania say to that? What would Ohio say to that? What would all the protective States say to that? And yet that may be. It is very well known here that many gentlemen from the western States—I do not quarrel with them, I do not think hard of them—are free-traders. They are opposed to protection because they conceive it to be a hardship upon them as they are agricultural States, and they will resist it. Will Nebraska be with them, or will it be with the Atlantic States? I might apply to my honorable friend from Rhode Island, not in the chair, [Mr. SPRAGUE,] who talks "tariff" very often, whether he had not better have an eye to this and see about it. It is not a question of to-day. My honorable friend from Ohio says that the men who come here to represent Nebraska to-day are clever fellows. I have no doubt of that; and there are clever fellows enough in the country to make up a thousand such Senates as this if that were a qualification. I can find clever fellows everywhere. I have no doubt these are clever gentlemen. And he says some of them have fought for the country during the war. There is nobody willing to pay to them a higher compliment than I would be for that. But what has all that to do with the question? Just nothing at all. The question is whether there is any fairness in this demand, in the first place, and in the second place whether there is any danger in it to the older States; whether there is any danger in it to large unrepresented minorities in the country; whether there is any danger in it to great interests in the country of whom these Representatives may not have charge.

I was exceedingly anxious to hear my honorable friend from Ohio tell us why it was that the people of this Territory should be constituted into a State, what was the necessity for it, what grievance they labored under. Have they no executive? Have they no Legislature? Have they not a Legislature of their own election? Have they no courts? Have they complained that the laws are not equal, that they are not just? Have they complained that the laws are not administered, or not administered properly? Not at all. There has not been a word uttered here, not a word from the beginning to the end of this debate, which bore upon the question as to whether a State government was necessary there or not. Nobody has pretended that the people in the Territory of Nebraska are not living as happily, and in the enjoyment of their rights, with the laws administered just as well as they are in any State in the Union. Nobody has said so. But the honorable Senator from Ohio, fair, just man, always desirous to have something at least plausible to throw into the scale in order to show the necessity for a State government there, has given us what he calls a reason. Now I beg Senators to listen. What is the reason that there must be a State government in Nebraska, and why can they not get along just as well under a territorial government as heretofore, particularly in this disturbed state of the country when balances of power are beginning to be of the utmost importance everywhere, and since it is avowed almost on this floor that these men are to be admitted here in order to strengthen still more the great excess of power now in the hands of the dominant party? My honorable friend says at the outstart of his speech:

And it is the only reason he gives; whether there are any others I do not know—

"Now, Mr. President, one reason why the Territory of Nebraska should be very soon admitted as a State is that the land there is being taken up by your college scrip, by your railroad grants, &c. In various ways the land is being all absorbed, so that if we leave it a little while longer exposed in this way, we shall not have the power to give to the State for school purposes and for various other purposes those grants which we have uniformly made to new States on their admission into the Union."

That is the reason why the Congress of the United States should create this corporation equal in power here on the floor of the Senate to New York, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Illinois, at the beck and bidding of fifty thousand people plus one hundred out of one hundred thousand. Had the honorable Senator no better reason? Is that the reason why Nebraska should be a State? Is that the pressing necessity which induces the people to divide the crown and scepter with this handful of men? I am not the chairman of the Committee on Territories nor the chairman of any other committee; but I think that if I was I could have devised a mode by which the people of Nebraska could have been well protected against this impending evil. Was it out of the reach of my honorable friend's legal acumen and stretch and sagacity to give them a remedy? I should think not. I believe he was a Republican as I was, and we held that Congress had supreme authority over the Territories to fix their status while they were Territories. That was our doctrine. I think we could have saved their lands, we could have protected their people so far as the interest of the school and the church, or any other that we chose to subserve might be involved; we could have saved all that without this extraordinary stretch of power on our part.

Mr. President, I do not know that anything I can say is to have any weight here upon the determination of this question; but I have felt it my duty to my own State and to the unrepresented minorities of other States to invoke on the part of the Senate a calm, careful examination of questions of this character. If it became necessary to insure the liberty, the freedom of the people, and the proper administration of the law in Nebraska that these one hundred thousand people should be endowed with the corporate powers of a State, I should not object to trying it; but, Mr. President, there is another thing to be considered, and it is a thing upon which we cannot turn our backs here. Why is it that the people of Nebraska want a State? Does any sane man suppose that it is because they cannot get school lands and college lands, and that somebody will appropriate them with scrip here and scrip there? Not at all. We know that in all these Territories there are politicians, and we know that these politicians are exceedingly anxious to have a State. Why? Because, in that triumphal and sovereign car of the State ride Senators and members of Congress, ride power and dominion; rides, in other words, a State; rides New York, rides Pennsylvania, rides Ohio, and as well ride Nebraska and Colorado. Think of it! These are high stakes to be played for, and here is the sweat-cloth in which they are won, in this Senate.

Now, Mr. President, so far as compliment is concerned, so far as gratifying a laudable ambition is concerned, so far as doing anything to accommodate a clever fellow is concerned, I think I have always been willing and am willing now to go as far as anybody else; but

I ask the Senate not to admit Nebraska upon this showing, not to think of it, not to think of the eloquent blandishments with which those who come here to electioneer for her admission assail you, but to think of the duty we owe to the Union and the rest of the States, to our own States, and to ourselves.

Mr. President, in some of its aspects I cannot conceive how anybody in the present circumstances of the nation, in the situation in which we find ourselves, can with any kind of face come here and ask us to bestow this boon upon that little knot of people who reside in Nebraska for no reason in the world, no reason pertinent to their welfare, no reason pertinent to the existence of the Union, but every reason calling us to act the other way. It has not the poor apology of being needed to give the dominant party a preponderating majority in this body; it is not needed in the other body. I could understand why partisans, why ambitious politicians should desire to possess a two-thirds majority here which would override a President's veto. I can understand why people would want to have that; but why want more than that at such a cost and at such hazard to such important interests I cannot conceive. If my Radical friends had not that two thirds already well assured, three to one, indeed, then I could understand why they should desire to add a compeer or two in order to aid them to supplement their weakness. But what is it for here? Surely they cannot be moved by considerations of that kind.

Mr. President, I do not know whether it is in order to amend the amendment of the honorable Senator from Missouri, but I believe it is.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair.) It is in order.

Mr. COWAN. Then I propose to amend it; and I propose to amend it in a point vital as we have supposed—I do not know whether it is or not—to this Union; vital to its very existence. I propose to settle the question of the right to secede on the part of a State. Admit Nebraska to-morrow on the bill as it stands and you leave the question open. If you are to stipulate at all with her, now is the time to stipulate. Therefore, Mr. President, I shall move the following amendment to be added to the amendment of the Senator from Missouri:

Provided, and it is hereby distinctly understood, That the people of the Territory of Nebraska when admitted as a State into the Union shall owe direct and personal allegiance, each one of them, to the Government of the United States; and that the said State of Nebraska shall not hereafter claim to have power or authority to convert the citizens of said State into foreigners or alien enemies, so that they may as a consequence of crime be held and considered as such.

We have heard a great deal about settling the question of secession and the right to secede and all that kind of thing. If this is made a condition on the admission of Nebraska, and it is expressly understood and provided so here, then there is an end of it; then on no pretext whatever can this State hereafter set up any claim or right to secede or right to control her citizens outside of the Union or to relieve them from their allegiance to the Union. I therefore offer the amendment.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. President, I do not propose to discuss the constitutional amendment which has been submitted by Congress to the several States; nor do I propose to discuss at the present time the policy of the Government toward the States of the South. My purpose is in a very few words to give my opinions upon the precise questions which are pending before the Senate.

The Senator from Missouri proposes as an amendment to the bill for the admission of Nebraska, a fundamental condition to be accepted by the people of Nebraska which shall forever prevent the State of Nebraska from disfranchising any person on account of color, and shall secure that all shall be permitted to exercise the elective franchise. And he cites as a precedent the case of Missouri. Now, Mr. President, in my judgment, and with all due respect to my honorable friend, that case is no precedent at all, and for this simple reason: the constitution of Missouri when it asked admission contained a clause directly in hostility to the Constitution of the United States, and therefore the Congress of the United States insisted that that clause in the constitution of the State of Missouri which was in hostility to the Constitution of the United States should be forever declared null and void and the State should never undertake to enforce it. But, sir, what he now proposes to attach to the bill for the admission of Nebraska is a very different thing! He does not propose to strike from the constitution of Nebraska a section which is in hostility to the Constitution of the United States. It is a section which the Constitution of the United States expressly permits. That is the difference. What Congress forbade to Missouri was something in violation of the Constitution of the United States. What he seeks to forbid to Nebraska is that which the Constitution of the United States expressly permits, because the Constitution of the United States as it is certainly allows the several States to define the qualification of electors, and all of the States in the exercise of that power have imposed qualifications, sometimes of property and sometimes of race and color.

And, Mr. President, not only is the proposition of my friend from Missouri to attach a fundamental condition which is in hostility to the Constitution of the United States as it is, but is in hostility, also, to the Constitution of the United States as it is proposed to be amended by the very amendment which is now pending before the Legislatures of the several States. This constitutional amendment, which was submitted by Congress last summer, in the second section in express words implies this power in the several States, because the second section expressly says:

"When the right to vote at any election for the choice of electors for President and Vice President of the United States, Representatives in Congress, the executive and judicial officers of a State, or the members of the Legislature thereof, is denied to any of the male inhabitants of such State being twenty-one years of age and a citizen of the United States, or in any way abridged except for participation in rebellion or other crime"—then the basis of representation shall be changed. That second-section of the constitutional amendment, which was submitted by Congress last summer, which is now pending before the States, and which, for aught we now know, may be adopted by a sufficient number of States to make it a part of the Constitution of the United States, gives to each State the very power which this amendment to this bill denies. Can we do it? Can we do it under the Constitution as it is? When the Constitution as it is gives to each State the power to define the qualification of its electors can we, the Congress of the United States, set up some fundamental article which shall override the Constitution? Can we enter into a compact with one of the States which will deny to the State a power which the Constitution gives to the State? Is Congress above the Constitution, or is the Constitution above Congress? Such a provision, in my judgment, will be perfectly null and void.

Besides, I have one further objection to my honorable friend's amendment, and it has nothing to do with the negro question at all. There are hardly enough negroes in Nebraska to count. There are probably more than there were in Montana when we had that question up. There was but one negro in that Territory and he had died really before the question was raised in the Senate. The objection which I am about to present may grow out of the fact that I have been connected more or less with Indian affairs, and hence it is that I think of the Indian sometimes when he seems to be entirely forgotten by all the other members of this body. This proposition of my honorable friend would confer the right of suffrage on every Indian in Nebraska. There are Omahas and Otoes and Sioux and Cheyennes and Arapahoes in Nebraska, and in an excited election had in this new State the Indian agent or somebody else might bring up the whole

Indian tribes of that Territory under this amendment and vote them all at an election. That is a question that does not concern the negro, and upon which we are not yet so much and so deeply interested but that we can actually see what the result would be. Now, look at the proposition: he imposes as a fundamental article of the constitution of Nebraska forever that they shall admit every Indian in that Territory to the exercise of the right of franchise, for it covers the Indian just as much as it does the negro; it covers all persons; it forbids the denial of the right of suffrage to any person on account of race or color.

Mr. President, that is all I desire to say as to the present pending amendment of the Senator from Missouri. I desire to say a single word in relation to the bill itself. I gave notice of an intention to introduce an amendment which has no effect upon the constitution, but is to have effect simply upon the question of the admission of the State into the Union, to wit, that the constitution shall first be submitted to the people of the Territory of Nebraska, and if they vote in favor of its admission and in favor of the constitution, then, without any further proceeding on the part of Congress, by proclamation of the President, they may be declared admitted into the Union as one of the States. A similar provision was adopted in the case of Wisconsin. In one of the acts passed by Congress for the admission of Wisconsin it was provided that the constitution should be submitted to the people, and if ratified by them, then, upon the proclamation of the President, the State should be admitted without further action by Congress.

My difficulty in relation to Nebraska is twofold. I certainly desire as a representative of one of the new States to welcome into this Union all the new States, and indeed I am willing to welcome the old States into the Union also, North or South, whenever they are properly prepared to enter. My difficulty with Nebraska is twofold; first, we have no legal evidence before us that the people of Nebraska desire admission; and secondly, we have no such evidence before us as to satisfy us that Nebraska has yet a sufficient population to entitle her to admission. What evidence have we that the people of Nebraska desire admission? It is true that Congress in 1864 passed an enabling act authorizing the people of that Territory to elect delegates to form a constitution, to submit it to the people, and if adopted by the people they were to be admitted into the Union as one of the States. But, sir, instead of their forming a constitution under this provision of the act of Congress, they held an election and chose a convention, and the convention adopted no constitution and submitted no constitution to the people at all, because it was found when the convention was chosen and the delegates came together that a majority of the delegates were elected opposed to any constitution at all, and therefore they did not act. Certainly they refused to submit any constitution to the people; the convention did not form any constitution.

Mr. WADE. The first meeting did not form a constitution; but that was not the reason, as I understood.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I understood that to be the reason; at all events they did not form a constitution; they did not submit one to the people; and therefore the people did not vote under the law of Congress in favor of a State constitution. I understood that the reason why the convention did not form a constitution was that when they were elected a majority were elected against any constitution. Why did they not form a constitution if they were elected to form one and were in favor of it? What was to hinder? They did not form a constitution because they did not desire to do so, because the men who elected them did not desire that they should do so, and therefore the whole thing failed and the enabling act of Congress expired.

My friend from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN,] in his argument the other day, said they proceeded under the act of Congress. Not at all. They proceeded under the act of Congress in choosing a convention; there they stopped. The convention submitted no constitution; the people voted on no constitution under the act of Congress; but subsequently the Legislature of the Territory, having no authority from Congress to do so, formed a constitution and submitted it to the people, and it is said that a majority of the people voted in favor of that constitution. How do we know that? How do we know that there is a majority of the people? It is true they went through the form of an election, but that election had no legal validity. No man voting at that election could have been punished either for bribery or fraud or stuffing the ballot-box with illegal votes. If in any election district a single person had put in a hundred votes he could not have been punished. Why? Because it was all without legal authority; it had no more legal and binding force than a caucus that is called in the Territory for the purpose of nominating men to office. There was no legal, valid, binding obligation upon the people in the election, and no man for swearing in his vote, whether entitled to vote or not, could be made guilty of perjury. There is no lawyer anywhere who will stand up and say that a man could be convicted of any crime committed at that election. Therefore when they come here with a statement that upon an election thus held, entirely without the authority of law, there was a bare majority of one hundred votes, I say that I have no sufficient evidence to satisfy me that a majority of that people desired to adopt a constitution or to be admitted as a State into the Union.

In addition to this, and what has thrown in my judgment some still further doubt upon this point, is the statements which were made at the last session of Congress by gentlemen who said—and one of the officers was here to make the statement—that at Fort Kearney, in the Territory of Nebraska, there were two companies of troops belonging to the State of Iowa who voted at this very election thus informally submitted to the people of Nebraska. You could not punish the troops for voting illegally. There was no sanction of law about it that could be enforced against them. These facts being stated, together with other things which have been generally charged, that at the election there were frauds committed, and where there was no law to punish them they have thrown over this question a doubt, and a serious doubt in my mind, whether we have any such kind of evidence as to satisfy us that the people of Nebraska desire admission into the Union, and to assume the burdens of a State government.

Mr. President, a word further in relation to the population of the Territory. I admit that some circumstances have occurred tending to increase the population since the last session of Congress. There has been in process of construction a railroad two or three hundred miles in this Territory of Nebraska. Undoubtedly that has carried a considerable population into the Territory of Nebraska; and doubtless there are ten or twelve or fifteen thousand inhabitants more in the Territory now than there were when this question was before us at the last session; but when it was before us at the last session, taking all the evidence we had upon the subject, we could not reasonably conclude that there were over forty-five thousand inhabitants in the Territory of Nebraska, judging from the number of votes which were given at the several elections; and if you take the number of votes which were given at this election, which I think was about ten thousand—

Mr. JOHNSON. Nine thousand.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Nine thousand. How much population does a vote of nine thousand show to exist in a State or Territory? If you go into the eastern States, where the voting population is not so large in proportion to the non-voting population as it is in the western States, I suppose it would be fair to say that there is about one voter in seven of the population. If you go to the States further west, the middle States, perhaps it would be just to say there was one in six, and if you go to the Territories, still further west, it would be just to say that there was one in five, perhaps one in four. How much population would you expect to find where there were nine thousand voters? In New England you would say you would find sixty-three thousand. In Ohio you would say fifty-four thousand. Go still further west, into Iowa, where the country is newer and less settled, where there would be about one voter in five of population, and you will say that there would be forty-five thousand. Go into the Territories still further west, where there are but few women and children, where the voting population is much larger in proportion to the whole number, and where it would probably be one in four, and you might reasonably say thirty-six thousand population in Nebraska.

I think upon the best evidence we have before us the population of Nebraska this day does not exceed fifty thousand, not counting the Indians. If you count the Indians you would add twenty thousand more.

These, Mr. President, are my reasons, very briefly given, without any reference whatever to the exciting questions which have been thrown into this debate, and having reference only to such questions as bear directly upon the pending question before the Senate, why I shall feel constrained to vote, first, against the amendment offered by my friend from Missouri, and then against the bill. At all events, I shall not give my consent to the passage of the bill unless it shall be provided that the constitution shall be submitted to the people of Nebraska that we may know that the people of Nebraska desire to assume the burdens of a State government and are in favor of the constitution.

Mr. HOWARD. I desire to say a few words on the bill now before the Senate.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I suppose it is apparent that this bill cannot be disposed of to-night; and as it is somewhat important to have an executive session, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. HOWARD. Yes, sir, for the purpose of allowing an executive session to be held.

Mr. WADE. I barely wish to give notice that to-morrow I shall feel it my duty to urge this matter to a final decision, if I can possibly. I shall insist upon a final vote on the bill then.

The motion of Mr. FESSENDEN was agreed to; and after some time spent in executive session, the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, December 18, 1886.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by Rev. A. WRIGHT, Chaplain at Fort Laramie. The Journal of yesterday was read.

CORRECTION OF THE JOURNAL.

Mr. BAKER. I rise to a privileged question. I desire to correct the Journal. The proceedings of yesterday, as just read by the Clerk, contain a palpable error. I am represented as making the motion to lay on the table the resolution offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ROSS] relative to the taxation of Government bonds. I made no such motion. I see that according to the report in the Globe the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. THAYER] made that motion.

Mr. THAYER. The Globe is correct; I made the motion.

The SPEAKER. The Journal will be corrected.

Mr. JULIAN. I desire also to make a correction of the Journal. I yesterday, after the passage of the joint resolution relative to agricultural college scrip, moved to reconsider and to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

That motion does not appear on the Journal as read.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is informed by the Clerk that the motion referred to is entered on the Journal although it was not read.

EVACUATION OF MEXICO.

Mr. ORTH, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested, if not incompatible with the public interest, to communicate to this House copies of all correspondence on the subject of the evacuation of Mexico by the French troops which has not heretofore been officially published.

The SPEAKER. This being a call for executive information, unanimous consent is necessary for its consideration on this day.

There being no objection, the resolution was considered and agreed to.

DESTRUCTION OF THE NEW IRONSIDES.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I ask unanimous consent to submit a resolution, to which I think there can be no objection, as it relates to a matter of great importance to the Navy. The resolution is as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Naval Affairs be, and they are hereby, instructed to inquire into and report to this House all the facts connected with the destruction by fire of the iron-clad war steamer New Ironsides, on the Delaware river, on the night of the 15th December instant, together with such recommendations by bill or otherwise as the facts shall in their judgment demand, with power to send for persons and papers and with leave to report at any time.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I am in favor of the adoption of this resolution; but I should like to hear from the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] a statement of the facts connected with the destruction of this magnificent iron-clad, one of the best we ever had in the Navy.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. Speaker, I shall make no statement at the present time. It is very evident to the House that this is a subject of importance to the Navy; a subject upon which the House and the country ought to be informed. I do not think that my friend from Illinois ought to ask me to make—it certainly would be indecorous for me to make—a statement upon ex parte testimony such as comes through the newspapers.

There being no objection, the resolution was considered and agreed to.

Mr. BRANDEGEE moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LOANS OF REPUBLIC OF MEXICO.

On motion of Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, by unanimous consent, the Committee on the Judiciary were discharged from the further consideration of the joint resolution (H. R. No. 168) for the protection of citizens of the United States in the matter of public loans of the republic of Mexico, and the same was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

JOHN P. GULICK.

On motion of Mr. STEVENS, by unanimous consent, the Committee on Appropriations was discharged from the further consideration of the petition of John P. Gulick for compensation for services rendered to the United States, and the same was referred to the Committee of Claims.

CALL OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. SPALDING. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER announced as the first business in order the call of committees, commencing with the Committee of Elections, for the presentation of reports.

RAILROAD FROM CALIFORNIA TO NEVADA.

Mr. PRICE, from the Committee on the Pacific Railroad, reported back, with a recommendation that it do not pass, a bill (S. No. 126) granting lands to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the city of Placerville, in the State of California, to the most feasible point of intersection with the Pacific railroad in the State of Nevada.

The bill was laid on the table.

Mr. WENTWORTH moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was laid on the table; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

OREGON RAILROAD.

Mr. PRICE, from the same committee, reported back House bill No. 439, granting lands to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from Puget sound or Admiralty inlet, in Washington Territory, to the Columbia river, with the recommendation that it do pass.

The bill provides that B. F. Dennison, F. W. Pettygrove, Arthur Phinney, Cyrus Walker, G. A. Meigs, William B. Sinclair, C. C. Phillips, H. L. Yesler, C. C. Terry, D. Horton, D. Bagley, Frank Clark, E. R. Rogers, J. B. Webber, Charles Prosch, William W. Miller, D. Phillips, E. Lander, J. Cushman, S. S. Ford, J. T. Browning, James Urquhart, A. R. Burbank, Joel Knight, S. W. Brown, H. L. Caples, C. Lancaster, C. C. Stiles, A. S. Abernethy, and all persons who shall or may be associated with them, and their successors, be created and erected into a body corporate and politic, in deed and in law, by the name, style, and title of the Washington and Oregon Railroad Company, and by that name shall have perpetual succession, and shall be able to sue and to be sued, plead and be impleaded, defend and be defended in all courts of law and equity in the United States, and may make and have a common seal; and the corporation is authorized and empowered to lay out, locate, construct, furnish, and maintain a railroad and telegraph upon the most eligible route from Puget sound or Admiralty inlet to a point on the Columbia river as near as practicable to and not more than one mile above Vancouver City, in Washington Territory, so as to form a continuous line of travel and communication with the railroad and telegraph authorized to be constructed by the California and Oregon and the Oregon and California Railroad Companies, between Puget sound or Admiralty inlet, in Washington Territory, and the Central Pacific railroad, in California, and upon the same terms, conditions, obligations, and restrictions, and with the same grants, privileges, rights, and benefits, in all respects whatever, as are conferred and imposed by this act upon the California and Oregon companies. The capital stock of the company shall consist of one hundred thousand shares of $100 each, transferable as provided by the by-laws of incorporation. The first meeting of the incorporators shall be held at Olympia, and be organized by choice of president, secretary, and treasurer, who shall give bond, within ten months after the passage of this act, and after two months' notice, to be given in a newspaper published in Olympia and one published in Vancouver City, and ten of the members shall constitute a quorum, and the meeting shall cause books to be opened at such times and in such places as they shall determine. And when one thousand shares shall have been subscribed and ten per cent. thereon paid into the treasury, the president and secretary shall appoint a time and place for meeting of the subscribers after thirty days' notice in the newspapers of the time and place of meeting, and such subscribers who shall attend the meeting, either in person or by proxy, shall then proceed to elect by ballot not less than ten directors from the company, who shall have power to elect a president, vice president, treasurer, and secretary. The board of directors shall take possession of all the property of the company. No person shall be a director who shall not be the bona fide owner of five shares of stock; the directors and officers shall hold their offices for three years. The secretary and treasurer shall give bonds; and the usual rules and regulations for the government of the company and transaction of its business shall be made by the by-laws.

Mr. PRICE. The committee have instructed me to offer certain amendments. In line twenty-two and twenty-three strike out the words "as near as practicable to and not more than one mile above Vancouver City."

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I appeal to my friend from Iowa to postpone the consideration of this and all kindred bills till after the holidays. I desire to submit some considerations to the House in regard to railroad grants showing the unheard-of and stupendous amount of public land we have already given away, and to urge the House to stop this thing if possible. I hope the gentleman from Iowa will not press this now upon the House, but will give us time for consideration. I would not ask for it if it would interfere with the gentleman getting up his bill; but as it will not, but will give further time for consideration, I hope the gentleman will not decline my suggestion.

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Speaker, I will give the reasons briefly why I think that ought not to apply to this bill. The House will remember at the last session of Congress a bill granting lands to the Oregon and California railroad was referred to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad, and after having been fully examined was reported to this House with the recommendation that it do pass; but the House thought proper to take it away from the Committee on the Pacific Railroad and refer it to the Committee on Public Lands. After being considered in the Committee on Public Lands it was again reported to the House favorably and the House passed the bill. Now, if gentlemen paid attention to the reading of this bill, they will see it is granting lands upon the same terms and conditions, with the same obligations and restrictions precisely as that which passed this House. This is a continuation of that road, a short piece of road to connect with Puget sound, for which the House made a grant of lands at the last session.

For these reasons it strikes me this bill should be acted upon now as well as at any subsequent period of this session, inasmuch as the parties interested in it are anxious it should be acted on, as it makes no new law, no new grant of land, being merely a continuation of what the House did at the last session at the recommendation of the Committee on Public Lands and the Committee on the Pacific Railroad. For these reasons, sir, I am opposed to the postponement. There is no good to be gained by it. It is so plain a case that I hope I shall be permitted to perfect the bill now. Gentlemen cannot tell what it is until then.

Mr. WARD. I desire to inquire of the gentleman from Iowa the amount of land it will take to answer the purposes of this bill.

Mr. PRICE. My recollection is twenty sections on each side of the road.

Mr. WARD. About how much does that make in all?

Mr. PRICE. I could answer it in a short time; it is a question of multiplication. I do not know the length of the road exactly, but I think it is about one hundred miles. Gentlemen will observe it may strike Admiralty inlet at two points.

Mr. WARD. Answer the question in general terms.

Mr. PRICE. The same amount of land per mile, with the same obligations and restrictions, as was recommended by the Committee on Public Lands and the Committee on the Pacific Railroad to the road of which this is a continuation.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. What was that amount of land?

Mr. PRICE. That would, I suggest, have been a more pertinent question at the last session when a bill was passed granting land for a railroad four hundred miles long than now, when a proposition is made for a road only one quarter of the length.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. The gentleman will bear me testimony I have resisted to the extent of my feeble ability all these squandering grants of land. I intend to resist this and every other grant; and if the gentleman will give me time and opportunity to make a statement to the House of the amount of grants which Congress has already made to railroads, if it does not astound the country and the world then I will not oppose the efforts of my friend in this matter. And further—

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Speaker, I want to perfect this bill if the gentleman will allow me. There are a few members in this House who take the floor whenever they please. [Laughter.]

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I will not take the floor from my friend unless he consents. [Laughter.]

Mr. PRICE. I do not think you will. [Laughter.]

Mr. BAKER. Will the gentleman not yield for a single question?

Mr. PRICE. I certainly will, but I prefer first to perfect the bill.

Mr. BAKER. The question I wish to ask is this: is the gentleman able to recur to a single precedent for the chartering by Congress of a railroad running through a State other than for military or postal purposes? I would like to have an answer to that question.

Mr. PRICE. I have already answered that by saying that this grant is upon the same terms and conditions precisely as those upon which this House gave lands for a road four times the length of this at the last session, and this is a continuation of the same road. If that is not a precedent then I do not understand what a precedent is. If gentlemen will only read the bill they will find that this contains precisely the same restrictions that were applied to the bill already passed at the last session.

I now propose further to amend the bill by inserting in line twenty-four, after the word "Territory," the words "and thence;" also in the same line after the word "of" by inserting "railroad;" also by striking out in lines twenty-four and twenty-five the words "travel and communication" and inserting the words "to and connecting with;" also in line twenty-six and twenty-seven by striking out the words "said;" also in line twenty-six, after the word "Oregon," to insert "railroad company;" also in line twenty-seven by making the word "companies" read "company;" also in line thirty-three to strike out the words "by this act."

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. HALE. I ask to have the bill reported as amended.

The amended portion of the bill was read, as follows:

And the said corporation is hereby authorized and empowered to lay out, locate, construct, furnish, and maintain a railroad and telegraph upon the most eligible route from Puget sound or Admiralty inlet to a point on the Columbia river, in Washington Territory, and thence so as to form a continuous line of railroad to and connecting with the railroad and telegraph authorized to be constructed by the California and Oregon Railroad Company and the Oregon and California Railroad Company between Puget sound or Admiralty inlet, in Washington Territory, and the Central Pacific railroad, in the State of California, and upon the same terms, conditions, obligations, and restrictions, and with the same grants, privileges, rights, and benefits, in all respects whatever, as are conferred and imposed upon the said California and Oregon companies.

Mr. PRICE. I have nothing further to say in reference to this bill, except to repeat what I have already stated before, that the bill proposes to grant land for the construction of a railroad which connects with a road which was authorized to be constructed in California. It proposes to grant lands under the same restrictions and conditions precisely that were applied to that company. It is nothing more nor less than a continuation of the Oregon and California railroad until it strikes Admiralty inlet. It is about one fourth the distance, if I am correctly informed, of the road that was authorized to be constructed and for which a grant of land was given at the last session. It contains the same grant of lands. If it was right to pass the bill at the last session after being considered very fully, then this bill cannot be wrong. If that bill was wrong, then this bill had better not pass. My opinion is that the aid given to this company for the construction of this railroad will be amply returned to the Government by the opening of the country and the facilities afforded to commerce and navigation.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Does the gentleman demand the previous question?

Mr. PRICE. I would like to have the bill acted upon.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. It must be acted upon before it gets out of the way.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa is still on the floor, and will state whether he surrenders it or makes any motion.

Mr. PRICE. I will yield the floor.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I now move to postpone the consideration of the bill until the second Tuesday in January for the reasons I have given, and other reasons which I am ready to give.

Mr. ECKLEY. Will my friend give way to me to make a motion to refer the bill to the Committee on Public Lands?

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I will do that.

Mr. ECKLEY. I will say to my friend from Iowa [Mr. PRICE] that so far as I am concerned I have never been, as a member of that committee, opposed to such bills as this.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. My main object is to get further information, further time in which to examine this bill. The House will recollect that at the last session we passed a resolution calling upon the Secretary of the Interior, or the Commissioner of the Land Office, for some information in regard to the amount of land we have already appropriated for railroad purposes. That information we have not yet received, at least I have not seen it if it is contained in any of the public documents. I think it is important that we should know exactly where we now stand before we go any further in this matter. I hope, therefore, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. PRICE] will consent either to my proposition, without any further debate, for a postponement until the second Tuesday in January, or that it should be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. PRICE. Well, if the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURNE] proposes to postpone it to a day certain—

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. That is what I propose; and I do not propose a postponement for the purpose of killing this bill by indirection or delay, but I desire some further time to examine into matters which I think the House should understand in regard to this and other railroad grants. I propose to postpone the bill till the second Tuesday in January next.

Mr. PRICE. And that it be made the special order for that day.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Very well; I will not object to that.

Mr. PRICE. And I hope the bill will be printed as it is an old bill and about out of print.

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. Speaker, I think it would be very proper for the House to hear a few words from the friends of this bill, from those immediately interested in it, before the question is taken upon its postponement. This action of postponement is equivalent in a great many instances to killing a bill off at once. We very well know what the result will be when business is crowding upon this House at the close of a short session; the railroad bills will be thrown out of consideration entirely, and this important and grand improvement be delayed and thrown back for years, if not defeated altogether.

It occurs to me, Mr. Speaker, that it comes with rather an ill grace from gentlemen living in old States which have already received thousands and millions of acres of the richest and most productive lands the sun ever shone upon for railroad purposes, which railroads they have now in successful operation, to object to our having a few thousand acres of mountain lands to assist in building this short railroad of one hundred and fifty miles to connect the waters of Puget sound with the Columbia river. Those of us who have traveled over that country and know the nature of that land are fully aware of the necessity of the improvement contemplated by this bill. And I will say to gentlemen upon this floor who are alarmed at the idea of the immense amount of land which is to be donated to this road that they need have no fear upon that score. The building of this road will assuredly make the remaining half of the land worth incomparably more than the whole of it is worth now. There is not a man in America acquainted with that country who will doubt the statement I have made—that the building of this road will increase the value of the alternate sections incomparably more than the whole of the land is now worth. A great amount of it is worth very little now; and a great deal of it will probably always be worth very little. But much of that land will be very much increased in value by the construction of that road. Without such a road that land will perhaps lie idle for six thousand more years; at least a great deal of it.

Now, let gentlemen remember that this road is to connect Puget sound, the grandest and most beautiful inland sea in America, the most extensive and commodious harbor upon the Pacific coast, with the Columbia river, the second largest river in our country. And it is to be a continuation of the road that connects the Columbia river with the bay of San Francisco; I might say that it is a continuation of a road connecting Puget sound with the bay of San Francisco. Let gentlemen consider the magnitude of such a measure.

Now, the only trouble that appears to exist in regard to this bill is that it calls for a grant of the public lands. Now, I ask of what value are these public lands without the means of transportation to and over them. I do hope that gentlemen living on the east side of the Rocky mountains, who now have their railroads, who have had their share of the public lands, will suffer those of us who live upon the west side to judge of these little matters pertaining to our particular interests. We have as much interest in the proper disposition of that land as my respected friend from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURN] can have. We do not want that land wasted or put out of the way of settlement and use; far from it. We are more anxious to have the public lands settled there than he can be, or than any other man who lives so far away can be.

Why gentlemen should endeavor to retard or embarrass great national improvements on the Pacific coast is a matter of profound astonishment to me; but gentlemen say they are not opposed to improvements, it is simply the manner in which we propose to accomplish them. They only wish to shape and fashion legislation on the various subjects in which we of that coast are interested. Now, Mr. Speaker, that certainly is very kind in them; but we are disposed to decline their courtesy on the ground that we feel ourselves abundantly capable of shaping these little matters for ourselves; and furthermore, we imagine that we are not only as capable of judging what ought to be done as those gentlemen who wish to do everything for us, but we think ourselves equally honest and patriotic, and really as much disposed to protect the public interest though we make much less noise about it.

Now, I hope this bill will be put upon its passage and passed at once, and grant this small favor to the country that needs it so much.

Mr. McRUER. Mr. Speaker, I have no particular objection to postponing the consideration of this bill, but I think that we might as well meet the issue at this time. There is a disposition—open and avowed—on the part of some members of this House to defeat every one of these grants to aid in the construction of railroads; and as an argument in behalf of this effort it is set forth that these grants of land are donations or gifts. Sir, I repudiate that whole idea. The fact is substantially this: a company come forward and propose to construct a railroad or canal, thereby doubling, trebling, or quadrupling the value of the public domain—for what? In consideration of the grant of a certain portion of that land. Of course they are acting in their own interest; but, sir, I contend that it is for the interest of the whole country that these important public works should be promoted by grants of land. Now, I ask gentlemen whether they propose to overturn the whole system which has prevailed in this country of granting the public lands? Sir, we not only make these grants to corporations, but it is the policy of this Government to give away its public lands to every person who will occupy and improve them.

Now, sir, in regard to the road which this bill proposes to aid, I will say that the road goes through a country that is not permeated by any rivers. Timber grows in that country only to decay; and this always will be the case until some artificial means shall be provided for bringing it to market and making it valuable. The grant of land, as proposed in this bill, will not subtract one dime from the wealth of the nation. This company do not propose to take this land out of the country. One would suppose, from the manner in which measures of this sort are denounced, that our public domain is to be diminished; that we are not going to have land enough left to raise whatever may be necessary to sustain life. Every one of these grants to railroads going through unpopulated country, through land which in its present condition is not worth a cent, does not impoverish, but must necessarily enrich the country. These grants stimulate industry; they invite population. If on the line of this road there is any land worth cultivation and fitted in its present condition to invite population such land has already been taken up and occupied, and none of such land can be granted. All the land that this company can obtain under this grant is land which never has been cultivated, and never will be until there shall be provided some means of transportation by which cultivators may carry their produce to a market.

Now, sir, we might as well meet here upon the threshold the question presented by this bill as to postpone it. I hope that this House in its good sense will see that this is no time to subvert the settled policy of this Government, which has been to grant lands to railroad corporations, thereby increasing fifty or one hundred per cent. or more the value of the land which the Government retains. I hope that this bill will receive the favorable consideration of the House at this time. Between Columbia river and Puget sound there is no navigable river to bear the products of that country to a market. That region bears a rich growth of timber which may be made valuable if any means be afforded for bringing it to a market. At the present time, as I have said, that timber grows only to decay.

There is no inducement to a State or a corporation to build at its own expense and without any consideration a railroad through the public domain to enrich the Government. The bargain proposed in this case is substantially similar to that in a case which I will suppose. You have a farm, unproductive and worthless, but which might be made productive if there were a stream of water flowing through it. I propose to carry through your land a rich stream of water, which shall irrigate and fructify it if you will give me a certain portion of the land; and by accepting my offer you double or perhaps quadruple the value of your possessions. That is substantially the case here. By making the proposed grant of land to this company the Government does not give away one dollar, but puts money into its Treasury and increases the wealth of the country.

Sir, I hope that the motion to postpone this bill will not prevail. The conditions attached to the bill are precisely similar to those attached to a grant which has already been made to a railroad from California to Oregon. This road is a continuation of that same route; and although I and my constituents are not directly interested in this measure still we on the Pacific coast are indirectly interested in every railroad grant that may serve to develop the public wealth.

Mr. BIDWELL. I think, Mr. Speaker, that opposition to this bill comes with very little grace from the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. WASHBURN.] His State is gridironed with railroads, many if not most of which have been constructed through Government aid by grants of land. And I am told that that State not only has the benefit of the development of her resources by the railroads constructed through the public lands, but that it also derives a revenue almost sufficient to sustain the State government by reserving a percentage on the sales of the lands granted by the Government for railroad purposes.

And now the gentleman from Illinois threatens to bring forward the sum total of the grants made for internal improvements in those States and to parade those enormous figures before the House in order to defeat a road as necessary as any road within the public domain of this country, and to lay it to the charge of the railroad which is now asked to be aided by the Government in the Territory of Washington.

I repeat, as it has been said here, we might as well meet the issue now. This country is vast; its resources are immeasurable; its development is in a state of progression, and unless the Representatives of the country can entertain a comprehensive view of the public interest and extend equal and impartial aid to all portions of it some parts must lack, suffer, even retrograde. It is absolutely necessary in order to develop the regions west of the Rocky mountains to encourage the opening up of channels of communication. It is necessary to the agricultural development of the country, necessary to the mineral development, necessary to the stability and prosperity of this country upon its western borders.

During the last session this Congress granted aid in order to construct a road connecting California with Oregon. I think no man has been able to find a single solid objection to the grant then made. No one will be so bold as to say that it will not largely aid in the development of that country, that it is not absolutely necessary as a military measure, as a postal measure, and as a measure of general prosperity upon the western border of our country. Now, sir, this road to which it is proposed to grant aid is merely a continuation of that road to connect it with one of the finest harbors in the world.

Mr. Speaker, I am aware there are other bills pending before Congress asking aid in the way of donations of land for the purpose of effecting their construction. If we stop here, after having granted aid to every State upon the eastern slope of the Rocky mountains and deprive of these same measures the Pacific, what is going to be the effect? The people on that slope are engaged in establishing an empire which is to form a very important part of this Republic. You may cripple it while we are endeavoring to develop it. You can, if you see proper, withhold the same measure of aid to us that you have given to others on this side, and thereby to the extent of your power endeavor to alienate us; but I can tell gentlemen if they comprehend the real wants of this country they must mete out to us the same measure of justice they have asked for themselves.

One thing is, they never can alienate the patriotism of the people of the Pacific. While we are engaged in throwing into your markets the very gold which sustains your credit, and without which you would be on the verge of financial bankruptcy, and endeavoring at the same time to develop the resources which will make us a great and prosperous people, you endeavor to deprive us of the very same means which you have already received at the hands of this Government. I ask, I appeal to the House, is it just? is it right? If you are going to deny this measure you ought to be consistent and repeal every bill you passed at the last session of Congress.

I will not occupy any more of the time of the House. Of course I will yield for explanation. I am desirous to have a vote on the bill to-day.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. The gentleman from Iowa charged with the care of this bill has consented to its postponement till the second Tuesday of January next.

Mr. BIDWELL. I do not know that.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Certainly he did. I trust the House will agree to its postponement. I wish to address the House on this question and I do not intend to take up time with a buncombe speech. It is a matter of importance.

Mr. BIDWELL. I wish to ask the gentleman from Illinois to sum up the total number of sections of land granted to the railroads heretofore, and bring it up as an argument against this bill.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. That may be one of the arguments.

Mr. BIDWELL. I would like to know how that can be made a charge against this bill long after the grants have been made.

Mr. THAYER. I rise to a point of order. I think the limit of debate which a motion of this kind admits is about exhausted.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point of order. The Digest states that a motion to postpone admits of very limited debate. The Chair therefore rules that the debate must be restricted to a very narrow limit.

Mr. PRICE. Will the gentleman from California yield for a moment?

Mr. BIDWELL. I will.

Mr. PRICE. I have been asked what part of this road was to be located in a State. I was not then able to answer the question. I now have the information. This road to the extent of six or seven miles is in Oregon; the balance of it is in Washington Territory.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Will the gentleman from California yield to me?

Mr. BIDWELL. I will.

Mr. INGERSOLL. As my colleague has moved to postpone this bill, and uses as an argument against it the great quantity of public land granted by the Government to railroads heretofore, I suggest to my friend from California to admit for the sake of the argument that two thousand million acres have already been granted, or two hundred thousand million if you please; no matter how much, the more the better.

Mr. BIDWELL. More than there is on the globe.

Mr. DAVES. I raise the point of order that this debate is not allowable under the rule.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. BIDWELL. The motion is to postpone. Well, sir, let us have the sense of the House upon it. If it decides to postpone, it will be almost tantamount to referring it to another committee. If it is only for the purpose of getting more information, I certainly would have no objection to a postponement, because I do not desire to have the House act blindly.

Mr. HENDERSON. I wish to say in answer to the question what part of this road runs through a State—

The SPEAKER. That is not in order.

Mr. HENDERSON. I want merely to say that none of it is in my State.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I desire to correct an impression which the gentleman from California [Mr. BIDWELL] seems to have got in regard to my motive in moving to postpone this bill and make it a special order. He must have misunderstood what I said. I said I desired to throw no obstacle in the way of its fair consideration. The only question is, shall we vote upon it blindly, or shall we postpone it and when it comes up again consider it fairly?

Mr. BIDWELL. The gentleman from Illinois constantly repeats that he does not intend to throw any obstacle in the way, and at the same time he is always doing it. I am willing to admit what he will state about the quantity of public land granted heretofore. He may have it printed as a part of his argument, if necessary, as against this bill: but I do want to take the sense of the House on this matter, and I therefore demand the previous question on the motion to postpone.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the motion to postpone and make the bill the special order for the second Tuesday in January was agreed to—ayes 74, noes 41.

Mr. WENTWORTH moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CORRECTION OF THE JOURNAL.

Mr. LOAN. I see by the Globe that I am recorded as not voting upon the motion to suspend the rules for the purpose of considering the resolution introduced by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ASHLEY] to raise a special committee of seven to investigate the conduct of Government officers. I voted in the affirmative to suspend the rules.

The SPEAKER. The Journal will be corrected accordingly.

The latter motion was agreed to.

OREGON LAND GRANT.

Mr. McRUER, from the Committee on Public Lands, reported back Senate bill No. 82, to amend an act entitled "An act granting land to the State of Oregon, to aid in the construction of a military road from Eugene City to the eastern boundary of said State," with a recommendation that the same do pass.

The question was upon ordering the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read at length. It appropriates such odd sections or part of odd sections not reserved or otherwise legally appropriated within six miles on each side of said road, to be selected by the surveyor general of the State of Oregon, as shall be sufficient to supply any deficiency in the quantity of the former grant of land which for any reason was not subject to land grants within the limits designated in the former act.

Mr. McRUER. I can explain this bill in a few words.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I would inquire if the bill has been printed.

Mr. McRUER. It is a Senate bill. I do not know that it has been printed for the use of the House.

Mr. Speaker, it is always customary in bills granting land to aid in the construction of railroads to provide that if the designated quantity of land is not found within the prescribed limits they may go a certain distance beyond those limits to make up the deficiency. The act of which this is an amendment was passed by a former Congress, and contained a grant of land of three sections per mile to aid in the construction of a wagon-road through the wilderness in Oregon. But it did not provide that if any portion of those three sections had been preempted or otherwise appropriated the company might go beyond the distance of three miles from the road for the purpose of obtaining the designated quantity of land. Now, the object of this bill is to grant to the company the privilege of obtaining their designated quantity of land within six miles of the line of the road if it cannot be obtained within a less distance. That is the whole purpose of the bill. It grants no additional land, not an acre.

I call the previous question on the passage of the bill.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I hope the gentleman will not call the previous question on this bill. This is very curious legislation we are having here.

Mr. McRUER. I will yield the floor for a few moments to the gentleman from Oregon, [Mr. HENDERSON.]

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a very short statement in regard to this road. One terminus of it is at the town where I reside, and I am familiar with the history of the road. The citizens of that place and the vicinity felt such an interest in the construction of the road that they subscribed $100,000 to assist in its completion in addition to the aid furnished by the Government grant of land. But the money thus subscribed and the land which can at present be realized by the company will be insufficient for the completion of the road, and it is necessary that the company be allowed to locate their land beyond the limit of three miles from the line of the road in order to make up the quantity originally intended to be granted to them. The first one hundred and fifty miles of land is all occupied within the designated limit, and in the region of the Cascade mountains, through which the road passes, the land is worthless. The company only ask that they may be allowed a range of six miles instead of three in order to make up the deficiency under which they now suffer. This road, when constructed, will be of immense value not only to that section of country but to persons traveling from the Atlantic States to the Pacific coast, as it shortens the route perhaps one hundred and fifty miles.

Mr. McRUER. I now yield to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. WASHBURN.]

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I ask my friend from California [Mr. McRUER] to consent to a postponement of this bill so that we may consider all these questions together. This is a question of granting lands, to use a technical term of the Land Office, "in place;" and I think that the views of the Commissioner of the General Land Office in relation to the very question raised in this bill are such as should commend themselves to the judgment of the members of this House.

I move that the further consideration of this bill be postponed until the second Wednesday of January, so that it will come up immediately after the other bill of a similar nature, which has been postponed till the second Tuesday of that month.

Mr. McRUER. I do not yield for any such motion. This is a very simple question—

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. The gentleman from California may think this is a very simple question, and he may arraign me and others for undertaking to resist these efforts to appropriate the public lands for the benefit of private corporations; but, sir, I shall endeavor to discharge my duty to my constituents and to the country by opposing all bills which seem to me improper.

Now, sir, I desire to call attention to the views of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, as expressed in his report of last year, in reference to the very question raised by this bill. And, sir, it is a very important question whether the Government shall under such circumstances establish this precedent of allowing these companies to go outside of the original limits in cases where the quantity of land granted, or supposed to be granted, does not amount to so much as is claimed by the company.

The Commissioner of the General Land Office says:

"The question has been agitated as to the propriety of a change of policy in making grants in aid of the construction of railroads by floats or scrip in lieu of land indemnity in place when the full complement is not found within the usual limits. In this connection, the result of such departure from the well-established policy of the Government is an important consideration in view of the interests of homestead and preemption settlers. In reference to any such suggested general change of policy"

The SPEAKER. The morning hour has expired, and this bill goes over until to-morrow morning.

Resolved, That these proceedings be communicated to the family of the deceased by the Secretary of the Senate.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased the Senate do now adjourn.

PUBLIC LANDS.

Mr. FERRY. I present the following:

To the Honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled:

At a meeting of the Grand Rapids Labor and Land Reform Union Association, held on the 7th instant in the city of Grand Rapids, in the fourth congressional district of the State of Michigan, the following preamble and resolution were unanimously adopted: Whereas there is now before Congress a proposition to make a large grant of the people's lands for the ostensible purpose of aiding in the construction of a railroad from San Francisco to Humboldt; and whereas we, the members of the Labor and Land Reform Union of the city of Grand Rapids—and we believe the whole laboring community—firmly believe that the disposing of the public lands to speculators is detrimental to the financial, educational, civil, social, and moral prosperity of the whole people, and especially of the pioneer agriculturalist; and whereas the granting of these lands to railroad companies is but an aggravated form of the same stupendous evil: Therefore,

Resolved, That we most solemnly protest against Congress granting any land for a railroad from San Francisco to Humboldt, or any other railroad, or to dispose of the public lands in any manner whatsoever, except for homesteads to homestead seekers; but if Congress shall deem it advisable to encourage that or any other improvement, it shall be done by giving the proceeds of the lands, and not the fee of the soil, thus keeping the people's lands intact for the actual settler only.

The paper was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. STEVENS moved that the rules be suspended, and the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. LAWRENCE, of Pennsylvania, in the chair,) and proceeded to the consideration of House bill No. 896, making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending the 30th of June, 1867.

The first reading of the bill for information was dispensed with.

For Congressional Globe, $35,532.

Mr. LAFLIN. I move to amend by striking out $35,532 and inserting $206,059, and to add thereafter the following items to be found in a subsequent part of the bill:

For twenty-four copies of the Congressional Globe and Appendix for each Member and Delegate of the first regular session of the Fortieth Congress, and one hundred copies of the same for the House Library, $35,532, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

For paying the publishers of the Congressional Globe and Appendix, according to the number of copies taken, one cent for every five pages exceeding three thousand, including the indexes and the laws of the United States, $15,000.

For one complete set of the Congressional Globe and Appendix for each Representative in the Fortieth Congress and each Delegate who has not received the same heretofore, $37,500.

For reporting and publishing proceedings in the Daily Globe, $28,000.

For the usual additional compensation to the reporters of the House for the Congressional Globe for reporting the proceedings of the House for the first regular session of the Fortieth Congress, $800 each, $1,800.

And then to add, "the above items making up the aggregate of $206,059 above named."

I do this for the purpose of bringing into an aggregate sum the amount paid for the Congressional Globe so that we may see at a glance what the total expense is. This amendment does not propose in the slightest manner to change the amount paid to the Globe, but simply consolidates them. I presume that the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations will not object to this proposition.

Mr. MAYNARD. I would inquire of the chairman of the Committee on Printing what is the annual aggregate amount that the Congressional Globe costs the Government.

Mr. LAFLIN. That it is the purpose of my amendment to exhibit. It is $206,059 in this appropriation bill. Whether this covers the entire amount paid for the Globe I am unable to answer. This is the sum of the different amounts scattered through this appropriation bill.

Mr. MAYNARD. I was desirous of knowing whether as chairman of the Committee on Printing the gentleman knew how much the annual expenses under this head were.

Mr. LAFLIN. I am unable to answer the gentleman, the question never having been referred to the Committee on Printing. It costs that much at least.

Mr. MAYNARD. Mr. Chairman, this subject of reporting our debates and of publishing the Globe is one that has attracted the attention of a great many gentlemen who have been in Congress in former years. Many have been of the opinion that the publication of our debates ought to be performed as part of the general printing, that is to say, by the Government, in the same way as other Government printing. In other words, that this Globe newspaper as a separate establishment is a fungus upon the Government which ought to be removed. I trust, therefore, that the amendment which has been proposed will be adopted, so that legislators can see how much the expense to the Government of this course is. Because as it has been the practice hitherto to divide up the amount into a great number of distinct items, one here and another there, unless a member has more time and opportunity than he usually has, he can have no conception of the amount of money that for many years has gone annually in that direction.

I have long been of the opinion that the publication of our debates ought to be made under our own immediate direction and by our own printing establishment, and since we now have one which does the other printing for us, any action looking to that change will meet my approval, and I hope it will also meet the approval of the Committee on Printing.

Mr. STEVENS. I do not know that there is anything very materially objectionable in the amendment. It does not alter the amount appropriated in the bill. But the mode of putting in these items that has prevailed heretofore I believe to be the most convenient, namely, to keep the expenses of each House distinct from the other. We are now making appropriations for the expenses of the Senate; further along we have appropriations for the expenses of the House of Representatives. We keep them separate, and I am not quite satisfied that the chairman of the Committee on Printing is likely to gain anything by this motion. If we mingle the different items of the two Houses, I do not see well how we are to separate them afterward. I rather think until further advised we had better keep the items as they are. If an arrangement can be made differently, I think it had better be made in some other bill and in some way so that the Comptroller and other officers of the Treasury can understand it.

Mr. LAFLIN. The Committee on Printing have no object to secure by proposing this amendment independent of the object that I suppose is common to all the members of this House. We desire by this amendment to interfere in no manner with the terms in which this bill is couched, but simply, while we retain all the particular items that are now in the bill, to so arrange them that the aggregate can be easily ascertained. Therefore, inasmuch as the different items now contained in the bill are to be continued, I do not see how any embarrassment can possibly arise of the character suggested by the honorable chairman of the Committee on Appropriations. This amendment states that we are to pay for the Congressional Globe the sum of two hundred and odd thousand dollars; describing just as this bill now describes the parties in whose interest and for whose benefit these different sums making up the aggregate are to be appropriated and expended.

It does seem to me that the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations must acknowledge that my amendment will greatly simplify the bill. As it now stands these items are scattered over a number of pages, and should any one desire to ascertain the facts so as to enable him to give a proper answer to the question propounded to me by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MAYNARD] a few moments since, he would be obliged to run through the entire appropriation bill, dig out item after item, and add them up for himself in order to determine what is the aggregate sum.

I think if the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations will reconsider this matter he will see that my amendment will result simply in the convenience of members, and in no way operate against the interest or convenience of any party concerned. I hope the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. HALE. I wish to call the attention of my colleague [Mr. LAFLIN] to a fact which seems to have escaped his notice; that is, that the amendment which he proposes makes this bill entirely inconsistent with its provisions; and to reach the end which he considers important it will be necessary to remodel the bill very materially. The portion which he proposes to amend is embraced under the general head of "contingent expenses of the Senate." Now, he proposes to have incorporated under that general head items which properly belong under the general head of "contingent expenses of the House of Representatives." My colleague will therefore see that his amendment, if adopted, will lead to confusion.

I suppose the gentleman has attained the end he had in view; simply to call the attention of the House to the large amount appropriated for the Globe. And having attained that object, I hope, in view of the inconsistency I have pointed out, he will withdraw his amendment.

Mr. LAFLIN. If the Committee of the Whole will reserve to me the right, and if the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations will consent to it, to consolidate in one item the appropriations for the Globe for each House we will then have but two items, instead of a half a dozen items; and perhaps secure the object at which I aim.

Mr. STEVENS. I will consent to waive the immediate call for the previous question when this bill shall be reported to the House, and in the mean time the gentleman can prepare an amendment to meet his views.

Mr. LAFLIN. With that understanding I withdraw my amendment.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill, and read as follows:

For reporting and printing the proceedings in the Daily Globe for the first session of the Fortieth Congress, $21,250.

Mr. MAYNARD. I would inquire of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations [Mr. STEVENS] what are the data upon which he has reported the item just read by the Clerk?

Mr. STEVENS. We take it from the estimates, which are to be found in the "Book of Estimates," which every member has a copy of I suppose.

Mr. MAYNARD. Does that item form a part of the contingent expenses of the Senate?

Mr. STEVENS. It is one of the items which are always put in the appropriation bill from year to year.

Mr. MAYNARD. The point is this: is this one of the items for the contingent expenses of the Senate?

Mr. STEVENS. It is always so inserted.

Mr. MAYNARD. Then I understand that one of the items of the contingent expenses of the Senate is "for reporting and printing the proceedings in the Daily Globe for the first session of the Fortieth Congress, $21,250." Now, I do not find under the head of "contingent expenses of the House of Representatives" any appropriation for reporting and printing the proceedings for the use of the House.

Mr. STEVENS. I have not looked at that.

Mr. MAYNARD. Now, sir, I do not understand the bill as the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations understands it. I do not understand that this is one of the items of the contingent expenses of the Senate. Here are four different items in succession all relating to the publication of the Globe; but portions of them manifestly do not relate specially to the Senate. The appropriation "for reporting and printing the proceedings in the Daily Globe" seems to be introduced here without specially belonging in this place.

Mr. STEVENS. I think that this has been the form of this bill ever since the Globe has been published under the authority of Congress. I believe gentlemen will find on looking back that this is the form in which the bills have always been passed. The gentleman will find at the bottom of page 8 of this bill the appropriations for the House.

Mr. MAYNARD. Nothing is said there, I believe, about the Daily Globe.

Mr. STEVENS. The gentleman will find at lines one hundred and seventy-nine and one hundred and eighty of page 8 this item:

For reporting and publishing proceedings in the Daily Globe, $23,000.

That corresponds in form with the appropriation for the Senate in the portion of the bill we are now considering.

Mr. MAYNARD. I would like the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations to state why it is that only $23,000 are necessary to pay for reporting and printing the proceedings of this House while $21,250, almost as much, are appropriated for the Senate, a body embracing some sixty odd members, while here we have nearly two hundred. Why is it that the Daily Globe for the House costs so much less in proportion than it does for the Senate?

Mr. STEVENS. It always has been so. The expenses of the Senate have always been very much larger, in proportion to the number of members, than the expenses of the House. The contingent expenses for stationery, &c., are with the Senate much larger, in proportion to the number of members, than the contingent expenses of the House. But we do not presume to interfere with that matter. That branch always fixes its own allowance for compensation, for contingent expenses, &c., and this branch acquiesces.

Mr. MAYNARD. Well, Mr. Chairman, I confess that I do not understand this item. This may be owing to a want of comprehension on my part, but still this is one of various items for which we have never had any reason given except the one that has been given to-day—"it has always been so"—a prescription beyond which the memory of no man now living runneth to the contrary.

Now, the Daily Globe is a newspaper published during the session of Congress in the city of Washington, for which a subscription price is charged just as for any other newspaper. It derives its interest and importance from the fact that it publishes the proceedings of Congress. One copy of this paper is placed daily upon the desk of each member and Senator. I am perfectly willing that the subscription price should be paid if gentlemen desire this paper, and perhaps it is well enough to have it, though I presume that generally more gentlemen receive it than read it. The number of copies, however, furnished to Members and Senators would not require an appropriation of one half, hardly one tenth of that here provided for. We know that the congressional matter published in the Daily Globe is the same that goes into the Congressional Globe, for which we pay, as will be seen by this bill, a very liberal sum in solido for the whole. Then we pay the reporters. Then we pay, according to the number of copies taken, one cent for every five pages exceeding three thousand. Thus for the matter contained in the Daily Globe and the Congressional Globe we pay three or four times over. It seems to me that we would pay enough if we paid only for the newspaper as any other subscriber does.

This whole subject ought to be overhauled, ought to be reexamined. A proposition was made at the commencement of this Congress to do this; but it was put off; it received the go-by for the time, the supposition being that it would be brought up again at some convenient season; but I recollect telling a gentleman here at that time that the convenient season would never arrive. This system has been going on for a very long time. It has been the fugientem Italiam of legislation for a number of years. It is time that the matter should be overhauled. Though I may not be able in dealing with this many-headed power to strike at more than one head at a time, I will strike at one at least by moving that lines fifty-eight, fifty-nine, and sixty be stricken out. If it is desired to pay for the subscription to this newspaper we can bring it in some other way. My amendment is to strike out the following:

For reporting and printing the proceedings in the Daily Globe for the first session of the Fortieth Congress, $21,250.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. Chairman, this only carries out the arrangement which we made with the late proprietor of this paper during his lifetime. It has always been continued from time to time and about the same amount that it is now.

The amount of Congressional Globes it will be seen further on, is twenty-four copies for each member of the Senate and House of Representatives. There is an error in the printed bill, and instead of the Thirty-Ninth Congress it should be the Fortieth Congress.

This bill appropriates first for reporting the ordinary amount, the same that has always been allowed ever since the arrangement with the Globe under Mr. Rives. Then we have the twenty-four copies for each member. It has been the number ordered and paid for ever since I have been a member of Congress. There is nothing, unless the House desires to inaugurate a new system, at all involved in this bill which it is for the House to consider. It now only carries out the arrangement with the Globe, but if the House desires to establish a new system that is another question and ought to come in another form. As it stands between the proprietors and the House it is now and has been the custom for I do not know how many years to make these appropriations. I do not see how we can avoid in an appropriation bill making the appropriations, when they are to be made in advance just as they are in this bill.

I hope, therefore, we shall have no general discussion in regard to the general question at this time, but that the matter will be left to be fully investigated hereafter.

Mr. LAFLIN. Mr. Chairman, I concur entirely with the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations in his view of the case, and I may concur to some extent with the views of the gentleman from Tennessee, but at this time, with the limited knowledge I have upon the subject and with the knowledge that there is existing with the publishers of the Globe a contract, if not written, implied, which would authorize this expenditure by the Government—

Mr. MAYNARD. Will the gentleman let me ask him what evidence he has of that contract? I have heard a good deal of that contract, but I have never seen it and never saw any man who has ever seen it.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Call for it, and let it be ordered to be printed.

Mr. LAFLIN. If the gentleman had noticed my language he would have seen I said it is a written or implied contract, but for the purpose of relieving the House—

Mr. MAYNARD. I heard the gentleman's statement. I want to know whether it is written or implied. If it is written has he seen it, and if implied from what is it implied?

Mr. LAFLIN. I was going on to say that at a joint meeting of the Committee on Public Printing this very morning, owing to a disagreement which existed between the Superintendent of Public Printing and the Public Printing Office and the publishers of the Globe as to who should bear the expense of what is known in the printing trade "of folding and gathering," it became necessary for us to look up and examine into this contract. And, sir, proper measures have already been taken to unearth this contract, if such a contract exists. With the limited knowledge I now possess I am disposed to agree with the gentleman from Tennessee that no such written contract does exist. But there was a certain act passed just at the close of one of our sessions, at what date I am unable now to say, which gave them a certain right, under which at least they are exercising the right to publish the Globe.

I wish to say here that, without attempting in any measure whatever to prejudice the interests of the publishers of the Globe, it is the intention of the Committee on Printing to thoroughly examine into the nature of this contract, to examine into the expenditures which have been made in virtue of this contract either written or implied, and if in their judgment it shall seem proper any change shall be made either in the terms of that contract or any change made in the manner in which these debates are to be published, this committee will at the proper time make due recommendations.

As I said before, I concur with the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, that we are not in a proper situation to take the course suggested by the gentleman from Tennessee, and I hope, therefore, his amendment will not be adopted.

Mr. MAYNARD. I wish the gentleman before he takes his seat would address himself to a point which he seems to have omitted in the remarks he has made. The objection that I made to this item was that it is a large appropriation for the reporting and printing in the Daily Globe. We already provide for publishing the Congressional Globe; we make large and sufficient appropriations for that. Now, what is the Daily Globe? It is nothing more nor less than the Congressional Globe so far as our proceedings are concerned. In addition to those proceedings the Daily Globe publishes various other kinds of matter, advertisements, &c., as other newspapers do.

A fact was brought to my recollection which had escaped me when I was up before, that this one copy of the Daily Globe which is placed on our table every day is one of the twenty-four copies that we get as members. So I have been informed by a gentleman who professes to know better than I do about the matter, and when he stated it to me it accorded with my recollection on the subject. Now if that be true it is another additional reason why this should be stricken out. In any event we pay for the Congressional Globe a large amount. We pay for the reporting, and now here is another charge by which we are made to pay twice over for precisely the same thing; because the Daily Globe is nothing more nor less than the Congressional Globe in an unfledged or embryo state. The debates are first published in the Daily and then made up into the size of the Congressional Globe and published as we get them there.

Mr. HALE. If the gentleman from Tennessee will allow me, I will explain very briefly what I understand about the effect of this Globe contract. I had occasion a year ago or more to examine this subject and then made myself somewhat familiar with it. The details of it are now gone from my recollection, but I know the substance. There is something in the nature of a contract, to say the least of it. By a resolution of the two Houses—a joint resolution I think—and by the filing of a bond given by John C. Rives, the former proprietor of the Globe, an arrangement has been made between Congress and the proprietors of the Globe for the reporting and publishing of the debates at a certain rate of compensation by the column in the Daily Globe, for the daily publication; and in addition to that the proprietors of the Globe engage to furnish to each member of the House and Senate a certain number of copies of the Congressional Globe at a stipulated price; the payment for the reporting by the column and for the volumes as delivered being both parts of the same contract and going to make up the compensation of the proprietors of the Globe.

Now, I do not come here to vindicate the propriety of this arrangement or the desirability of its continuance, but so long as it stands, and until it is terminated pursuant to the provisions of the contract itself, or the resolution whatever it was under which this understanding was arrived at, and which provided that it might be terminated by giving notice—until that is done, it seems to me we are bound in good faith to pursue the terms of the contract on our part. And I suggest to the consideration of the Committee on Printing and of the members of the House that when it shall be found advisable to depart from this contract or terminate it and pursue some different method of reporting and publishing the debates, according to my humble judgment, an improvement will not be found in transferring this work to the Public Printers, for I believe there it will cost much more than it costs now, but rather in abandoning the whole matter of publishing the debates of this House to private competition and leaving it free to everybody and anybody to publish the reports so far as they see fit and get their pay in the ordinary way; thus getting rid of the cost of supplying copies of the Globe to members of the House, washing our own hands of the whole thing, and leaving it a direct personal matter between publisher and purchaser.

Mr. BIDWELL. Will it be in order to move to postpone this bill until the chairman of the Committee on Printing shall be able to make a thorough investigation into this subject?

The CHAIRMAN. That motion would not be in order.

Mr. STEVENS. All I have to say in regard to this matter is, that there is nothing new or strange in this. It is in precisely the language which we have used for twenty years past. It may be for the convenience of some members to break up the Globe and destroy it. I shall not object to that more than many others will. We have already made the appropriation for the expenses to be incurred this session. But if gentlemen find they can dispense with the Globe and break it up, I shall not complain more than some others will.

Mr. MAYNARD. We are now fixing it for the next Congress; fastening it upon us for two years longer.

Mr. STEVENS. Unless we can proceed faster than we have been doing, I must move that the committee rise, to enable me to submit a motion to limit the debate upon this bill in Committee of the Whole by the five-minute rule.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I think we can do that by unanimous consent.

Mr. STEVENS. If that can be done, I will not submit the motion.

No objection was made.

Mr. COOK. At the last session of Congress the Committee on the Judiciary were instructed by the House to inquire whether any contract, and if so what, existed between the Government and the publishers of the Daily Globe. That committee have had the matter before them, and have made some examination of it. It appears from that examination that on the 1st of March, 1847, the House of Representatives passed a resolution authorizing each member to subscribe for twelve copies of the Congressional Globe and Appendix. On the 4th of February, 1850, the House passed a resolution authorizing each member to subscribe for twelve additional copies of the Congressional Globe and Appendix. Under these two resolutions, which were without limit as to time, each member of the House has continued to be supplied with twenty-four copies of the Congressional Globe and Appendix. The resolution of February 4, 1850, also provided that the publishers of the Globe should continue the daily publication of the proceedings of the House.

The appropriations for the Congressional Globe and Appendix have been made at each Congress since the passage of the foregoing resolutions. At the last session of the Thirty-

Fourth Congress appropriations were made for reporting the debates of the Thirty-Fifth Congress. Similar appropriations were made by the Thirty-Fifth, Thirty-Sixth, Thirty-Seventh, and Thirty-Eighth Congresses to pay for reporting the proceedings of the next Congresses. The appropriations made by the Thirty-Eighth Congress were upon the condition that thereafter the proceedings of Congress should be published in the Daily Globe of the day subsequent to the day such proceedings were had, and delivered to both Houses at the time of their meeting; which provision was to take effect at the then next session of Congress. The whole legislation of Congress seems to have proceeded upon the theory of a continuing agreement under the resolutions of March 1, 1847, and February 4, 1850.

Mr. MAYNARD. How was the Globe published before that time? It extends back to 1835 or 1836, I believe.

Mr. COOK. I cannot say.

Mr. STEVENS. If the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Cook] will permit me, I will endeavor to answer the question of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. MAYNARD.]: The Annals of Congress were reported by one of the editors and proprietors of the National Intelligencer for a great many years and published by him, and Congress purchased the volumes of him. I suppose all the members of Congress who were here at that time have that work in their own libraries, except, perhaps, some who have sold their copies, which I am told was done in some instances. The Annals of Congress were got up by the senior editor of the National Intelligencer, one of the ablest reporters of that day. The Congressional Globe and Appendix have taken the place of that work.

Mr. COOK. By the provisions of chapter 250 of the laws of the United States, approved July 4, 1864, section one, the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House of Representatives are directed to purchase from the publishers of the Congressional Globe and Appendix, for each Senator, Representative, and Delegate in that and each succeeding Congress, one complete set of the Congressional Globe and Appendix from the beginning.

The second section provides that there shall be paid to the publishers of the Congressional Globe and Appendix one cent for every five pages exceeding three thousand pages for a long session, or fifteen hundred pages for a short session, including indexes and the laws of the United States for that and each future Congress.

The fourth section provides that the above provisions are upon the express condition that they may be abrogated by either Congress or the publishers of the Congressional Globe and Appendix by giving two years' notice.

It seems, therefore, that there is a contract with the publishers of the Congressional Globe and Appendix, which contract cannot be terminated except by giving them two years' notice. That seems to be the substance of the legislation hitherto upon this subject.

Mr. MAYNARD. Mr. Chairman, as I understand, the only thing in the shape of a contract that was brought to the attention of the committee was a resolution of this House adopted in 1847 authorizing members to subscribe for twelve copies of the Congressional Globe, and a subsequent resolution authorizing subscriptions for twelve additional copies. There was also, I believe, some subsequent legislation in the Thirty-Eighth Congress, which it is claimed goes to create a contract. I was not a member of that Congress, and my attention was not called to that legislation; but I was in Congress before the war when this question came up, and we were assured over and over again, as we are assured now, that there was a contract obligatory upon us all. It would seem that this contract when it comes to be examined rests upon nothing more than a resolution authorizing members to subscribe for twelve copies of the Globe, and a subsequent resolution authorizing subscriptions for twelve additional copies. It is time that this thing should be stopped, if we have any power to do it; and

I trust that the Committee on Printing will report some measure that will at least get this thing into our own hands; for as I have already said these appropriations for the Globe have been a fungus upon the Treasury ever since I have known anything about the proceedings of Congress, and the system bids fair, according to the present mode of legislation, to go on indefinitely through this and succeeding generations.

Mr. BANKS. Mr. Chairman, I do not believe that the printers of the Globe have any contract with this House that binds us. Our arrangement with them is certainly plainly written in the history of our legislation, and it ought to be regarded by us; but it is an arrangement to subscribe for the Globe; and inasmuch as they print the proceedings at great length, we pay something toward the reporting. It is precisely such an arrangement as a man makes with any newspaper by subscribing for it and by paying occasionally for the insertion of matter which is of peculiar interest to himself. We ought not to be held bound to continue this arrangement in consequence of any such understanding as that.

Now, I do not complain of the expense of this publication, as the gentleman from Tennessee does; nor of the manner in which the reporting or publication has been performed; but in my opinion it is of the highest possible importance that the reporters and the publication of the reports should be under the exclusive control of the House; and whether it cost more or less, the House, in the exercise of one of its highest and most important privileges, should take into its own hands the direction of this matter. I hope that the suggestion of the chairman of the Committee on Printing, which looks to this end, will be carried out.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. MAYNARD, it was not agreed to.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill, and read as follows:

For one complete set of the Congressional Globe and Appendix for each Senator in the Thirty-Ninth Congress who has not already received them: Provided, however, That any Senator who has already, as a member of the House of Representatives, received a portion of a set of the Congressional Globe shall only be entitled to receive as such Senator, the additional volumes required to complete one full set, $9.375.

Mr. STEVENS. I move to amend by striking out in the sixty-sixth line, before the word "Congress," the words "Thirty-Ninth," and inserting in lieu thereof the word "Fortieth." This amendment is to correct a misprint.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I move to amend by adding at the end of the paragraph just read the following:

Provided, That no further appropriations shall be made for supplying complete sets of the Congressional Globe and Appendix to members of any succeeding Congress.

I understand that under the requirement of two years' notice we cannot refuse this appropriation to furnish these volumes to the new members of the Fortieth Congress, but we can declare by law that we will make no further appropriation for providing members of succeeding Congresses with sets of the Congressional Globe.

I remember very well that two years ago when the Committee on Printing presented the proposition for the purchase of these volumes, the House in the first instance negated it; but afterward it somehow went through. The law as then passed provided for supplying to every new member of Congress a complete set of the Congressional Globe and Appendix from the beginning of the publication to the time of his taking his seat. Gentlemen can see how this system, if continued, will grow in proportions from year to year. We all know that there are very few new members elected to the next Congress; yet it requires an appropriation of nearly $50,000 to furnish these volumes to new Members and Senators of the Fortieth Congress. It is obvious that if the system be continued we shall before many years find it necessary to appropriate half a million dollars, then a million; and thus as time goes on the expense will constantly increase.

If the furnishing of these volumes be intended as a sort of subsidy to members of Congress I can only say that it seems to me we are already receiving pay enough. If it is intended as a benefit to the publishers of the Congressional Globe, and so I suppose it was originally, if it is a gift to them, I do not know the Government is under any obligation, to keep it up.

We provide that there shall be deposited one hundred copies of the Globe in the Library of Congress. A hundred copies is enough for the members of Congress. But then in addition we give members twenty-four copies each. It seems to me high time that we should stop it. These leaks are growing in proportion every year. These amounts are constantly increasing, and there is no telling to what sum they will reach if we do not stop them. It is easy to ingraft them on the Government, but it is almost impossible afterward to get rid of them. I propose by my amendment to give the two years' notice that we will not, for the Fortieth Congress, provide members with complete sets of the Globe.

Mr. SPALDING. I think the member from Illinois is right. When some two years ago we attempted to distribute these copies of the entire Globe among members we did it as a favor to the publishers of the Globe. I understood they had this number of surplus copies on hand and that Congress would favor them by buying them and sending them around the country, and we supposed it was as good a mode as any to let each member of Congress take one. I did not believe we were to establish a rule to inure for all time to come. I did not suppose this Globe was to be repeated year after year and the Government was to be subjected perpetually to the expense of furnishing each member of Congress with a copy. I am willing to retrace my steps if I was mistaken and go with the gentleman from Illinois in putting on this limitation by way of proviso, that for the Fortieth Congress this practice shall be stopped so far as we have anything to do with it.

Mr. MAYNARD. Under the old law giving members eight dollars a day, the compensation was clearly and manifestly inadequate, but Congress, disliking to incur the odium of directly raising their salary, had by indirection been voting themselves a large amount of books, the Annals of Congress, the Register of Debates, the Congressional Globe, and various other books, estimated in the laws passed from time to time at so much a volume, and which amounted to from twelve to fifteen dollars to each member. This was an indirect mode of doing what ought to have been done directly, that is to give members an adequate compensation.

As a matter of fact, instead of taking these books the members were in the habit of compounding with the Clerk, or going through the formality of receiving the books and then selling them back to him, pocketing something like one thousand dollars each. I see a gentleman who was a member of Congress under that régime, and perhaps recollects something about what I have stated. I do not say he participated in it. Perhaps he did not.

The Thirty-Fourth Congress passed a law changing the mode of compensation from a per diem to an annual salary, giving each member $3,000 a year, with the provision if thereafter Congress should vote books to individual members, the members who received those books should have them charged up against their salary and they should be accounted for. We heard no more of books after that until the last Congress. The last Congress passed this legislation which has been referred to voting to members this supply of books—I believe the Congressional Globe and Appendix from the commencement, a full series. Whether the value of the books has been compounded with the Clerk I do not know, and perhaps it is not necessary to inquire, but after having our salaries increased from $3,000 to $5,000 it seems to me this further indirect compensation in the shape of additional books ought to be suspended. I think it ought to be suspended and that the paragraph should be stricken out.

Mr. HALE. I trust this paragraph will not be stricken out, and I think I can present to members of the House a single consideration that ought to weigh with them.

The CHAIRMAN. The motion is to add a proviso and not to strike out the paragraph. The amendment was again read.

Mr. HALE. I understood the gentleman from Tennessee, before taking his seat, to move as a substitute for that amendment to strike out the paragraph.

Mr. MAYNARD. No, sir; I said it ought to be stricken out.

Mr. HALE. I have only to say this: the large majority of members of this House, it seems to me, have no occasion to interfere with this question. They are reflected to their positions here, they have no successors to provide for, and I submit whether, with proper deference and regard to the feelings of those few on this side of the House or on the other, who have wrung from our constituents a reluctant consent that we be permitted to stay at home for the next Congress, we ought not to be allowed to do the handsome thing for our successors. [Laughter.]

Mr. DAWES. I suggest to the gentleman whether, as a lawyer, he supposes a provision inserted here would be an obstacle in the way of any future appropriation.

Mr. HALE. I answer that I have not inserted any provision, and it has not occurred to me that anything has been proposed on the subject that would be of the slightest effect.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. FARNSWORTH, no quorum voted.

Tellers were ordered; and the Chair appointed Messrs. FARNSWORTH and HALE.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 53, noes 45.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STEVENS. I move to strike out "five" in line one hundred and five and insert "six;" also to strike out "$4,380" and insert "$5,256;" so that the item will read thus:

Six firemen at $2 40 each per day, $5,256.

There is another boiler added to the works which requires an additional fireman, making six.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For one complete set of the Congressional Globe and Appendix for each Representative in the Fortieth Congress, and each Delegate who has not received the same heretofore, $37,500.

Mr. COOK. I move to add to the foregoing the following:

Provided, That notice is hereby given that at the close of the Fortieth Congress the United States will terminate the purchase of one complete set of the Congressional Globe and Appendix for each Senator, Representative, and Delegate provided for by the act approved July 4, 1864.

The question being taken on the amendment, no quorum voted.

Tellers were ordered; and the Chair appointed Messrs. COOK and FARNSWORTH.

Mr. HALE. I rise to a point of order. This amendment is not in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point comes too late. The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 52, noes 46.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For compensation of Librarian, five assistant librarians, messenger, and laborers, $13,680.

For twenty per cent. additional on the above, $2,736.

Mr. HARDING. I raise the point of order that there is no law authorizing the last appropriation of twenty per cent.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is informed that there is a law and therefore overrules the point of order.

Mr. MAYNARD. Will the chairman of the committee tell us what is the basis of this appropriation of twenty per cent. additional; whether this is the mode of increasing the salaries of these functionaries or whether it has been already allowed by law?

Mr. STEVENS. It is allowed by law.

Mr. MAYNARD. How many years back?

Mr. STEVENS. It began, I think, since the war commenced.

Mr. MAYNARD. While the war was going on these things, I suppose, did not attract attention and went through the House without inquiry. I want to know if this is incorporated here for the first time.

Mr. STEVENS. Oh, no.

Mr. MAYNARD. What is the amount of pay of these officers?

Mr. STEVENS. You will see it above—"For compensation of Librarian, five assistant librarians, messenger, and laborers, $13,680."

Mr. MAYNARD. I suppose they are now paid that sum.

Mr. SLOAN. I would like to know why the Chair overruled the point of order raised by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. HARDING.]

The CHAIRMAN. The appropriation is in accordance with a law passed last session on the 28th of July.

Mr. SLOAN. I am informed that that law applied to last year only.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is informed that the law is a continuing one.

Mr. MAYNARD. I ask these questions in order to ascertain beforehand whether or not I will move an amendment. About ten years ago the compensation of the officers of this House was raised twenty per cent. I am not aware whether the salaries of the Librarian and his assistants were raised at that time or not. I will ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] if he can state whether at the time the salaries of the officers of this House were increased twenty per cent. in the Thirty-Fourth Congress, the salaries of the Librarian and his assistants were increased?

Mr. STEVENS. I do not think they were at that time.

Mr. MAYNARD. Then this ought to be left in the bill.

Mr. HARDING, of Illinois. I move to strike out the following item under the heading "Library of Congress:"

For twenty per cent. additional on the above, $2,736.

The amendment was not agreed to.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill.

Mr. MAYNARD. I move to strike out the following, being lines two hundred and twenty-four, two hundred and twenty-five, and two hundred and twenty-six of the printed bill:

For twenty per cent. additional allowance on the above, $1,229 16.

I make this motion for the purpose of saying that I have now before me the act of the last session, concerning which I inquired some time since. Section eighteen of that act provides—

"That there be allowed and paid to the officers, clerks, committee clerks, messengers, and all other employes of the Senate and House of Representatives, and to the Globe and official reporters of each House, and the stenographer of the House, and to the Capitol police, and the three superintendents of the public gardens, their clerks and assistants, and to the Librarian, assistant librarians, messengers, and other employes of the Congressional Library, an addition of twenty per cent. on their present pay, to commence with the present Congress."

That is the law that was approved on the 28th of July, 1866, and this item of course appears in this appropriation bill for the first time. I am satisfied upon reference to this law, as I was not before, that this item is proper and should be left in the bill. I withdraw my amendment.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I move to amend the clause which reads:

For payments of judgments which may be rendered by the Court of Claims in favor of claimants, $1,000,000.

By adding to it the following:

Provided, That no part of the money hereby appropriated shall be paid until the judgments of said court shall be confirmed by Congress.

Mr. STEVENS. I rise to a point of order. By the law as it now stands the amount of these judgments are to be paid upon the rendition of the judgments and the presentation of the certificates to the Treasury Department. This proviso proposes to repeal a portion of that law; it is entirely new legislation in an appropriation bill, and therefore out of order.

The CHAIRMAN, (Mr. LAWRENCE, of Pennsylvania.) The Chair overrules the point of order.

The question was upon the amendment of Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois.

Mr. BINGHAM. It is my impression just at this moment that no more unwise legislation than the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURNE] could be introduced into Congress touching these matters. I believe that the records of Congress for the five years preceding the organization of this Court of Claims, as compared with the records of the court of the appropriations of money to discharge claims against the Government of the United States, will show that no wiser legislation in the way of economy has taken place in the Congress of the United States, than that which provided for the establishment of this court. I beg leave to say to gentlemen here that I have no doubt that, comparing the amount charged against the Treasury of the United States by the action of the last Congress, the Thirty-Eighth Congress, upon claims against the Government of the United States, with the amount under the legislation of any Congress upon similar subjects, preceding the establishment of this Court of Claims, the amount in the former case will not be as one dollar to ten in the latter case, and I challenge gentlemen to the investigation.

Yet it is now proposed by this amendment to bring all these questions back into Congress, and to have again all manner of log-rolling here upon claims of from five hundred to five million dollars. I ask how can a body of two hundred men understand the merits of a case depending upon a large amount of conflicting testimony? I undertake to say that there is not one case in a hundred decided in the Congress of the United States, resting upon the testimony of conflicting witnesses, in regard to which one member in fifty—and I say it with all respect to members—could give an intelligible account of the testimony upon which the case was decided.

The law was originally passed to transfer these claims to the Court of Claims for consideration, in order that the country might be protected against unjust and unfair demands; that the country might be protected as well against hasty legislation as against legislation giving away the money of the country to clamorous claimants, where there was no tolerable excuse for the demand at all. For myself, I feel constrained to say that I must oppose this amendment of the gentleman from Illinois, although in the main I feel inclined to support the motions which he makes touching the appropriation of money. If he ever in his life made a mistake, in my judgment he has made a mistake in this amendment. It simply amounts to a repeal of the Court of Claims; for it says that the decisions of all cases shall rest at last with Congress, ninety-nine in each hundred of whose members will not understand the merits of the cases to be decided by them.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I think the gentleman from Ohio does not meet my point. This amendment does not imply any hostility to the Court of Claims. It proposes simply to require that court to send to us its judgments. We do not propose to take from the court, as the gentleman's argument would imply, the jurisdiction of an investigation.

Mr. BINGHAM. Certainly, if the amendment be adopted it contemplates that Congress shall affirm or disaffirm the judgments of the court.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I understand that; but it will not take from the court the right to examine judicially into these claims. The court at present under our legislation has not only this right, but its award in any case, unless reversed on appeal to the Supreme Court, gives the party a claim upon the Treasury. Now, I do not believe that we have any right to confer upon the Court of Claims such jurisdiction without reserving to Congress, as the representative of the people and the guardian of the Treasury, the power to disaffirm the judgments of the court if we see fit.

Mr. MAYNARD. Will my friend from Illinois allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Yes, sir.

Mr. MAYNARD. Of what possible use is the Court of Claims if its judgments are to be referred to us that we may reconsider the cases and pass upon them?

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Does the gentleman from Tennessee know that this giving the Court of Claims complete and final jurisdiction in all these matters is an entirely new system; that until a very recent period we required that court to send all these cases here for us to act upon them? But by a law of very late date we have provided that this court may make up its judgments, and that the parties may obtain payment of their claims without ever coming to Congress at all.

Mr. MAYNARD. Certainly, I know that; and if the gentleman will allow me, I will ask him whether he does not know that for the very reason that the judgments of the court were required to be submitted to us for our action, Congress became satisfied that the court under such a system was absolutely useless; that either it ought to be abolished altogether or its decisions should be made final, unless taken on appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States. Was it not because of that very feature which the gentleman advocates and seeks to revive, that a change was made and the present system established?

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I do not know what reasons controlled the action of other members; but the consideration referred to did not influence me. I always protested against abdicating to any inferior court the proper jurisdiction of Congress, the highest court in the nation. I have always contended that we should retain the control of all these matters; that we should not put the whole Treasury of this nation into the hands of five men sitting as judges of the Court of Claims.

Mr. STEVENS. Members of the House cannot have forgotten that for a number of years we tried the experiment of the system which the gentleman from Illinois now proposes to revive. Under that system the Court of Claims was really reduced to a committee of investigation, reporting to Congress their judgments, which had no force until confirmed by us. The result was that claimants were embarrassed. It was difficult to obtain action here upon claims however meritorious; and generally those claimants who had the most money succeeded best. We became satisfied that one of two things must be done: either the court must be abolished or we must provide that its judgments, after having gone through all the forms (an appeal to the Supreme Court being allowed) should, like the judgments of all courts of competent jurisdiction, have the force of law and entitle the successful claimant to the amount awarded to him. We therefore repealed the provision which required the judgments of that court to be submitted to Congress, and declared that those judgments, unless reversed on appeal to the Supreme Court, should be final, and should be paid without any reexamination and confirmation by Congress. I think it would be extremely unwise for us now to restore the old system and require the judgments of this court to be submitted to Congress.

I did not understand clearly the decision of the Chair upon the point of order which I submitted. I made the point of order that, inasmuch as this amendment proposes to repeal a provision of existing law, it is not in order on an appropriation bill. I suppose the Chair is aware that there is a law, providing that the awards of this court shall be paid upon the certificate being presented to the proper officer. If there is any question as to the existence of such a law, I will ask the Clerk to turn to it. I make the point of order that you cannot in an appropriation bill repeal an existing law for the organization of that court.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. It is too late; the point of order has been once overruled.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has already decided that it is competent for the House to direct the manner in which the money shall be expended.

Mr. STEVENS. Am I at liberty to appeal from that decision?

The CHAIRMAN. Certainly.

Mr. STEVENS. Then I take an appeal from the decision of the Chair.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 52, noes 35.

So the decision of the Chair was sustained.

Mr. SLOAN. I hope the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois will prevail. In my judgment the change which has been made in the law, so that instead of the judgments of the Court of Claims being returned to us for final action they are allowed on appeal to be taken to the Supreme Court of the United States, is not a judicious one. It is well known the business before the Supreme Court is already very large, and that the number of claims presented to the Court of Claims has increased enormously, so that it will be almost impossible to any extent under that law for the Supreme Court of the United States to investigate and determine these causes.

Now, the Court of Claims, although their judgments were referred to this House for final action, was by no means a useless institution. We had the advantage of a judicial investigation. We had the advantage of the testimony being taken before that court and carefully analyzed and examined into. I trust the system in operation until the last Congress, of having the judgments of the Court of Claims referred to this House, will be continued.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. I believe my friend from Illinois is wrong for the first time.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I am obliged to the gentleman for his good opinion.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. He is a great economist and saves the Government a large amount of money, but I believe he is on the wrong track this time. I believe a bad claim stands a better chance of success in any other department of the Government than in the Court of Claims. It is hard to kill a bad claim anywhere, and it is easy to defeat a good one, and they are almost always defeated while bad ones almost always get through. But this Court of Claims is an open court like all others. Counsel are employed to examine evidence and witnesses and to argue the case adversely. Every one who chooses can come in and hear the discussion of the case. It is all open. It is no room in one of the Departments where you slip into a clerk and tell him "these are clever fellows and the claim ought to go through." It is no committee-room in this House where you hear them alone, not improperly, but still alone, because the opponents of the measure are not there. It is an open thing, and if there is any one department of the Government which can be trusted with claims it is that court. Therefore I shall vote against my friend's motion with some reluctance because he makes it.

Mr. BINGHAM. Will my friend allow me a portion of his time to make a statement?

Mr. SCOTFIELD. Certainly.

Mr. BINGHAM. I desire to say, with all respect to my friend from Wisconsin, that he labors under a very great and total misapprehension about the condition of the legislation of the country in regard to this tribunal for the last three years. Now, what I undertake to say is, that the change in the legislation touching this court made in the last Congress had no relation whatever to the question raised by the gentleman from Wisconsin, the power of Congress to review the decisions of that court. It was a change in the existing legislation of Congress to remove the objection raised by the Supreme Court of the United States, to their obligation to review upon an appeal as hitherto provided by law, the decisions of the Court of Claims. The Congress of the United States did not intend the Supreme Court should by any objection of that sort, taken on a mere verbal expression of an existing statute, evade the obligations which properly belong to their office; and therefore, what is known as the fourteenth section of the statute in reference to the Court of Claims, upon which they predicated their denial to review the decisions of the Court of Claims, was repealed and rightfully repealed.

But, sir, with the indulgence of my friend from Pennsylvania, I beg leave to repeat what I said before, that during the last three years of the existence of this court of exchequer, as it may be rightfully called, there have been millions—I do not stop with thousands, but I say millions—saved to the Treasury of the United States directly by its judgments, as compared with the action of any preceding Congress in the last ten years. And I challenge an investigation of the fact.

Therefore it is I object to the proposition of my friend from Illinois, [Mr. WASHBURNE,] and I beg leave to reiterate that I am surprised that he did not fully comprehend, that the effect of this proposition is simply to make this House again a log-rolling machine in the interest of these men who come to claim, not simply a few hundred thousand dollars, but a few million under some treaty stipulation, and who button-hole every member of the House, to the utter disgust of the country and the disgrace of this body. It makes it altogether nugatory. As my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] says, it converts the tribunal into a mere set of arbitrators or commissioners in chancery to make a report to the House.

My friend from Wisconsin [Mr. SLOAN] thinks that of course the House would understand the testimony and arguments of counsel and conflicts arising in the law. My experience is this: more than ten years since when I first came into this House, the very condition of things which my friend proposes to reenact today by this amendment did exist. You had your Court of Claims, but they were simply auditors to audit the accounts, take testimony and report it to the House, and the result was the House determined finally whether the claim ought to be paid out of the Treasury or whether it should be rejected. And I think my venerable friend very well states what was the record of Congress at the time, that the larger the claim rejected by the Court of Claims as arbitrators the surer it was to pass Congress.

I repeat, then, if we want to restore the old order of things and paralyze this court we will adopt the gentleman's amendment. If, on the other hand, we intend that these claims shall be established according to the rules of law and equity in a court which has proved itself above suspicion, subject to review or appeal in all cases in the Supreme Court of the United States, where the amount exceeds $3,000, we will reject the gentleman's proposition. If we cannot trust this tribunal of justice, whom can we trust?

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, in view of the message received from the Senate containing the announcement of the death of a Senator, I move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. STEVENS. Oh, take a vote on this.

Mr. BINGHAM. Yes, take a vote.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, no quorum voted.

Tellers were ordered; and the Chair appointed Messrs. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, and BINGHAM.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 13, noes 36.

So the amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. STEVENS. I move that the committee now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. LAWRENCE, of Pennsylvania, reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, having had under consideration the state of the Union generally, and particularly House bill No. 896, making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending the 30th of June, 1868, had made sundry amendments thereto.

IMPROVEMENT OF CONNECTICUT RIVER.

Mr. DEMING, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire into the expediency of an appropriation by the United States for improving the navigation of the Connecticut river.

FEMALE CLERKS.

Mr. JULIAN, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to inquire into the expediency of authorizing and requiring the appointment of female clerks in the executive department of the Government with definite instructions as to numbers and qualification, and in every case giving precedence to the wives, daughters, mothers, and sisters of soldiers who fought to preserve the Union during the late rebellion.

SAMUEL C. SHEPPARD.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York, asked and obtained leave to withdraw from the files of the House the petition and papers in the case of Samuel C. Sheppard.

NEW ORLEANS RIOTS.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will ask the indulgence of the House to state that the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. DENISON, appointed to fill a vacancy in the select committee to investigate the riots at New Orleans, is now suffering from an attack of illness, and his physician has forbidden him to leave the city. He asks to be excused from serving on the committee. If there be no objection, he will be considered as excused, and the Chair will appoint to fill the vacancy, Mr. BENJAMIN M. BOYER, of Pennsylvania.

No objection was made.

DEATH OF SENATOR WRIGHT.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the Senate:

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
December 17, 1868.

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with deep sensibility the announcement of the death of Hon. WILLIAM WRIGHT, while a Senator in Congress from the State of New Jersey.

Resolved, That as a testimonial of respect for the memory of the deceased, the members of the Senate will wear the usual badge of mourning for thirty days.

Resolved, That these proceedings be communicated to the family of the deceased by the Secretary of the Senate.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased, the Senate do now adjourn.

Ordered, That the Secretary communicate these resolutions to the House of Representatives.

Attest: J. W. FORNEY, Secretary.

Mr. NEWELL. Mr. Speaker, I did not move a consideration of the resolutions of the Senate announcing the death of Senator WRIGHT when received this morning on account of the absence of my colleague from the fifth district, [Mr. WRIGHT,] who was his immediate Representative, and to whom properly belongs the mournful privilege, but as he is still absent and may not be present during the day and further delay be construed into disrespect to the deceased, I move we proceed to the consideration of the resolutions, and I will say in vindication of the apparent neglect of my friend, [General WRIGHT,] that the death was inadvertently announced in the Senate without consultation with the members of the House, and no arrangement was made for any order in the notice of the death. Indeed I learned accidentally that the announcement was transpiring in the Senate on yesterday, and have to regret the lack of proper opportunity to prepare a more suitable obituary of the deceased.

Mr. Speaker, in conformity with an appropriate and impressive usage the Representatives of a great nation pause in the midst of their deliberations to consecrate a day to the memory of a deceased associate and friend, and I crave the indulgence of the House while I occupy a brief period of the time allotted the mournful ceremonies of this occasion to offer my tribute of homage and respect to the memory of one who was an honored citizen and Senator of the State which it is my privilege in part to represent.

Again and again has death invaded these Halls. In the providence of God these frequent visitations come to warn us that we may not hope exemption from the inexorable decree that "in the midst of life we are in death," and that "be ye also ready" is the solemn admonition announced to us from childhood to the grave, in tones not to be misunderstood, by the great and the lowly, as they successively descend into the dark valley of death. The higher the position, the more eminent the character of him we may be called upon to mourn, the more impressive is the lesson designed to be taught and the greater heed should we give to the admonition.

WILLIAM WRIGHT, late Senator from the State of New Jersey, died at his residence in the city of Newark on the 1st day of November last in his seventy-seventh year, after a protracted and distressing illness, in the midst of his own devoted and affectionate household, in the full exercise of his mental faculties, with an abiding and unshaken faith in the Christian religion, and the cherished hope of a blissful immortality.

His father, a physician of great learning and reputation, designed him for one of the professions, and had placed him at a classical school preparatory to a college course, when, suddenly departing this life, the son was thrown upon his own resources, and his necessities compelled him to seek a mechanical occupation which promised earlier and more remunerative returns for his labor.

In 1822 he became a resident of New Jersey, and for many years devoted his entire energies assiduously to business, and rapidly assumed the leading position in trade and commercial circles. He subsequently established branches of his house in all the prominent cities of the South, and became widely known throughout the country as a wealthy and eminently successful manufacturer and merchant.

Upon retiring from active participation in the business of his firm he entered public life, was repeatedly made mayor of his city, was twice elected a Representative in Congress from a district remarkable for the enterprise and intelligence of its citizens, was a candidate for the office of Governor, and twice appointed by the Legislature of his State to a seat in the Senate of the United States. Few men indeed can boast of such a succession of honorable positions. Examples like his will shine out in the pages of our history as beacons to guide American youth to honorable fame. He was the architect of his own fortune. He cleared, by the force of his own strong will and determined hand, the rugged pathway of his early life, and attained an exalted place and high distinction among his fellow-men, with none of the advantages which attach to birth and education, but by application and industry, by an honest and honorable course he formed his own character and distinction, and has left them as a rich inheritance to his descendants, and as an example worthy of imitation.

As a legislator Mr. WRIGHT was diffident and cautious of speech and seldom thrust himself upon the notice of the Senate or House, and indeed rarely rose to speak; but among those who could truly appreciate such qualities his sterling good sense, his practical wisdom, his unerring judgment and tact, did not fail to stamp him as a man who, in many of the qualities that go furthest to constitute worth for the practical duties of legislation, had few equals. His public duties were faithfully performed, and he was ever true to the principles he sought to represent. While he knew no fear or hesitation in the expression of his own political views, he extended the largest tolerance and charity to all who held different sentiments. Indeed his was true charity, striving to do good as he had opportunity and to speak evil of none.

He was possessed of great urbanity of manner and dignity of deportment, and never violated the characteristics of a gentleman in his intercourse with the world; while in all those more intimate and tender relations which bound him to his friends and his kindred he was all that friendship could ask, or affection claim, or humanity or kindness demand, and in that higher and more solemn relation which he bore to the Author of us all he sought to be exact in the duties enjoined by the sacred behests of religion, and in the closing scenes of life's flickering, final hour he leaned with humble trust upon the merits of his Saviour. Calmly he confronted the grim messenger and with Christian dignity resigned him to his fate.

I knew him well, Mr. Speaker, and find a mournful pleasure in paying this just tribute to his memory and his virtues. He has passed through the vicissitudes of a long and eventful life. He has met and manfully fulfilled the duties allotted to him on earth, and left us to follow a little longer the shadows which he has exchanged for unutterable realities. Death came to him in the ripeness of his years, and no stain rests upon his honored name. His life was full of moral beauty, and with mingled feelings of respect we commemorate his virtues and lament his death.

I beg leave to offer for adoption the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the House of Representatives has received with deep sensibility the intelligence of the death of Hon. WILLIAM WRIGHT, late a Senator in Congress from the State of New Jersey.

Resolved, That as a mark of respect for the memory of the deceased, the members and officers of this House will go into mourning by wearing crape on the left arm for thirty days.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect for the memory of the deceased the House do now adjourn.

Mr. SITGREAVES. Mr. Speaker, no event in a land of Christianity and civilization is more solemn or makes a deeper impress on the human mind than death; the song, the jest, the voice, are hushed when we stand around the bed of a fellow-mortal gasping in his last agonies, when the silver cord is being loosed and the golden bowl broken, for it teaches us what we so often forget, that we are mortal, that we too must pass away. It is a sermon from the dead to the living, and impresses us with the truth of the declaration recorded in that Book which bears in itself internal evidence that it was compiled by the Spirit of the Almighty and has its every leaf impressed with His own high and eternal heraldry, that there is, "after death, the judgment."

Sir, the death of every mortal is a sermon to the living, whether that mortal is the infant in the cradle, the young men in the strength of his early manhood, or the old man who has passed his threescore years and ten; whether he dies by disease or pours out his heart's blood on the battle-field, or is stricken down by the assassin; all preach a sermon and teach a lesson to the living. Our young men who fell in battle for the Union by tens of thousands have taught our people and will teach generations yet unborn fidelity to the Union and devotion to the "old flag," the symbol of that Union. The assassination of President Lincoln has taught the nation and the world detestation for the murderer.

The death of WILLIAM WRIGHT, United States Senator from New Jersey, teaches a useful lesson to the young men of the nation. It teaches them to reverence institutions on whose broad platform the son of the poorest day-laborer may stand a peer side by side with the son of the proudest and wealthiest of the land. It teaches them to reverence laws which know no distinction between the poor and the rich, under whose aegis wealth and honor are alike accessible to all. It teaches probity in business transactions. No man ever impeached the integrity of WILLIAM WRIGHT in his business transactions, carried on for more than half a century. It not only teaches that "honesty is the best policy," but it teaches industry and temperance, which were the foundations of his ample fortune. He was not only honest in his private dealings, but his political opponents will concede that he was honest in the maintenance of his political opinions. WILLIAM WRIGHT the Senator, WILLIAM WRIGHT the mechanic, has gone. We remember him as a gentleman who possessed the "suaviter in modo, fortiter in re." The scenes of time have closed on his vision as they will on ours. Peace to his ashes. The Judge of all the earth doeth right.

The resolutions submitted by Mr. NEWELL were unanimously adopted.

And thereupon (at fifteen minutes before four o'clock p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented under the rule, and referred to the appropriate committees: By Mr. BOYER: The petition of William Beale, of Pennsylvania.

By Mr. DAVES: The petition of Hall J. Kelley, of Massachusetts, for a land grant.

By Mr. DONNELLY: The petition of C. C. Webster, S. Wheeler, and others, citizens of Red Wing, Minnesota, asking for an amendment to the Constitution of the United States to the end that no inequality may exist in the laws of any of the States by reason of the birthplace, race, or color of any citizens therein.

Marks, Charles Schuster, and numerous others, residents of the District of Columbia, naturalized citizens of the United States and immigrants who have declared their intention to become citizens, setting forth that inasmuch as Congress has passed a bill granting to the African race the right of suffrage in the District of Columbia, and venturing to believe that the Caucasian immigrant, whose intellect, industry, and wealth have contributed so much to the progress of the country, is just as good, enlightened, and deserving of political privileges as the African just emerged from a state of slavery, and that "the Caucasian immigrant, though white, is a man, possessed of manhood and entitled to manhood suffrage," the memorialists petition Congress to put all white men who are either citizens or have declared their intentions to become citizens on an equal footing with the negroes.

By Mr. KELLEY: A petition of citizens of Lancaster, Pennsylvania, praying for the passage of a law to prevent the contraction of the legal-tender currency, and protesting against the withdrawal of national bank notes from the northern States.

By Mr. PERHAM: The petition of Mrs. Mary M. Polley, widow of J. H. Polley, for pension.

Also, a petition of 5 officers of the United States Army, for an increase of pay.

Also, a resolution of the board of managers of the National Asylum for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, requesting an amendment to the act which created that institution.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, December 19, 1866.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. E. H. GRAY. The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has received and will take this opportunity of laying before the Senate the petition of Gary Davies, of Marietta, Cobb county, Georgia, in which he sets forth that he is sixty-seven years old, has always lived in the Union, has never lifted his hand against the Government or given any aid to this awful rebellion, but on the contrary did all in his power to arrest it until taken violently from his house and confined in prison like a thief and kept there until the Federals came to Atlanta, when he was let out. Then he says the residue of his property was taken by the Federal Army, and he is now stripped of all the comforts of life, and asks Congress for relief. The petition will be received, if there be no objection, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. MORGAN presented the petition of R. W. Griffith, on behalf of himself and other owners, praying for a change of the registry of the bark R. W. Griffith; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. LANE presented the petition of John Carter, praying to be allowed a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. FOGG presented the petition of one hundred and eighty-nine citizens of the town of Dover, New Hampshire, praying for an amendment to the Constitution of the United States abolishing all distinctions in privileges on account of birth, race, or color; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. CATTELL presented a petition of manufacturers of silk cloths, ribbons, bindings, braids, and trimming goods, silk throwsters, dyers, and dealers, praying for a specific duty on thrown silk and silk cloths of every description, or an increase of the present rate of ad valorem duty; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. FESSENDEN presented the memorial of railroad companies, praying for a reduction of the import duty on iron rails used for railroads to one half of a cent per pound in gold; on steel rails for railroads to one cent per pound in gold; on iron tires and axles to one half of a cent per pound in gold; on steel tires and axles to one cent per pound in gold; and on all frogs, crossings, and plates made of steel and used exclusively for railroads to one cent per pound in gold; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a petition of citizens of Pennsylvania, praying for the enactment of a law to prevent the contraction of the legal-tender currency and also to prohibit the withdrawal of national bank notes from the North to be given to the South; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. TRUMBULL, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 874) to regulate the duties of the Clerk of the House of Representatives in preparing for the organization of the House, and for other purposes, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 69) to provide for the payment of pensions, which was returned from the House of Representatives with an amendment, have instructed me to report it back to the Senate with an amendment to the House amendment. It is desirable to have action on the bill now, if there be no objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Reports from committees are still in order.

Mr. HARRIS, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 880) to fix the times for the regular meetings of Congress, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. MORGAN, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the petition of the marine underwriters in the city of New York, praying for an appropriation of money sufficient to remove the iron steamship Scotland wrecked on the bar outside of Sandy Hook, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Commerce; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of weighers of the customs in the port and district of New York, praying for an increase of compensation, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, the subject having been acted upon during the last session of Congress; which was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the memorial of the Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York, praying that the contents of documents formerly existing in the office of the clerk of the United States court for the southern district of Mississippi and which have been lost or destroyed by fire, may be proved by parol proof or by a copy thereof when offered in evidence, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. The same committee have had under consideration in connection with this memorial the bill (S. No. 464) in relation to the records and other papers in the office of the clerk of the United States court for the southern district of Mississippi which have been lost or destroyed, and have instructed me to report that the same ought not to pass. In the judgment of the committee, the passage of this bill would make no difference in the law. The committee are of the opinion that parol proof is admissible now to establish the existence and contents of such documents, and therefore no legislation is necessary.

Mr. MORRILL, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 470) to authorize the change of a name, reported it without amendment.

PRINTING OF FINANCE REPORT.

Mr. ANTHONY. The Committee on Printing, to whom was referred a resolution to print five thousand additional copies of the annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury, have instructed me to report it back without amendment and recommend its passage; and I ask for its present consideration.

There being no objection, the resolution was considered and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That five thousand additional copies of the annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury on the state of the finances be printed for the use of the Senate.

PRINTING OF LAND OFFICE MAPS.

Mr. ANTHONY. The Committee on Printing, to whom was referred a resolution to print ten thousand copies of the maps accompanying the report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office and a resolution to print additional copies of the report itself, have instructed me to report them back with a verbal statement. These resolutions came from the Committee on Public Lands, who have recommended them, and I do not know why the matter was referred to us afterward unless to ascertain the cost of the printing. We are not a supervising committee over the Committee on Public Lands, and I think the matter ought to have passed under the consideration of the Committee on Foreign Relations, as have all other matters connected with the Paris Exposition. The cost of the proposed printing will be about thirty-six thousand dollars, supposing the translations to be furnished to the printer.

Mr. RAMSEY. What do you report?

Mr. ANTHONY. We report the resolutions back with this statement. They have been recommended by the Committee on Public Lands, and I suppose the Senate will be disposed to act on the recommendation of that committee. The Committee on Printing are not advised as to the desirableness of this publication. The Committee on Public Lands and the Committee on Foreign Relations ought to be.

Mr. STEWART. What action do the Committee on Printing recommend?

Mr. ANTHONY. We report the matter back without any recommendation, leaving it to stand on the recommendation of the Committee on Public Lands. If the printing is to be done, it is rather desirable that the resolutions should be acted on before the holidays, because the type of the Commissioner's report is now standing, although that is a very small part of the expense. The great expense is the maps.

Mr. STEWART. The Committee on Public Lands were unanimously of the opinion that it was desirable to make this publication if the expense was not too enormous, and we supposed the Committee on Printing might give us some information on that point.

Mr. ANTHONY. That is just what we have done. We have had an estimate made of the expense. It will cost about thirty-six thousand dollars to print the maps and about two thousand dollars to print the report.

Mr. GRIMES. I will inquire if the proposition does not provide that this report shall be published in various languages?

Mr. ANTHONY. It does.

Mr. GRIMES. Has the Joint Committee on Printing made any calculation as to the expense of translating it into the languages specified?

Mr. ANTHONY. We understand that the translations will be made in the office of the Commissioner of the General Land Office; that he has some clerks capable of making the translations.

Mr. GRIMES. Does the $36,000 include the expense of printing the report in the various languages? The type will all have to be reset, I suppose.

Mr. ANTHONY. Thirty-six thousand dollars is the cost of the maps. Those will be printed in only one language, I presume. The cost of printing the reading matter will be about two thousand dollars, printing ten thousand copies.

Mr. GRIMES. In each language?

Mr. ANTHONY. No, it would cost $2,000 to print ten thousand copies in one language. I suppose to set it up twice might cost four or five hundred dollars additional. The great expense is in paper and press work. Five hundred dollars would probably cover all the additional expense of this being printed in additional languages, an equal number of copies, the translations being furnished to the printer.

Mr. RAMSEY. What is the objection to proceeding with the consideration of the resolution now?

Mr. ANTHONY. I have none.

Mr. RAMSEY. I move, then, that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the resolution.

Mr. ANTHONY. There are two resolutions. The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It requires unanimous consent to consider the resolutions at this time. They will be read for information.

The Secretary read the resolutions, as follows:

Resolved, That ten thousand copies of the maps accompanying the late report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office be printed for the use of the Senate.

Resolved, That ten thousand additional copies of the report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office be printed for the use of the Senate.

Mr. RAMSEY. I thought there was a resolution specifying that the report should be printed in the German, French, and other languages.

Mr. ANTHONY. These are the only resolutions that came to us.

Mr. RAMSEY. Then we had better let this matter pass over informally.

Mr. STEWART. I think so, until the report of the Committee on Public Lands on that point is found. The chairman of that committee made a report.

Mr. ANTHONY. That report is here.

Mr. RAMSEY and Mr. STEWART. Let that report be read.

The Secretary read the following report which had been submitted by Mr. POMEROY:

"The Committee on Public Lands to whom were referred the orders and resolutions of the Senate referring to the printing of the report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, have had the same under consideration, and believing that the publication of said report in the leading languages of Europe and the distribution of the same at the Paris Universal Exposition would promote immigration and the development of the public lands of the United States, would respectfully recommend that they be printed in the following ratio: five thousand copies in the German language, five thousand in the French language, five thousand in the Swedish language, and five thousand for the use of the Senate."

Mr. ANTHONY. I must confess that I have made this report very carelessly. There were two resolutions in the report, and I based the remarks that I made upon an edition of ten thousand copies which would cost $36,000 with the maps, twenty thousand would cost almost double that; and so to print five thousand copies in four languages with the maps will cost about eighty thousand dollars.

Mr. STEWART. How much without the maps?

Mr. ANTHONY. About eight thousand dollars and the cost of translating, whatever that may be. The maps are very expensive. They have to be got up by hand, a great many of them.

Mr. STEWART. The maps are very desirable.

Mr. HOWE. I believe I drew those resolutions myself, and I beg to say that in the resolution proposing the printing of the report for distribution in foreign countries, I did not contemplate the printing of those maps which accompany the report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office. I did think it desirable that those maps should be printed for circulation in this country, for I believe they are very important; but I do not think they are as peculiarly important for distribution abroad. The report itself seems to me to contain a great deal of information which we ought to send abroad, which would be very useful in securing immigration to this country; and as the expense of translating it I understood would be nothing to the Government and the expense of printing would be trivial, I thought it proper to offer the resolution; but in drawing that resolution I did not contemplate the printing of the maps for foreign distribution, and I do not think the language of the resolution covers that, but I may be mistaken about that.

Mr. SUMNER. I should like to know what provision is made for the distribution of these copies. It is proposed to print this report in foreign languages; but how are copies to be circulated? Through what agency?

Mr. STEWART. The Committee on Public Lands proposed to circulate them through our agency at Paris at the Paris Exposition.

Mr. SUMNER. The resolution does not seem to make any such direct provision.

Mr. STEWART. The report provides for that. There is no resolution to meet the exact condition of things; but the report made by the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands provides for that.

Mr. RAMSEY. I think the Land Office will take upon themselves to make the distribution in the manner suggested. There is no objection, I imagine, to giving directions in the resolution.

Mr. SUMNER. I was going to remark that it seems to me if we are going to make this expenditure, we ought to see the end of it; in other words, we ought to see what good it is going to do and the agency by which this distribution is to be accomplished. The Senator from Minnesota suggests that we refer it to the Land Office. I doubt whether that would be the most direct way. We might refer it to the Department of State which is in communication with foreign countries. We might refer it directly to the Commissioner of the United States at the Paris Exposition, empowering him, in his discretion, to distribute it among the representatives of foreign countries and the visitors of foreign countries that he may meet at Paris. I merely throw this out by way of suggestion.

Mr. RAMSEY. I suggest to the Senator from Massachusetts that many of the western States have agents in Europe to stimulate immigration, and I have no doubt that they would assist the Land Office in the proper distribution of these documents. I imagine there would be no difficulty in distributing them properly and in an unexpensive way.

Mr. ANTHONY. I suggest, as there seems to be some confusion about this matter, that the Senators who have it particularly in charge, the Senator from Nevada and the Senator from Minnesota, draw up a resolution stating precisely what they want, how many with maps, how many in each language, and then it can be introduced and we can discuss it and there will be no necessity for its reference; and with that resolution before me I can give the Senate what information they desire in regard to the expense of printing.

Mr. RAMSEY. Very well; let this matter pass over, then, for the present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolutions will be laid over informally.

VOLUNTEER ARMY REGISTER.

Mr. ANTHONY. Now, I should like to call up the joint resolution which was laid on the table on Monday, reported from the Committee on Military Affairs, to instruct the Superintendent of Public Printing to suspend the publication of the Volunteer Army Register. I should like to have it taken up and recommitment to the Committee on Military Affairs. I will state with regard to it that it was ordered to be printed in eight parts, fifty thousand copies, with the idea of selling it. Four parts have been printed, but as it was stereotyped it was not necessary to print the whole at once, and the Superintendent of Public Printing very wisely printed an edition of only five thousand copies of the first four volumes, and is now only printing one thousand of the last. The sales have amounted to $200. The proposition in the resolution which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs was, that the Superintendent of Public Printing should present a plan which would be much cheaper, and that the work should be edited with more accuracy. The publication of this work on the plan of the resolutions under which the Superintendent of Public Printing is now acting and by which he is bound, unless this resolution passes, will cost $200,000, and when it is finished it will be worth just the price of old paper, six or eight cents a pound. It seems to me it is a terrible waste of public money for a book of that kind published with such imperfections. Not only is there the great legitimate expense of publication, but four out of five of the plates that have been stereotyped have been canceled and reset. I think we had better wait until the War Department can give us a fair copy of the roster, which I think will be a very valuable thing to print then and worth the cost of it, although it ought not to cost anything like this sum. I move, therefore, that the resolution be taken up and recommitment to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Rhode Island moves to take from the table the joint resolution (S. No. 83) respecting the publication of the volunteer Army Register and to recommit it to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

CHARLES CLARK.

Mr. JOHNSON. I am instructed by the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. No. 146) for the relief of Charles Clark, marshal of the United States for the district of Maine, to report it with an amendment; and I ask for its present consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It requires the unanimous consent of the Senate to consider the resolution on the day it is reported. Is there any objection?

Mr. SUMNER. What is the resolution?

Mr. JOHNSON. I will state that the resolution proposes to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to credit Mr. Clark with the sum of $3,028 of public funds in his hands as United States marshal for the district of Maine, which were in his office at the custom-house in Portland at the time of the great fire there last summer, and were destroyed. The fact that the money was there and that it was destroyed is very well established by the two witnesses who have testified, and their character is vouched for by the honorable Senator from Maine, [Mr. FESSENDEN.] I suppose, therefore, the Senate will have no objection to considering the resolution at once.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

The amendment reported by the Committee on the Judiciary was to strike out all of the resolution after the enacting clause and to insert in lieu thereof the following:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized, in the settlement of the accounts of Charles Clark, marshal of the United States for the district of Maine, to allow him credit for such sum of public money as was in his charge as marshal, not to exceed $3,028, as he may be satisfied was burned.

in said marshal's office in the custom-house building at Portland, Maine, on the 4th day of July last.

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in. The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

REPORT OF COLUMBIAN INSTITUTION.

Mr. MORRILL. The Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred a resolution authorizing the engraving of the drawings accompanying the annual report of the Columbian Institution for the Deaf and Dumb, have directed me to report it back and recommend its passage; and as it is a very short matter, I ask for its present consideration.

There being no objection, the resolution was considered and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Public Printer be, and he is hereby, directed to cause to be engraved the drawings accompanying the annual report of the Columbian Institution for the Deaf and Dumb; and he is also directed to print for the use of the institution one thousand additional copies of said report, inserting therein, as well as in the copies already printed, impressions of the drawings above ordered.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. WILLIAMS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce the following bills; which were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands:

A bill (S. No. 481) granting lands to the State of Oregon, to aid in the construction of a military road and telegraph line through the coast mountains from Portland to Astoria; and

A bill (S. No. 482) granting lands to the State of Oregon to aid in the construction of a military and post road through the coast mountains from Astoria to Tillamook.

Mr. POMEROY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 483) to equalize the value of the currency of the United States; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. HOWE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 150) extending the time for the completion of the improvement of the Fox and Wisconsin rivers; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. EDMUNDS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 151) appropriating money to defray the expenses of the joint select committee on retrenchment; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. ROSS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 152) relating to the government of the States lately in rebellion; which was read twice by its title, and ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

INDIAN BUREAU PURCHASES.

Mr. WILSON submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be directed to report, for the information of the Senate, what goods have been purchased in open market for the Indian Bureau since the 1st day of August last, said report to specify in detail the number or quantity of articles purchased, the prices paid or agreed to be paid therefor, and the names of the party or parties from whom the same were purchased.

The Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I think the Senator perhaps had better carry his inquiry back a little further, say for the past year.

Mr. WILSON. I have no objection to that.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I move, then, to amend the resolution by striking out "1st day of August" and inserting "1st day of January."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON. I will simply say that I have offered this resolution for the purpose of obtaining certain information from the Department, and I intend in a day or two to offer a resolution calling upon the Committee on Indian Affairs to make an investigation into purchases made by the Indian Bureau.

The resolution, as amended, was agreed to.

PARIS EXPOSITION.

Mr. SUMNER. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of State is hereby requested to communicate to the Senate such information as he may possess in respect to the progress made in collecting the products, and also the weights and measures and coins of the United States, for exhibition at the Universal Exposition at Paris in April next.

I will remark merely that I have reason to believe this resolution will draw forth some information that will be interesting to the Senate and to the country.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

LIBRARIAN'S REPORT.

Mr. CRESWELL submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That the usual number of copies of the report of the Librarian of Congress for the present year be printed for the information of the Senate, and five hundred copies extra for the use of the Library.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 876) making appropriations and to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1867, and for other purposes.

The message further announced that the House had passed the following bill and joint resolution, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 910) granting lands to the State of Oregon to aid in the construction of a military wagon-road from Dalles City, on the Columbia river, to Fort Boise, on the Snake river; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 221) authorizing certain medals to be distributed to honorably discharged soldiers free of postage.

The message further announced that the House had passed the bill (S. No. 62) to amend an act entitled "An act granting lands to the State of Oregon to aid in the construction of a military road from Eugene City to the eastern boundary of said State."

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker had signed the enrolled bill (H. R. No. 876) making appropriations and to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1867, and for other purposes; and it was signed by the President pro tempore.

IMMIGRATION OF CHINESE.

Mr. WILLIAMS submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Foreign Relations be instructed to inquire into the expediency of regulating or restricting the immigration and importation of Chinese into the United States.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I offer this resolution at this time with the view of calling the attention of Congress and the country to the subject to which it refers. Since the first discovery of gold in California the Chinese in considerable numbers have immigrated to the Pacific coast. They come there not to be citizens of the country, not to learn to speak our language, to profess our religion, to adopt our customs, manners, and habits, but they come there to be a people unto themselves and to maintain their attachment to the religions and the Government under which they were born.

I do not undertake to say that any particular harm has yet resulted from their presence on the Pacific coast; but new facilities for their immigration have recently been created, and no doubt will be increased, and some great inducement may arise which will pour clouds of Chinese from the millions who inhabit the country where they now live upon the Pacific coast like locusts upon the land of Egypt. I think that it is not safe to despise "the day of small things" in reference to this matter, and it is much easier now to deal with the subject than it will be when it assumes more formidable proportions. I hope, therefore, that the committee will give the subject that attention which its importance seems to demand.

The resolution was agreed to.

HYDRATION OF AIR.

Mr. BUCKALEW submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Sergeant-at-Arms be authorized to take such immediate steps for the hydration of the air of the Senate Chamber as can be conveniently secured under the existing arrangements for the introduction of air.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. BUCKALEW. This is to enable our appropriate officer to take the steps contemplated for the hydration of the air of the Senate Chamber. Last session when the general subject of ventilation was before the Senate it was contemplated that what is now proposed should be done in the recess; but the measure which was then proposed by the committee on that subject failed in the committee of conference between the two Houses and the subject has not been attended to. I suppose we can mitigate the material defect during the coming holiday recess; I mean in the particular contemplated by the resolution.

I hold in my hand a volume, a book the cover of which exhibits the existing character of the air in our Chamber at this moment, its extreme aridity. The relative humidity of the air of this Chamber at the present is probably about twenty-five or thirty degrees, whereas it ought to be some sixty or seventy degrees. We take the air with the external temperature pretty nearly at the freezing point, when it is almost entirely destitute of moisture: we convey it through a closed passage and heat it up to a temperature of seventy or seventy-five degrees, when it demands between three and four times the amount of moisture which it contained when we commenced the proceeding upon it: we have never had any means of imparting that. I suppose, sir, our Sergeant-at-Arms at all events can mitigate the existing difficulty by turning on the steam, a moderate amount and at a moderate velocity. At all events I propose that he shall try some experiments to reduce in this one particular the existing defects in our ventilation.

The resolution was agreed to.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bill and joint resolution from the House of Representatives were severally read twice by their titles, and referred as indicated below:

A bill (H. R. No. 910) granting lands to the State of Oregon to aid in the construction of a military wagon-road from Dalles City, on the Columbia river, to Fort Boise on the Snake river—to the Committee on Public Lands.

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 221) authorizing certain medals to be distributed to honorably discharged soldiers free of postage—to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 553) to amend section two of an act entitled "An act to authorize the Legislatures of the States of Illinois and Tennessee to sell the lands heretofore appropriated for the use of schools in those States," in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

MILWAUKEE AND ROCK RIVER CANAL.

Mr. HOWE. I move to take up the joint resolution (S. R. No. 102) construing and giving effect to the joint resolution entitled "A resolution for the relief of the State of Wisconsin," approved July 1, 1864.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending question is on a motion to reconsider the vote passing this joint resolution.

Mr. GRIMES. Let it be read that we may know what it is.

The Secretary read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the resolution entitled "A resolution for the relief of the State of Wisconsin," dated July 1st, 1864, be so construed as to entitle the Milwaukee and Rock River Canal Company to reimbursement, out of the canal land fund therein mentioned, for the amounts which are proved to have been paid out by it for interest in carrying on the work mentioned in said former resolution in the same manner as for others by it expended. Also for the amount which is proved to have been expended by it in necessary repairs and management of the canal after the date of said resolution but before the date of the settlement made thereunder: Provided only, That said company shall not receive more than the amount of the residue of the trust fund arising from the sale of the canal lands charged against said State in said settlement and not heretofore paid over to said company; and the Secretary of the Department of the Interior shall complete the settlement by making said further allowances to said company up to the amount of said residue of said canal lands fund, and the same shall be paid to said company out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I entered the motion to reconsider the passage of this resolution. It came from the Judiciary Committee and was reported favorably by a majority of that committee. There was a difference of opinion in the committee, and I was of the minority opposed to the passage of the joint resolution. I thought it ought not to pass. It is a private claim which takes $25,000 out of the Treasury of the United States, and, as I thought, without the shadow of a claim on the part of this canal company. The reason for entering the motion to reconsider was that the joint resolution passed without consideration in the Senate. I was not present at the time and I thought the attention of the Senate ought to be called to the facts of the case; and if it be possible to get its attention for a few minutes, I will try to state the case as I understand it, and then if the Senate think proper not to reconsider it of course the bill will stand as passed.

The facts of the case, the precise particulars of them, are not in my mind at this moment, but I can state generally what they are. Some years ago—the dates I shall not now be enabled to give, but they are immaterial—the United States made a grant of land to the then Territory of Wisconsin for the purpose of making an improvement in that Territory. The Territory of Wisconsin turned the lands over to a company organized in that Territory. That company undertook to make the improvement. As is often the case, they failed; they did not make the improvement, but used up the lands and got into a controversy with the State of Wisconsin in regard to the accounts between this company and the State of Wisconsin, with which the Government of the United States had nothing to do any more than she had granted the lands to make the improvement on the condition that this improvement was to be made. Some few years ago the Government of the United States was applied to to settle this matter between this company and the State of Wisconsin; and against my opinion at the time the United States was brought in to make the settlement. The State of Wisconsin was to be charged for these lands at a sum not exceeding $1 25 an acre, I think.

Mr. HOWE. What we got for them.

Mr. TRUMBULL. What you got for them, provided it, should not be less than that; for if I recollect the State was charged $1 25 an acre, and the matter was to be settled by some officer of the Government, the Commissioner of the General Land Office, I think. The State was charged the $1 25 an acre, and there was to be allowed to this company the money that they had actually expended in making the improvement; and the Commissioner went on to make up the account, allowing to the company what they had actually expended. In making up that account he refused to allow the company interest. The company in going on with the work, which they failed to complete, had borrowed money at extravagant rates of interest, and they claimed that the United States should allow them those extravagant rates of interest that they had paid to get money to go on with the work.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour having expired, it becomes the duty of the Chair to call up the unfinished business of yesterday.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I have only a few words to say on this joint resolution. I have no wish to take up time further than is necessary to enable the Senate to understand the case. I think I shall get through in five minutes.

Mr. WADE. Some one will want to reply.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I shall not persist.

Mr. WADE. Let us go on with the regular business.

ADMISSION OF NEBRASKA.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 456) for the admission of the State of Nebraska into the Union, the pending question being on the amendment proposed by Mr. COWAN to the amendment submitted by Mr. BROWN.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. President, as the honorable chairman of the Committee on Territories announced to us yesterday his purpose to bring the Senate to a final vote upon this bill to-day if practicable, I shall endeavor to condense the remarks I have to make into as small a compass as possible. I hope, sir, we shall be able to take a final vote to-day. Time is not only flying but precious. We have a great number of bills of the highest importance now pending before the Senate which, in my judgment, ought to be acted upon at the present session, not to speak of those bills which are likely to be introduced.

Mr. President, in April, 1864, now well on toward three years ago, Congress passed an act to enable the people of the Territory of Nebraska to form a constitution and State government and for the admission of that Territory with that people into the Union as a State of the Union. At the same session Congress also passed an act authorizing the people of the Territory of Colorado to form a State government, promising them also admittance into the Union. It seems that the people of neither of these Territories complied in point of time with the requisitions of the respective acts.

But it is not alleged, and I believe it cannot be truthfully alleged, that the people of either have deviated from the requirements of the respective acts in any other respect, and I do not understand from the objections that come from any quarter in the Senate that the deviation in respect to time is insisted upon. Congress knew quite well at the time they passed those two acts, what was the number of the population in each. The very fact that they passed those acts is a conclusive answer to the objection that the population of the Territories was not sufficiently numerous. We took that question into consideration nearly three years ago; we received full and satisfactory information upon that point, and we deliberately enacted that the population in each of those Territories was at that time sufficient to justify us in imparting to them the faculty of forming a State government and for them to act upon that permission. There is no complaint here that the people of those Territories have not complied substantially with those acts.

At the last session of Congress the President of the United States sent to us the constitution which had been formed by the people of Colorado, not in strict accordance with the enabling act, but deviating from the requirements of that act only in respect to time.

The President laid the constitution of Colorado before Congress; and he asked for it the consideration of Congress. It is very true that he did not recommend the acceptance of that constitution by Congress, but he went so far as to submit it to our consideration; and there arose a very fair implication that, in doing thus, he pledged himself that if Congress should be satisfied with this constitution and with the proceedings that led to it he would approve the act of admission; for he certainly could not have been guilty of attempting to play upon Congress the practical joke of passing upon the constitution of Colorado, while at the same time he was satisfied in his own mind it ought not to receive their sanction. I cannot believe that even the present locum tenens of the presidential office would have done an act in its nature so idle, so trifling; yet he returned to us the bill admitting Colorado into the Union with his objections, and strange to say, although he had submitted this instrument to our consideration asking us to legislate upon it, he included among his objections to that constitution and to the admission of Colorado, the alleged fact that the population of the Territory was not sufficient in numbers, and that the proceedings which led to the formation of its constitution were irregular and not in accordance with the act of 1864.

At the last session of Congress we also passed a bill admitting Nebraska into the Union as a State and under the same constitution which is now before us, the result of similar proceedings in that Territory. Unfortunately, however, for the bill and the people of Nebraska, it was not presented to the President in season to make it necessary for him to return it to the Senate before the final adjournment of that body; he pocketed the bill. He applied to it what used to be known in old whig times as "the pocket veto." He did not return it at all to that body in which it originated; on account of the nearness of the adjournment of Congress.

Congress have thus with great unanimity already passed upon the objections which have been raised to this present bill. They have said that Colorado is fit to be admitted into the Union under the constitution she has framed. They have also said that Nebraska is equally entitled to be admitted under the constitution her people have framed. I consider that the objections on the ground of irregularity in the proceedings and upon the ground of the alleged insufficiency of the population are foreclosed. We are practically estopped from insisting upon these objections. We have passed upon them. It seems to me that it is not exactly in the spirit of good faith for us now to insist upon objections which we have heretofore overruled. The main conditions imposed by Congress upon these Territories are the following:

"The constitution when formed shall be republican and not repugnant to the Constitution of the United States and the principles of the Declaration of Independence." * * *

"That said convention shall provide, by an ordinance irrevocable without the consent of the United States and the people of said State:

"1. That there shall be neither slavery nor involuntary servitude in the said State, otherwise than in the punishment of crimes whereof the party shall have been duly convicted.

"2. That perfect toleration of religious sentiment shall be secured, and no inhabitant of said State shall ever be molested in person or property on account of his or her mode of religious worship."

Then follows the usual clause contained in the acts of Congress for the admission of new States, prohibiting them from interfering with the primary disposition of the public lands lying within their limits by Congress.

All these conditions are fully and fairly met and performed by the terms of the ordinance they have passed.

Now, sir, is this State constitution presented to us by the people of Nebraska in accordance with the Declaration of Independence? My honorable friend from Massachusetts, my honorable friend from Missouri object that this constitution is not in accordance with the principles of that Declaration. I deem it hardly worth while to enter into a discussion of that question, but I will venture to say a few words upon it.

It is insisted by these gentlemen that in order to bring this constitution within the terms of the condition here prescribed, and to make it accord with the principles of the Declaration of Independence, it ought to contain a provision allowing all persons, without distinction of color, to exercise the right of voting; and the honorable Senator from Missouri has presented to us an amendment which is based upon that idea. With great respect for the opinions of my learned friend from Massachusetts and for those of my friend from Missouri, I must be allowed to take issue with them. I assert that there is nothing in the Declaration of Independence or in the principles of that Declaration which, when properly understood, require any State or any Territory to permit all persons without distinction of color to vote. There is not in that Declaration one word upon that subject nor any intimation that such is the proper construction of any of its provisions or any of its language. It is said that the Declaration declares that "all men are created equal," and hence it is sought to draw the inference that if one man of a white complexion is permitted to vote, it is equally the right of the colored man to do the same thing, because he, like the white man, has been created by our common Creator and is the equal of the white man in respect to rights.

I deny the correctness of the inference. I deny that the right to vote is one of those rights referred to by Mr. Jefferson, who penned the Declaration. The elective franchise is a privilege granted by the community to such of its members as a majority shall see fit. It is not one of the rights given us by nature. It is not the same as the right to breathe the air, without which we must instantly perish. It is not the same as the right to drink the water that falls from the sky, or that runs down the limpid stream, without which we should also perish. It is not in any sense, according to my judgment, a natural, inalienable right. It is not the right of liberty even; not one of those inalienable rights referred to in the Declaration, conferred upon all men in virtue of their creation, but a conventional right, to be granted or withheld as society may deem best; one which has always been treated as such; one which cannot and does not exist without law, without a law founded on the will of the people in a republican government; that is, of the majority of the people; for the will of the majority of the people is the very foundation, the essence of republican government.

The people of Nebraska have not seen fit to incorporate in their constitution a provision allowing colored persons to vote; and I do not think, for the reasons I have given, that they have in this respect violated this condition prescribed in the enabling act. They have done exactly what other Territories have done thus far. There is no case in which, when passing from a territorial condition into that of a State, the people of a Territory have incorporated in their constitution a provision granting to colored people or Indians the right to vote. So far as respects our previous history and our previous legislation this principle is a complete anomaly, and I for one do not feel that we ought at this critical moment, when public interests of the greatest magnitude are pressing upon us, to delay the admission of these two Territories into the Union as States on account of any such abstraction as here stares us in the face.

These Territories have fairly and substantially complied with all the conditions imposed upon them. We have not imposed upon them the condition which is now insisted upon. We have omitted it; we have waived it by the enabling act and by the passage of the bills during the last session; and it strikes me as being a departure from that uberrima fides which should govern the action of Congress in its relations with the Territories of the United States and their people now to insist upon this new condition. We are bound, as I have said, by good faith, by the legislation which we have passed, upon the compliance of these people with the terms we have prescribed, to permit them to enter the Union.

The Senator from Missouri has resorted to a principle in his amendment which to my mind is rather a dangerous one. He makes the admission of the colored man to the elective franchise a fundamental condition to the admission of the Territory of Nebraska as a State, and irrevocable. There is no mistaking the language of his amendment. It says—

"That this act shall not take effect except upon the fundamental condition that within the State of Nebraska there shall be no denial of the elective franchise or of any other right to any person by reason of race or color, and upon the further condition that this fundamental condition shall be submitted to the voters of the Territory at an election to be held on the 1st day of _____ next."

I shall not deny that under the clause of the Constitution which authorizes Congress to admit new States, it is competent for them to prescribe conditions for their admission. The power is given to us in the broadest terms. We may admit upon condition, or we may admit absolutely without condition. I can entertain no doubt about the power to prescribe conditions for the admission of a new State; but it must be understood at the same time that the only conditions which it is possible in the nature of things for Congress to prescribe are conditions precedent, to be performed not after the people have become a State of the Union but before they have become such. They are mere obstacles thrown in the way of the enjoyment of the full and complete rights of the State.

The thing which Congress is authorized to do, the great object to be attained, is single and indivisible, and that is the admission of the State into the Union. It cannot escape the attention of the Senator from Missouri or the Senator from Massachusetts, that after the compliance of the people of a Territory with a condition precedent, such as this present amendment is in legal effect, it is entirely competent for the people of the State, after they have become such, to annul and set aside this condition or rather the thing which has been accomplished by the performance of the condition precedent. In other words, no one will deny that after the Territory has come into the Union and been vested with all the powers, privileges, and franchises belonging to a State of the Union under the Constitution, it is entirely competent for the people of that State to undo what they did as the people of the Territory; and in the present instance, if they saw fit to do so—I have no apprehension that they would—it would be perfectly competent I say for them to call together a convention and declare that none but white persons shall be allowed to exercise the elective franchise. The people of Nebraska in twenty-four hours after they shall have been admitted under this constitution, with this amendment attached to it, might assemble in convention and repeal that clause of their constitution which gave to the colored man the right to vote. Can anybody doubt it? The right to regulate the franchise is a political right which has ever belonged to the States as corporations. It is indubitably one of the reserved rights of the States, and thus far Congress has not attempted to interfere with it. Every State, from the old thirteen inclusive down to the last new State admitted into the Union, has ever exercised this right, and there are now not less than ten free States of this Union whose constitutions or laws exclude the colored man from the exercise of the precious privilege. I refer to this fact, not in justification of the exclusion of colored men from this great right, but as a fact showing what has been up to this moment, undoubtedly and indisputably, one of the reserved rights of the States.

Well, sir, is the State of Michigan less respectable at this day than she would have been if her constitution had not contained just such a restrictive clause as this? Is Ohio less so? Is Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Indiana, Illinois, Wisconsin, Minnesota, and all the other States whose constitutions contain this restrictive clause, to incur the interference of Congress and the denunciation of those respected Senators? The right to regulate the franchise is with the States. I hope to live to see the day—and I expect to reach that age, and then not be a very old gentleman—when every State in this Union by its own free consent will allow the same privilege of voting to the black man as is now enjoyed by the white man. I think it will be a great step forward; and in reference to the state of things in the rebel States, I confess I see no other permanent and effectual remedy for the disorders of the times brought about by the rebellion. I think we shall never have complete peace and quietude until this great end is attained. At the same time, after the most mature consideration of the subject which I have been able to bestow, I have shrunk, as did the joint committee of fifteen during the last session, from attempting to incorporate into the amendment of the Constitution of the United States a clause giving this right in terms to the colored man.

Mr. BROWN: Will the Senator allow me to ask a question?

Mr. HOWARD: Certainly.

Mr. BROWN: I desire to ask the Senator, for the purpose of getting at his opinion, because I wish to deal fairly in this discussion, whether in affirming that the States have an exclusive control over the whole question of the right of franchise, I understand him to take the position that if any State in the Union, by its limitation upon the franchise, shall destroy the republican form of the Government, the United States have not got the right to interpose and guarantee and protect that republican form to that State.

Mr. HOWARD: Well, sir, "sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof." When such a state of things shall present itself for our consideration it will be quite time, in my judgment, to act upon it.

Mr. BROWN: I do not think that is a fair answer to the question. The Senator is professing to discuss a constitutional question, a constitutional power, and here is an illustration under one of those constitutional clauses which gives to the Government of the United States a protectorate over the States in certain instances. He claims that the States have the right to govern this whole question of suffrage. Now, I ask him if the States in controlling suffrage impair the republican form of the Government, has not the United States got a constitutional power to come in and interpose?

Mr. HOWARD: Mr. President, the Constitution of the United States declares that Congress shall guaranty to every State in this Union a republican form of government. That is the power, I suppose, to which the Senator from Missouri alludes. When it shall be made manifest to me as a member of this body that there is in any State in this Union a form of government which is not republican, I shall be ready to apply the remedy which is guaranteed by that instrument; but I must at the same time say to the Senator from Missouri that I do not believe that that clause of the Constitution authorizes Congress to pass a law, in reference to any State in this Union giving to the black people or any other class of people of that State the right to vote. In other words, I do not hold that the exclusion of the black race from the right of voting is such a departure from the principles or forms of a republican government as would authorize Congress to interfere. Sir, the whole history of the Government from the time of its formation down to the present moment is a standing, unmistakable contradiction of this assumption of the gentleman from Missouri. That is all the reply which at the present time I have to make to the query of the honorable Senator.

I hold that this constitution of Nebraska is republican in form, that it embodies republican principles, and that in this respect it is a complete compliance with the enabling act of 1864.

In the course of the debate upon the present bill a remark fell from the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] upon a collateral subject and a subject of very great importance. I understood that honorable Senator to declare that Congress at the last session "proposed" to the rebel States, that if they would ratify the amendment of the Constitution proposed by Congress at the last session, they should be respectively readmitted into the Union, and permitted to participate in legislation in the two Houses of Congress. Doubtless, Mr. President, the honorable Senator said what he really believed to be the truth, for I should be very reluctant to have it inferred that I impute to him the slightest insincerity upon a question so grave and so momentous as this.

That statement has often been made, not very frequently, I believe, in Congress, but very frequently during the congressional canvass and in the various journals of the country. I take this occasion, so far as I am concerned, to contradict it. Congress have never proposed to the insurgent States that if they would adopt the present amendment of the Constitution they should be readmitted as States of the Union to a full participation in the legislation of Congress. At the last session, after the most mature deliberation, we saw fit to propose an additional article to the Constitution, which upon being ratified by three fourths of the States—of course I mean three fourths of the States in the Union and not out of the Union—it should become a part of the Constitution of the country. But neither the committee of fifteen nor either House of Congress, so far as my memory serves, has ever made such a proposition as that the rebel States shall be readmitted upon their ratification of this amendment.

Mr. NORTON. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Michigan if he did not in the city of St. Paul last fall urge and argue to the people there that, upon the adoption of the amendment proposed at the last session, the rebel States would obtain representation, and that that would be a settlement of the question of reconstruction.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. President, I understand the question of the honorable Senator from Minnesota. I know not what report of my speech he may have seen, but I am ready to say now that I did not make any such statement. If I was so understood, I was greatly misunderstood.

Mr. NORTON. I will state to the honorable Senator, with his permission, that he was so reported and that the authority of the Senator was cited in opposition to a claim that I made that Congress was not committed by the amendment. The Senator from Michigan was cited in opposition to the claim that I made on that subject.

Mr. HOWARD. Of course, I am entirely ignorant of the report which may have been made of my speech and also of the sense in which it may have been understood. I know very well what my ideas were and what the substance of my language was. I never made any such statement, and I shall never agree, let me say, to any such thing. I will not agree that the State of South Carolina on adopting that amendment shall eo instanti be readmitted into Congress; nor will I agree that Alabama or Mississippi or Georgia or Texas shall be admitted to seats in Congress on going through with what might in their case be the mere farce of ratifying that amendment of the Constitution. We have not been so blind as to offer such a proposition to the rebel States. We have not agreed that they may come back here and resume their seats when they ratify that amendment, leaving the question undecided and uncertain as to the final ratification of that amendment by the other States. What the committee on reconstruction did propose at the last session was this, and very likely it has had the effect to mislead some gentlemen on that subject. While the matter referred to them was before them, that committee reported an article of amendment to the Constitution, the third section of which read as follows:

"Until the 4th day of July in the year 1870, all persons who voluntarily adhered to the late insurrection giving it aid and comfort, shall be excluded from the right to vote for Representatives in Congress and for electors for President and Vice President of the United States."

The committee submitted to the Senate and to the House of Representatives a bill entitled "A bill to provide for restoring the States lately in insurrection to their full political rights," the first section of which enacts as follows:

"That whenever the above-recited amendment [the whole amendment being recited in the bill] shall have become a part of the Constitution of the United States, and any State lately in insurrection shall have ratified the same and shall have modified its constitution and laws in conformity therewith, the Senators and Representatives from such State, if found duly elected and qualified may, after having taken the required oath of office, be admitted into Congress as such."

That is the proposition which the committee made to the two Houses of Congress. The bill, I believe, never passed the Senate. I think it was taken up in the House of Representatives and laid on the table. But observe how carefully even that bill is drawn. It is predicated upon this, that the amendment of the Constitution thus proposed shall have been preliminarily ratified by a sufficient number of States of the Union to make it a part of the Constitution itself, and that it shall be especially ratified by each one of the insurgent States for itself before such rebel State shall be readmitted. That is what was proposed, and the only thing proposed, to the rebel States as such.

Mr. WADE. As the Senator seems to address himself to me, I want to know if he understood me to lay down any different rule from that.

Mr. HOWARD. Certainly not. I understood the honorable Senator from Ohio to say before he closed his speech that it was to this bill and this clause that he referred. Certainly I do not mean to place him in a false position on a subject of so much importance.

We proposed that the Constitution should be so amended as to provide that for a time all persons who had participated in the rebellion should be ostracized and excluded from the right of voting for Representatives in the Congress of the United States.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I ask the honorable Senator if he does not remember that that particular clause was struck out by an amendment made by the Senate.

Mr. HOWARD. Yes, sir.

Mr. FESSENDEN. And we substituted another provision for it?

Mr. HOWARD. Yes, sir; we substituted another provision for it, and then the article of amendment finally submitted to the States as the fourteenth article was adopted by the two Houses on the report of the reconstruction committee.

Mr. President, it has been reproachfully alleged by some gentlemen upon this floor that one great object had in view by the friends of this bill is to increase the political strength of the dominant party in the two Houses of Congress, and we have been told, sneeringly, that if the measure was not likely to have that effect we should not press it; in short, that we have in view party objects and party interests in the passage of the bill now before us; that we are not actuated by patriotic motives, but rather by partisan feelings and interests.

I have to say in reply, that although I believe both these Territories contain sufficient population to justify us in admitting them as States, and that they ought for that and for various other reasons connected with their own local interest so to be admitted, I am still actuated by another motive, which with me is a very strong motive. I have no hesitation in saying plainly to the opponents of this bill that I do desire the admission of Colorado and Nebraska because their Senators here and their Representatives in the other House would greatly increase the Republican loyal strength in Congress. The interests of the country itself require this additional strength. I feel that I am actuated by the most patriotic motives when I say that in my judgment the interests of the United States of America, the interests of the whole loyal people who have borne the burden of this war, and especially the true interests of the insurgent population at the South, require this increase of strength in Congress.

Sir, what, during the last eighteen months, have we witnessed? We have witnessed one of the most dangerous and gigantic strides of executive ambition and executive power that has ever been exhibited in this country or in any other free country on the globe. We have seen a President of the United States, a locum tenens, rather, of that high office, assume to himself upon the close of a bloody war of four years, in which, according to his own admissions and confessions, all civil governments were obliterated in the rebel States, leaving them in a state of complete anarchy, without law, without order, without government; assuming, in utter disregard of the will of Congress, without even calling Congress together to consult them upon so grave an occasion, assuming to himself what he calls the constitutional power of appointing provisional governors for the conquered States of the rebellion, instituting, by his executive edicts from time to time, eleven so-called provisional governments in the insurgent States; a power which I, for one, utterly deny to him. I look upon his whole proceedings, from the date of his circular letter to the so-called Governor Holden, of North Carolina, down to the present time, as being wholly without constitutional warrant, and as plain a usurpation of the power of Congress to suppress the rebellion as it is possible to conceive.

I will not, however, go further into this subject at the present time than to say that this same Executive, professing to be actuated, of course, by pure and patriotic motives, took upon himself to denounce the Thirty-Ninth Congress as a body of usurpers "hanging on the verge of the Government," without constitutional power to act as a legislative body. We have seen him, after having "swung around the circle" from the city of Philadelphia to St. Louis, accusing Congress, at almost every stopping-place, of usurping power that did not belong to them, of being tyrants, of being a "body of men hanging on the verge of the Government," and of course not constituting properly any part of the Government; denouncing Congress as a band of conspirators in whose bosom was hatched the atrocious massacre at New Orleans, of which, if they are guilty they deserve nothing short of the halter; denouncing even by name members of this body and of the other House as being worthy of being hanged as traitors, and calling upon the noisy mobs whom he addressed and asking them why they did not hang A, B, C, and D? and finally, after having promised the offices of the Government to those people who would come, as he called it, to the ballot-box and vote for his policy, thus practically, if not legally, holding out bribes to the electors; arriving at St. Louis, where he put forth as the result of his meditations and patriotic reflections, the following declaration:

"Well, let me say to you if you will stand by me in this action, if you will stand by me in trying to give the people a fair chance, soldiers and citizens, to participate in these affairs."

I presume it should have been "offices"—"God being willing I will kick them [the office-holders] out just as fast as I can. Let me say to you in conclusion"—

Here is the deliberate result of all his harangues made while performing this pilgrimage to St. Louis, the result of his discussions, of his reflections, and ruminations—

"Let me say to you in conclusion what I have said, and I intended to say but little but was provoked into this more than otherwise. I care not for the names, the taunts, and jeers. I care not for the threats. I do not intend to be bullied by my enemies nor overawed by my friends, but God willing, with your help, I will veto their measures whenever they come to me."

Now, sir, if Mr. Johnson was sincere in making that declaration of a purpose to veto all the legislation of Congress, or that portion of it which was disagreeable to him, then I ask you, sir, I ask all my friends here, whether it is not high time that Congress, the Thirty-Ninth Congress, should fortify themselves and so add to their numerical strength in these Halls that the interests of the country shall not suffer by this threatened promiscuous and wanton use of the veto power by him. He threatens to veto all our legislation. It was if properly reported—of course I shall not hold him responsible for such a declaration if it shall appear that he was not correctly reported—if this shall be his purpose, if it be his determination to treat this Congress as a usurping body, as an unconstitutional body, not to be trusted with the business of legislation for the reason that they have not yet seen fit to adopt his policy for the readmission of the rebel States, then it is perfectly evident that no legislation can be got through Congress unless we can carry it over his veto and by a vote of two thirds of each body.

This, sir, is a very serious matter; but for one I do not fear or hesitate to say that with such a threat held out to me, with such dangers as seem to be clustering around me, it is my duty to take every step and to do every act authorized by the Constitution to increase the effective legislative strength of the Thirty-Ninth and the Fortieth Congress to counteract in this way the anarchical schemes, the schemes of absolutism and usurpation which are cherished in the executive branch of this Government. I have no hesitation about it. The question has come at last and is presented to the country in plain terms. There is an issue between the President and the legislative body. The Secretary of State has told us on more than one occasion that in such a controversy as this the executive arm will triumph; and his organ at home has gone so far as to declare that in case the votes of the rebel States at the next presidential election shall not be counted, and if those votes together with the votes of the opposition party at the North shall be sufficient to elect a President in 1868, Mr. Johnson then being in command of the military forces, we may expect a violent and bloody struggle.

Now, sir, it is our duty to look into the future and to resort to all means which are placed in our hands by the Constitution to counteract this plan of usurpation, absolutism, and violence, beneath which the free Government of the United States, the freedom of our Constitution and all the privileges secured under it, are likely to be crushed and extinguished forever.

Sir, let us meet the issue thus forced upon us like men, and with the same spirit with which our soldiers and sailors during the war met the enemy. For one, sir, I am not to be intimidated by the threats of President Johnson nor by the prophecies of the Secretary of State.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, the question immediately before the Senate, I believe, arises on the amendment to the bill upon the table, offered by the honorable Senator from Missouri, [Mr. Brown;] but in the discussion in which I am about to engage I shall consider myself at liberty to follow the course which has been adopted by the friends of this measure, to discuss the merits of the proposition itself contained in the bill, and I shall do it with all the brevity that I can command, and with all the perspicuity that I am able to use.

The honorable member who offers the amendment, if I understand him aright, places the power to insert such a provision as the amendment contemplates upon one of two grounds; first, because new States may be admitted into the Union; and second, because the United States may guaranty a republican form of government to each State. Irrespective of the political issues of the day, which may be very short-lived—for no one can tell how long they will continue to agitate the country—there are, in my judgment, considerations which should influence the judgment of Senators looking far beyond such issues.

During the deliberations of the Convention which led to the formation of the Constitution, it was at one time thought that the body was almost at the point of dissolution because of the proposed inequality of the representation in the other House and in this of the States represented in that Convention or thereafter to be introduced into the Union of the States, if the Constitution which the Convention should form should be legally ratified. First, it was doubted whether it was proper or republican in form to give to each of the States an equal representation in this body. Secondly, it was doubted whether it was not important to the interests of the States represented in that Convention to guard against being overborne by the representation of States which might thereafter be admitted into the Union, unless there was some limitation upon the representation to which they would in the absence of limitation be entitled. Delaware and Rhode Island, to speak of none of the other States, which are now small comparatively with these which have since been introduced into the Union; all the maritime States whose interest at that time it was thought would be found safer in their own hands and actually imperiled if they were not secured such a representation as would enable them at all times thereafter to protect them, believed that it was dangerous in the extreme, looking to the future, and a future soon to come, to admit new States into the Union under the clause which the Constitution was to contain, and which it does contain, without limiting their right of representation.

The representatives from the eastern States, and especially from that State which at that time contained the territory that now constitutes the State of Maine, which is so well represented on this floor, were exceedingly solicitous upon this subject, and sought to avoid the apprehended calamity, by proposing to provide that at no time should the States thereafter to be admitted into the Union have a representation exceeding in number the representation of the maritime States. The reason for that solicitude was very manifest. We may see it now exhibited in the opinions which are said to prevail in the western States.

At that time the idea of the eastern States engaging in manufactures was not contemplated. It was supposed, judging by their colonial history and judging by their locality, that their principal interest would be found to consist in objects of enterprise, maritime in their nature as contradistinguished from other objects of enterprise; in other words, that they would become the maritime States of the United States, the carriers of the States away from the Atlantic, and continue to be the carriers of all the States away from the Atlantic that thereafter might be admitted into the Union. When the clause which gives to Congress the power to admit new States was before the Convention, the subject was brought to the attention of that body by the representatives from the eastern States, and especially as the representatives from the State of Massachusetts, speaking upon this subject among others, through Gouverneur Morris, in a debate which the Senate will find reported in the second volume of Mr. Madison's Papers containing the debates in that Convention. I will read a sentence or two from the speech made on that occasion by Mr. Gouverneur Morris:

"The rule of representation ought to be so fixed as to secure to the Atlantic States a prevalence in the national councils. The new States will know less of the public interests than these, will have an interest in many respects different, in particular will be little scrupulous of involving the community in wars the burden and operations of which would fall chiefly on the maritime States. Provision ought, therefore, to be made to prevent the maritime States from being outvoted by them. He thought this might be easily done by irrevocably fixing the number of Representatives which the Atlantic States should respectively have and the number which each new State will have."

The representatives from the southern States, and especially from the State of Virginia, and more especially in that representation, Mr. Madison, insisted upon it (and they prevailed) that a provision of that sort could not be made consistently with the principles upon which the Union was to be formed, that it was designed and could only be made with safety a Union of equal States, equal in everything, equal in representation in the Senate, equal in representation in the House; and as with representation in the eastern States must from its nature be regulated by numbers, to limit the representation of the States thereafter to come into the Union by an irrevocable rule which should limit that representation at all times in the future, would be to place these States in a condition comparatively with the other States of the Union of inequality; and it was voted down. But the danger was still apparent, and that danger is now upon us.

The eastern States have been forced, by no fault of their own, in a great measure to drop the business in which they were then engaged, and which they supposed would constitute their principal business in all times to come, and to engage in the business of manufacturing. They have grown rich by their enterprise and their industry. They have millions and millions of money invested in these establishments, and they employ thousands and hundreds of thousands of men of the best skill in the country. While they enrich themselves individually they enrich all. They enrich those who start poor; they increase the wealth of those who start rich; and, what is chiefly to be admired, they immeasurably increase the wealth and the power of the nation. But how has that been accomplished? During the war of 1812 the system commenced, and found its inducement, its protection, in the effects of the war. Soon the war was over. England, the manufacturer almost of the world, found herself in a condition in which she could by a comparatively insignificant sacrifice flood the United States with every variety of manufactures in which the eastern States were then engaged, and by doing so involve them in bankruptcy. The United States, as I think wisely, determined to prevent such a dreadful calamity by protecting as against foreign competition the manufacturing industry of the United States, and that protection has been continued from that time to this; and the fruits of it are what we now see throughout the East, what we have seen still more strikingly exhibited during the last five years through which the country has passed—a trial to which no country in the world was ever before subjected—everything was supplied that human industry could furnish; every species of manufacture entering into the necessities of an army in the field was near at hand, fashioned by the skillful industry of the workmen of the United States—a skill that had become what it was under the protection of the laws to which I have adverted.

Now, it is not to be denied that to a certain extent at least if not to the very extent apprehended and asserted by those who have heretofore assailed and are now assailing that system, it increases in time of peace the cost to the consumer of everything which he is obliged to get from the manufacturer. How much of that protective tax falls upon the consumer and how much falls upon the manufacturer or producer it is difficult to ascertain. Political economists themselves are at variance on that subject; but all unite in saying that to a certain extent, at least, the finality is that the consumer pays the amount of the tax, either wholly or partially. The western States which we have already admitted, are, if we can judge from the signs of the times, under that impression; and just as you increase them will that impression be increased, and just as you increase them will it be in their power to strike at the system to which you in your States are so much indebted for the property which you now enjoy.

Mr. President, it is not to be inferred from what I have thus far said that I am hostile to the admission of any citizens of the United States into this Union as States; but I mention it merely for the purpose of saying that they ought not to be admitted until the necessity looking to themselves is apparent. To give to the Territory which you propose now to admit two Senators and at least one Representative, it having a population certainly not exceeding fifty thousand, and to give as you can only give to the State of New York and to the State of Pennsylvania each two Senators, with a population respectively of between three and four millions, would seem from the statement of the fact not to be altogether politically right.

I have said that the population of Nebraska does not exceed, I think, 50,000; and I suppose so by what I understand to be universally true, even in the older States where families have grown up, and there is a very little comparative difference between the numbers of the male and the female sex, that the proportion of voters is about one to five. If the Senate will look at the last vote cast in Pennsylvania, they will find that it was 600,000, and her population was about 3,000,000, which shows that in that State the voters are in proportion to the whole number of the population as one to five, and there is no reason to suppose that the proportion is as great in Nebraska, or in any of these new Territories, or that it will be as great for years to come. But if you put it even at one to five there would be a population of but 45,000; and we are now called upon to admit into the Union as a State equal in all respects, as far as this Chamber is concerned, a Territory containing but 45,000 inhabitants, with the State of New York which contains nearly 4,000,000, or Pennsylvania which contains about 3,000,000, to say nothing of the large States in the West.

May not this be carried to a dangerous extent? Nullification is at an end; thank God for that; secession is equally dead; and any attempt by force upon the part of the southern States to sunder their connection with the Union is never again to be made; but in the future—and statesmen should look not to the exigencies, political or party, of the hour, but to what the future in all probability may produce—who can tell how long the great West, sure in time to outnumber the rest of the Union, sure numerically to cast into shade at least the eastern States, will consent that measures which they think to be conducive to their own interest, which they think may be promotive of the public interest, shall be placed in the hands of States having numerically little or no comparative population? I think now we have reason to say that they are getting exceedingly dissatisfied with the protective system of the country. I do not stop to inquire whether their grounds for that dissatisfaction are correct or not. The fact is they are getting dissatisfied with it, and would if they could now terminate it. How long will they consent peaceably to submit to a Government which places their destinies in the hands of a few as compared with themselves? How long before it will be said by some political reformer, wiser than the men who framed the Constitution, "There is to be found in that disparity an anti-republican principle," and if there be any States in the Union who with the powers now belonging to them are capable of exerting that principle, how long before we shall have it said here and throughout the country that those States are not truly republican in form, and a demand made to limit their representation in the Senate?

What protection is there in the Constitution? The men who framed it supposed that the equal representation of the States in the Senate was protected by the provision that the Constitution is not to be amended so as to defeat that equal representation; but how could that stand if a general convention were called? Literally it would stand; but there would be nothing in that provision which would prevent a majority of the States—and the West will have a majority of the States—from saying, "If you insist upon retaining that equal representation in the Senate, you and we part; we will not live under a Government which is founded upon such an anti-republican theory." And when that time comes what is to become of Maine?

Mr. MORRILL. She will have to take care of herself.

Mr. JOHNSON. But how? Better in the Union than out of it. If you were not safely in the Union you could not have so well protected yourself and your domestic industry by any power belonging to you as a State.

I submit, therefore, upon the general question, that unless it is necessary for the protection of the rights of the citizens constituting the population of Nebraska that they should have a State government, and not a territorial government, having a population certainly not exceeding fifty thousand, you should leave them under the latter. And will it be said, particularly by my friend who spoke last and by the honorable member from Massachusetts, that the rights, individual and political, of citizens of the United States are not safe under a territorial government? Why, sir, they propose to put ten States under such governments, and they propose it for the very purpose of protection of the citizens in the rights which the Constitution secures. If, then, it be true that the rights, political and social and individual, of the citizens may be just as effectually protected under a territorial government as under a State government, what necessity is there for abolishing the one and establishing the other, unless it be—and with all my respect, real and professional, for the honorable member who spoke last, I think that is no ground upon which to place it—unless it be a desire to protect a party?

The honorable member has thought it proper in the consideration of this bill to animadvert upon the conduct of the President of the United States. That is a matter of taste. No one can question the good taste of the honorable member; but I am so dull as not to be able to see that the opinions of the President, past or present, have anything to do with the question whether Nebraska should be received into the Union or not. That is to stand or to fall on its own merits. "Party!" How long will "the party" endure? Are there no elements now which threaten, sooner or later, disruption? Do you all accord in the principles which the party are supposed to adopt? Why, what have we heard upon this floor? The honorable member from Ohio, the particular friend of this bill, and his colleague have both told us, and as I think told us properly, that those members of the Senate who voted for the constitutional amendment now before the States for adoption have pledged their faith that when adopted all the States adopting it are to be received into the Union. The honorable member from Michigan who has just closed his speech has told us, if I understand him, that there is no such obligation. My friend from Missouri, who offered the particular amendment now before the Senate has told us the same thing; and I may be permitted, without committing any breach of parliamentary decorum, to say that the same doctrine has been maintained by many leading members of the House of Representatives. Now, suppose it to be adopted, what then? One half of you, and I hope more, will say, "This is all that can be done; the Senators from these States must be admitted." The other half say "no." They say "no," possibly because then again would hazard be brought to the continuing existence of the party. Then they may say "I was no party to that pledge; I voted for that amendment, not for the purpose of bringing in the States, but for the purpose of keeping them out; I voted for it because I believed the States would not adopt it, and I was willing therefore to go with those who were in favor of receiving the States if it should be adopted, not because I concurred with them, but because I was fully impressed with the conviction that it would not be adopted, and that not being adopted they would concur with me in keeping them out."

There is ground of separation at once; but there are other grounds. My friend from Michigan—I think he is right—tells the honorable member who offered this amendment and tells the Senate that practically it is of no importance. It professes to be a condition upon which the State of Nebraska will be permitted to come into the Union; but when she does come into the Union, if she comes at all, she can disregard the condition. As the condition relates to the franchise, he says, and says properly, that the moment the State is in she may get clear of the condition by the exercise of what he says is her admitted power of regulating the franchise for herself. Who concurs with him? All of his party? We know they do not. The mover of the proposition insists that it is not only to be made a condition precedent to the admission of Nebraska into the Union, but a condition to follow the State, at all times thereafter to be inviolate, and out of the power of the State to escape from.

I agree with the honorable member from Michigan that that cannot be so, first, because, as I have stated, the Union is a Union of equal States; secondly, because as will be seen by those who consult the proceedings of the Convention, and consult those masterly essays which were written by Madison and Jay and Hamilton, recommending the Constitution to the adoption of the American people, it was assumed to be true, (and without that assumption the Constitution never could have been adopted,) that the subject of franchise was to remain with the States just as it remained before the Constitution was adopted, they then living under the Articles of Confederation. Is it to be supposed now, this amendment not being proposed as a constitutional amendment and to operate upon all the States of the Union, but proposed only as applicable to the particular State which asks to be received into the Union; is it to be supposed for a moment that when that State escapes from her infancy, ripens into maturity, contains a population not of forty-five or fifty thousand but of millions, she will consent to live under the domination of a badge to which even the State of Delaware or the State of Rhode Island is not subjected?

Suppose she refuses it, she calls a convention and they regulate by their constitution the franchise without regard to this limitation; they admit some to its exercise and exclude others; they admit the white and exclude the black; they require a property qualification or fail to require it; they adopt a constitution according to the opinion which they may entertain upon these particular points. The State is organized, the Governor elected, the members are here representing the State as she was originally created; and are you going to get rid of them, and how? Is there any legal process known to the law by which it can be accomplished, and is there any power which by force of arms or in any other way this body, or the President of the United States, or all Congress, could attain that end—expel from their seats in this body two Senators elected by Nebraska and whose terms had not expired, because after their admission that State adopted a constitution disregarding the condition which you had affixed to her admission? I say no, you would be helpless, helpless in point of law; and the public judgment would hold that you ought to be helpless, that you had no such power because the exertion of the power would put an end to the equality of the States; that you had no power to impose a condition on Nebraska that was not common to all the States in the Union, and as you had no power to change the constitutions of the other States so as to take from them the rights which belonged to them, because you cannot change by legislation the constitutions of those States, you had no power to make this particular constitution an exception to the general rule.

Mr. President, the honorable member the author of this amendment is not to be told that the authority of Congress to affix conditions to the admission of a State is not now for the first time called into question. It presented itself in the case of Missouri, and the agitation to which it led threatened at that moment almost the disruption of the Union. It was avoided by a compromise which at the time and almost ever since that time has been attributed to Mr. Clay. He never claimed it for himself, and he was not the author of it. It was avoided by establishing a line on one side of which slavery was expressly prohibited, leaving it to the people of the Territories on the other side to establish it or not as they thought proper. The condition there proposed to be inserted was that slavery should not exist in the State of Missouri.

The affirmative of the question as to the power to impose such a condition was argued with very great ability in the House of Representatives by Mr. Sergeant, a Representative from Pennsylvania; and others, and by Mr. King, then a distinguished member of this body from the State of New York, and whose whole career served to add to the reputation of his country both at home and abroad. But in all the debates that have since occurred it has been received as a political maxim growing out of the very nature of our institutions, that these States must be in all respects equal. And in that debate—I speak what I think I recollect distinctly—it was not pretended that Congress possessed any authority to impose any other condition than that which had its seat in a high moral and religious principle, because in their judgment slavery itself was a crime, and it could not be that the Congress of the United States would be forced to admit into the Union a State and give it, or without guarding against it, the power to perpetuate a crime—a crime in the eye of humanity, a crime in that Higher Eye, a crime in the judgment of one above who sways the harmonious mysteries of the world. But so far as related to any mere political condition, looking to mere measures of policy alone, looking above all others to the question of franchise, there was not a man who engaged in the debate in favor of affixing to the admission of that State into the Union the condition that slavery should not exist, who pretended to maintain the right of affixing any mere political condition which would place the State to be admitted in a condition of inequality with regard to her sisters.

Now, let me test the opposite doctrine for a moment and see to what it will lead. As I have stated, and in that I am sure I cannot be contradicted, the States before the Constitution was adopted were all equal; I mean in political rights. When the Constitution was adopted that equality was preserved and all their powers remained just as they were before, and equal with reference to each other as they were before, except so far as they had been delegated to the Government of the United States expressly or by fair implication. They have a great many rights, important rights to them as people and as States. No taxes or imposts can be imposed that are not equal everywhere. Every citizen of every State has the same right to resort to the judiciary of the United States as any citizen of any other State. The citizens of every State have the same right and the States have the same right to be heard in the Electoral College upon an equal footing with the other States. They have the same right to be represented in the House of Representatives; they have the same right to be represented in this Chamber; and upon the contingency of there being no popular election of a President and the matter is referred, as the Constitution provides, to the House of Representatives to determine, in such a contingency each State votes, and votes equally with all other States. Now, which of these rights can you take away? Can you take away the right of being heard in the Electoral College? Nobody will pretend that that can be done by making it a condition of the admission of a State into the Union? Can you provide that they shall not be entitled to the benefit of the equality which the Constitution says shall be preserved in the exercise of the taxing power? Nobody will pretend that. Can you take from them the right to go into the courts of the United States, to be represented in the House of Representatives, to be heard, if the contingency happens which renders it necessary, in the House of Representatives in determining who shall be the President of the United States, there being a failure to decide that question by the popular vote?

Mr. BROWN. We can take away from them the right to do wrong.

Mr. JOHNSON. What is the right to do wrong? Let me tell the honorable member it is wrong, in one sense, for the State of Rhode Island to have two Senators here and for the State of New York to have but two. Why is it not wrong? Is it right in the abstract, not in the particular? If the honorable member cannot say that it is right, then he admits that it is wrong. What is the wrong? The wrong here is said to be the exclusion from the franchise of certain of her citizens. Is it wrong to exclude the female, who is not included in this amendment? Is it wrong to exclude because of age or because the parties have reached a certain age? That is not pretended by this amendment. Is it wrong to enforce a property qualification? That is not pretended by this amendment. Is it wrong to require any specific residence for the voter or for the party to be voted for? That is not included in this amendment. And yet in each of such provisions the man who is under twenty-one may, in one sense, be said to suffer a wrong because he is denied a right; the woman under or over twenty-one may be said to suffer a wrong; and the honorable member from Missouri is evidently of that opinion, and he ought to include them in this amendment; because, if I recollect aright, the other day he voted to admit the female to the right of suffrage upon the ground that that was right. If it was right to admit them to exercise the suffrage here in the District of Columbia it is right to admit them to exercise the suffrage in the contemplated State of Nebraska; and being right the failure to give it, if the honorable member has the authority to give it—and he says he has—is a wrong; and yet he does not propose to redress that wrong. Upon that point, then, I conclude with saying that in my judgment there is nothing in the power which we have to admit new States which justifies our incorporating into the constitutions which they present any such condition as is contained in the amendment offered by my friend from Missouri.

I now proceed, Mr. President, with the indulgence of the Senate and yourself, to say a word upon the other ground on which I understand the power to adopt an amendment of this description is placed, upon that part of the Constitution of the United States which has been termed very correctly the guarantee section or the guarantee clause. If it can be maintained under that clause, it can only be because a constitution which denies to any of the citizens the right to vote is not republican. That would lead to very perilous consequences. What State is there in the Union that admits everybody to vote who has the age and the residence which their laws require, even supposing they have a right to prescribe age and residence? Not one, as far as I am advised. Which of the States represented in the Convention of 1787, and which afterward adopted through their people the Constitution framed by that Convention, admitted all to vote who had the prescribed age and residence? Not one. Most of them required a property qualification, more odious than anything else, as the people afterward were taught to believe; whether correctly or not, I do not stop to inquire. Were they, and are those States where it does now exist, republican States? Is the want of the universal right of voting a want which makes the constitution of the State where it exists other than republican? Or, to use the language of the clause, does it cease to be of a republican form? If it is not of a republican form now, it was not then. Now, let us see where that will lead us; into what, I was about to say, absurdity that necessarily conducts us.

The clause, it is said, by which the United States guaranty to every State in this Union a republican form of government embraces forms of government existing in the States then or thereafter which did not admit to an equal right of suffrage all the citizens. Do you think that was the view of the Convention? In the first place, how were they selected? Selected by the people of the States, or the Legislatures of the States then in existence. They represented, therefore, their respective States. Their object was, not to destroy, not to change the forms of government which their States had adopted, but to preserve and to protect them—nothing else. The inefficiency of the Articles of Confederation had been demonstrated. Life, liberty, and happiness, which the Declaration of Independence proclaimed to be inalienable, were, it was supposed, in imminent jeopardy because of the demonstrated inefficiency of the Government of the Confederation; and the Convention therefore met to accomplish what, as they declared in the preamble to the Constitution, they thought they had accomplished, provisions for the organization of a Government which would form a more perfect Union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defense, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty for themselves and their posterity, of course, forever. Did they propose to accomplish that, and did they think they had accomplished it by framing a Constitution which was to annul it in a particular which every man in every State claimed to be an invaluable right, the authority of the State to regulate suffrage for itself? The result would be that a Government intended to be composed of States, under a Constitution which said that the United States was to guaranty to every State a republican form of government in its very birth, not only communicated a power to the United States, but made it the duty of the United States to assail every State constitution. A power to guard against domestic violence, a power to bring about a more perfect Union, a power to establish justice, and to secure the blessings of liberty to themselves and their posterity forever, is supposed to have been intended for the purpose of vesting in the Government created for the very purpose of accomplishing these ends the power to destroy the governments who were thus to be more absolutely united together! That cannot be so.

But is there a doubt about it? Contemporary construction, to be ascertained by what is not done as well as by what is done, is a familiar rule of interpretation, not only persuasive, but controlling. Was it ever attempted before? Never. Manhood suffrage, as it is termed, a right supposed to exist in the mere fact of manhood, became in many of the States a subject of party contest, and it prevailed. Universal manhood suffrage almost was granted; limited suffrage was destroyed; property was no longer considered as necessary to give the right; it was supposed to be found in the fact that man was man, and had a right to a voice in the Government which was to control or to have authority over his rights as a man. But this question was debated among the States inter se. Nobody ever dreamed that the United States had any authority, and the United States not only never attempted to exert it, but as far as I am advised, (and I believe my knowledge upon the subject is accurate,) no member of Congress until the last few years ever suggested it. And even now the committee of fifteen, of which I was a member, in the measures which they thought proper to adopt and recommend, did not undertake to interfere with the right of the States to regulate the suffrage. They forbore to do that; and they forbore to do it upon the ground that it was a right which not only belonged to the States, but which should belong to the States. All that they did was to provide, and that by a constitutional amendment, necessarily therefore conceding that the Constitution as it stands gave no such power, that upon the adoption of that amendment, which would then become a part of the Constitution, the representation of a State that might exclude from the right of suffrage any portion of its citizens should in that proportion be reduced; and that is all. But who was to vote was left to the States just as it was before. It has never been pretended by any one, except by one or two gentlemen who seem to be in advance of the age, and, if I might be permitted to say so, of any age that we shall ever know, that it would be conducive to the interest of the whole that the Government of the United States should have the power to regulate the right of suffrage in the States.

How would it be in California or Nevada or Oregon? What my brother from Oregon [Mr.

WILLIAMS] asks, perhaps, cannot be accomplished. He proposed a resolution this morning to regulate or to prohibit the immigration of the Chinese into the States on the Pacific. Suppose he cannot do it. I doubt very much whether he can. That is a subject, however, on which I must not be understood as giving an opinion. Suppose it cannot be accomplished. They are there now to a large extent and cannot be driven out except for crime. I suppose that will be conceded. One of these days some gentleman who is as fond of party as my friend from Michigan, may find it necessary to the success of a presidential election to have the Chinese vote. How is he to do it? Nevada will not let him vote; Oregon will not permit him to vote; California will not permit him to vote. Oh, but party looms up; "the Chinese will adopt my policy,"—my friend from Michigan has a "policy" as well as President Johnson,—and "my President cannot be elected unless they are authorized to vote." Well, as you in Oregon will not do what is right, as you are blind to the interest of party, you must be made to do what is right; you must be made to do something that will inure to the interests of party; and if I cannot do it in any other way, if I cannot get the Constitution amended, I will invoke the guarantee clause. The constitution of Nevada, that of Oregon, that of California excludes the Chinese who are men—I do not suppose even my friend from Missouri supposes they are women [laughter]—from the right of suffrage. Each of them is not a government republican in form, and our duty is to have it so; and as the honorable member from Michigan said in his speech to-day, the duty being imposed on Congress, and the power with which to perform that duty being given to Congress to guaranty to each State a republican form of government, it can only be done, Congress having no other power, by means of legislation, and we will by legislation provide that my friend's [Mr. WILLIAMS's] voting constituents shall be these Chinese! How long would the people of the Pacific States remain in the Union? They are loyal I know, as loyal as any States in the Union, as wedded to it, as determined not to leave it; but how long would it be before they would lose their love for it if Congress was to undertake to say that they should be subjected even to the votes of the Chinese who are there now, or to that immense mass of Chinese population that is sure to spread itself over these Pacific States, if they are permitted to become immigrants to the United States? I do not think they would stay an hour, unless they have some peaceable remedy—not exercising any right of secession, that is dead, but exercising that inherent right which belongs to every State and every people to war against tyranny.

Now, Mr. President, a word or two upon the actual meaning of that clause. The Senate will see by looking at the clause that it really contains three guarantees. The first is a republican form of government; the second is to protect the States from invasion from without; the third is to protect them against domestic violence. The latter power is not to be exerted unless the government, where the domestic violence arises, calls upon the Executive through the Governor, if the Legislature is not in session, or the Legislature calls upon the Executive here for aid. The other two are absolute—to guaranty a republican form of government—how, when, through what instrumentality the clause does not tell us—to guard each State against invasion. That we can understand, although the clause does not tell us. It can only be by meeting the invader and driving him from the limits of the State. To protect each State against domestic violence when called for in the manner provided for by the clause we can also ascertain; it is to put it down. But what is the "form of government" which is included in the clause? What is the government? If I understand it, it is not to protect the Governor or the executive officers, whoever they may be, or the legislative department of the State from any violence, for that is included in the provision that the government is to be protected from such violence. What, then, does it mean? It means this and only this: whenever the criminal ambition of those who are in the possession of it induces them to pervert its powers and to assail the people, that the people are to be protected against any change in the form of government that may be brought about by such causes. There is nothing more clear than that, as I think.

Take the State of my friend from Oregon [Mr. WILLIAMS] by way of illustration. I do not select that because it is more likely to happen there than anywhere else. The government does not mean the constitution; that remains; but the government existing by force of the constitution coming into power under its provisions turn traitors to it; they assume the tyrant, violate the rights of the citizen, usurp powers not granted, exert powers prohibited, and establish as among themselves a government wholly discharged from all the guards and protection which belong to the constitution under which they came into power, and that government is not republican in form. It becomes known to the United States; the people complain; they want to be protected; and the contingency then happens, and then happens for the first time, when it becomes the duty of the General Government to stand between the usurped government and the people over whom they are tyrannizing, and reestablish the government which was republican in point of form, by protecting the people against its abuse and the substitution of another which was not republican in point of form.

There must be some mode by which you are to ascertain whether any government is republican in point of form for this very obvious consideration: the United States are to guaranty each State a republican form of government. My friend from Massachusetts says, and my friend who offers this amendment says, that to exclude the black man from voting shows that the government is not republican in point of form. Why? Was he not excluded when the Constitution was adopted in every State in the Union, or almost every State in the Union? Yes. Did not the States that adopted it do it under the impression that they were States republican in point of form? Did not the Convention that inserted in the Constitution this guarantee go upon the assumption that the States were republican in point of form? Why, certainly, unless they intended to break up all the States. That we know they did not intend; and not intending that, can it be supposed that they designed by this clause to place it in the hands of Congress to decide from time to time, as passions might be excited, party spirit prevailed, the exigencies of party success demanded, to interfere with the State governments by bringing into the enjoyment of the elective franchise those whom the States had excluded? Not only that, if the proposition is true it goes a step further than that; if possible, infinitely further. Does it give to the United States the authority to interfere with any of the existing rights belonging to the States at the time they adopted the Constitution? If it did, then everything was thrown afloat; the United States then, by its Congress, is to become a great convention, not only to deliberate for the interest and safety of the people of the United States, but for what they may believe from time to time is to be the interest and the safety of the people of each State in the management of its own domestic concerns.

There is a rule, and it is the only rule, as I think, consistent with what must have been the intention of the Convention and of the people, and that is this: that every government is republican in point of form which corresponds with the governments in existence when the Constitution was adopted. All rights secured by positive constitutional provision, all powers prohibited by positive constitutional prohibition, that were secured or prohibited in the several State constitutions of the States whose representatives framed the Constitution and whose people adopted the Constitution, are perfectly consistent with our idea and the people's idea of what constitutes a republican form of government. There is no other rule by which you can construe the clause that will not place every State in the power of the United States, exercising that power through the Congress of the United States, which from time to time that body may think actually or professedly will conduce to the interest of the people of each State, and give them what they consider to be a government republican in point of form.

Mr. President, no Constitution can endure even for years, much less for the future when our posterity will be here and we gone, which contains such a power in the General Government. Leave to the States the rights and the powers existing in the States that formed the Constitution, and leave them all in the same condition in relation to the States who have in the past become members of the Union or who may in the future become members of the Union, and the country will endure. Some one State, by the folly of its people, or some sections may seek to leave it and to destroy it, but the last five years show that such an effort will be futile, will inure in nothing but in desolated households, ravaged fields, and the annihilation for the time of all the subjects of enterprise and of industry, which it will take years to revive.

I have no fear, therefore, unless we commit, or those who are to follow us commit, outrages upon the rights of the people which will authorize them, in the exercise of the inherent power of revolution, to rise up in their majesty and establish another form of Government, or rather to insist upon having preserved the Government in the form which our fathers intended—unless that is done, I have no fear but that the political institutions of the United States will endure for ages and I trust forever, extending as they now do from ocean to ocean, distributing their blessings everywhere, and enabling them with perfect assurance to feel no apprehension, and that they never will be called upon to feel any apprehension against any violence from within or any invasion from abroad.

Mr. WILSON. I move to amend the amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri, by striking out all after the word "color" in the fifth line and inserting the words I send to the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. POMEROY in the chair.) The Chair understands that there is an amendment to an amendment now pending—the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. COWAN] to the amendment of the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. BROWN,] and a further amendment is not now in order. It may be read for the information of the Senate, however.

The Secretary read the proposed amendment to the amendment, which was to strike out all after the word "color" in the fifth line and to insert:

And upon the further fundamental condition that the Legislature of said State, by a solemn public act, shall declare the assent of said State to the said fundamental condition, and shall transmit to the President of the United States an authentic copy of said act, upon receipt whereof the President, by proclamation, shall forthwith announce the fact, whereupon said fundamental condition shall be held as a part of the organic law of the State, and thereupon, and without any further proceeding on the part of Congress, the admission of said State into the Union shall be considered as complete. Said State Legislature shall be convened by the territorial Governor within thirty days after the passage of this act.

Mr. WILSON. I hope that the Senator from Missouri will accept this amendment to his amendment, if permitted to do so, and I trust that the Senator from Ohio, who has the charge of this measure, will concur in it, and that by common consent we shall agree to this amendment, and then pass the bill as amended.

Mr. WADE. I should like to hear it read again. I do not know that I understood it.

The Secretary again read the proposed amendment.

Several SENATORS. Read the pending amendment as it will stand if amended.

The Secretary read as follows:

Provided, That this act shall not take effect except upon the fundamental condition that within the State of Nebraska there shall be no denial of the elective franchise or of any other rights to any person by reason of race or color. And upon the further fundamental condition that the Legislature of said State, by a solemn public act, shall declare the assent of said State to the said fundamental condition, and shall transmit to the President of the United States an authentic copy of said act, upon receipt whereof the President, by proclamation, shall forthwith announce the fact, whereupon said fundamental condition shall be held as a part of the organic law of the State, and thereupon, and without any further proceeding on the part of Congress, the admission of said State into the Union shall be considered as complete. Said State Legislature shall be convened by the territorial Governor within thirty days after the passage of this act.

Mr. WILSON. The Missouri act of 1821 submitted the question, not to the people of Missouri, but to the Legislature, and if that act had any binding force, this is equally binding. If we have the power to submit it to the people, we have the power to submit it to the Legislature, and their decision will be as valid as the decision of the people. It would be inconvenient, especially at this season of the year, to call together the people of that great Territory to pass upon this proviso. The Legislature is already elected, may be called together in a few days and pass upon the subject. The question may be settled, and settled before the 4th of March next, so that the delegation from this new State may take their seats in the Thirty-Ninth Congress.

Now, sir, I desire to say that I have none of that feeling referred to by the Senator from Maryland, as existing at the time of the formation of the Constitution in the eastern States, and I do not think that the people I represent entertain any sort of jealousy toward the people of the West or the new States of the Union. We of the East regard them rather as our children; and we hope they will be wiser and better and more prosperous than we are. I wish to see young Nebraska in the Union as one of our sister States. I am content with her boundaries, with her population, and especially content with the political sentiments and opinions of her people. She has sent to represent her on this floor gentlemen of talent and of character, patriotic and liberty-loving men, and I desire that at the earliest moment they shall become members of this body.

Mr. President, when the question came up at the last session of the admission of Colorado into the Union I felt as strong a repugnance as anybody could feel against this word "white" she had incorporated into her constitution. It came up at a critical time in the history of the country. I saw then very clearly that the President of the United States, and more especially the men who were about him and around him, and to whose beguiling voices he listened, were determined to make a rupture between the Executive and Congress. I felt the importance of these three years of power intrusted to us to settle the great questions before the country, for the complete restoration of the country on the solid basis of the equal rights and privileges of all men. I saw clearly that when the contest should come we should have a contest that would try Congress and stir the country to its profoundest depths. I thought it was the part alike of patriotism and of wisdom to prepare for it, to keep ourselves always right, and if the President chose to put himself in the wrong to keep him in the wrong. That policy was generally pursued. Congress kept itself in the right, the President put himself in the wrong, and the country has pronounced between the Executive and Congress, has rebuked the former and exalted the latter. I saw, too, that in this body the Executive appeared to have too many followers and too much power. It was apparent that the friends of impartial freedom were doomed to defeat if executive power could seduce or intimidate. At any rate it was not the friends of the country who were to have the control of this body and the Government. Although I was strongly opposed to this word "white" I thought it better for the great cause of the country, the cause of liberty, the cause of the emancipated bondman, that Colorado should be admitted and that her votes should give the friends of freedom and the country the control of the Senate of the United States. Her Senators were tried and true, and their votes would give us the power to override the executive vetoes. Had the Senators from Colorado been admitted the bill giving manhood suffrage, pure and simple, would have passed at the last session. I knew then, as I know now, that we could not have passed the bill giving manhood suffrage in this District without the admission of the Senators from Colorado, and that with their votes sure for that great measure it would have been enacted. Anxious to carry that measure—a measure I had publicly pledged should pass at that session—I strove to achieve it by the votes of the Senators from Colorado.

For more than thirty years I have never given a vote, at home or abroad, for the election of any man or for the support of any measure that I have not asked myself what the effect would be upon the great cause of equal, universal, and impartial liberty in my country. Acting ever under a vow made here in this Capitol thirty years ago, I have always subordinated political organizations, public men, and public measures to the overshadowing issues growing out of the existence of slavery, the domination of the slave power, and the rights and privileges of the African race. Actuated by the sentiment of impartial freedom for all of every color and race, resolved to use all the means sanctioned by law and humanity to secure equality of rights for all, and to make my country a great Christian Republic, I have aided in pulling down and building up political organizations, and in making public measures contribute to the advancement of the great cause. Perhaps I have erred in action—never, I am sure, have I erred in intention or purpose. Looking back upon these thirty years of active life, I do not remember more than one vote I would change to-day if I had the power.

But, sir, by the course of events our power in the Senate is now assured, and after the 4th of March next will be quite as strong as it is now. I need not state, for we all know how our numbers have increased until now we have a clear, undoubted two-thirds vote here upon all leading questions that may arise. The necessity under pressure of which I acted at the last session has passed away. Satisfied to admit Colorado and Nebraska, always excepting that word "white," that stained their constitution, I gave voice and vote to their admission to secure for the holy cause for which we are struggling the control of the Senate. That control has been otherwise secured. The commanding necessity under which I then acted exists no longer. Then the admission of these young States in spite of this odious word "white" seemed to me to be demanded by the needs of the periled country; now their admission with this word "white," it seems to me, is not demanded by the needs of the country.

I am as desirous as anybody can be to welcome these young States into the Union. I am as desirous as anybody can be that Nebraska should be represented here; but, I repeat, the necessity that controlled my vote at the last session has passed, and I believe that we can and should impose the condition now proposed. The Legislature elected in that State can be called together in a few days; the Legislature can pronounce upon this question, and in a very brief time Nebraska will be in the Union.

A bill has passed the House of Representatives by an immense majority and is now pending before the Senate, to give suffrage without distinction of color in the Territories of the United States. We must and should act upon that bill. I shall vote for it with all my heart. The admission of this State at this time without imposing this condition upon her and then the passage of that bill would put us in a false position before the country. The passage of that territorial bill will confer suffrage upon the colored men of Nebraska; the unconditional admission of that new State will for a time take suffrage from them. No loyal man in possession of suffrage shall ever say to me, "You, sir, robbed me of my rights."

I have come to the conclusion, sir, that before the 4th of March the constitutional amendment will have been adopted by the country; but whether it be adopted or not, there is one thing very clear to my mind as a duty that we cannot shun, in my opinion we are neglecting it now, and that is, to take the governments of these rebel States out of the hands of the rebels. They have no business with the governments of those States. It is a betrayal of the cause of the country to put the governments of those States into their hands, or to continue the governments of those States in their hands. Whether we call them States or Territories, one thing is clear: the loyal people, black and white, of those States should be protected in life, liberty, and property, and we are bound to protect them. The disloyal men have no right to any share or part in the governments of those States and should at once be dismissed from the places they have usurped through the weakness or treachery of the President. Before the 4th of March we must take the governments of these rebel States out of the hands of disloyal men. I am anxious for the passage of this bill with this amendment, that this question may be submitted to the Legislature, that the Legislature may agree to it, and that her Senators may be here to aid in the good work before us.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I suggest to the honorable Senator from Massachusetts that he amend his proposed substitute by inserting after the word "color" the words "excepting Indians not taxed," because it will be impossible for me to vote to allow every person, including the wild and untamed Indians of Nebraska, equal rights and privileges in that Territory. With that amendment my objection to it would be greatly modified.

Mr. WILSON. If permitted to do so, I will modify my amendment so as to except Indians not taxed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator can so modify his amendment.

Mr. WILSON. Then I ask the Clerk to make that change in it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question before the Senate is on the amendment moved by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. COWAN] to the amendment of the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. BROWN.]

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I should like to inquire of the honorable Senator from Massachusetts whether he really intends in the Territory or the State of Nebraska to have the Indians vote or not.

Mr. WILSON. I have just made a modification of my amendment so as to exclude untaxed Indians.

Mr. WILLIAMS. "Excepting Indians not taxed."

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I understand the Senator from Massachusetts to say that he is strong in the belief that the constitutional amendment which is now pending will be adopted by the States before the 4th of March next. The Senator from Massachusetts voted for that constitutional amendment, which was submitted to all the States. I wish to inquire of him whether it is his understanding that the faith of Congress is pledged, in case the constitutional amendment is adopted by the States of the South, that they are entitled then to be represented. I understood the honorable Senator from Ohio [Mr. WADE] to state most distinctly that he understood that to be the pledge which was given on the part of Congress, while the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SUMNER] insists that no such pledge was given. I should like to know how the other Senator from Massachusetts understands that; whether if those States vote for the amendment they are to be entitled to have representation.

Mr. WADE. This test is frequently applied to us, and I am very frequently quoted, and rather at short hand. I want it to be understood exactly what I do assent to, and what I did. I did not state, nor intend to be understood, that when these States had adopted the constitutional amendment they were entitled to come in at all hazards. This is the proposition to which I did assent, and which I stated, and to which I adhere now. I supposed that when that constitutional amendment was adopted by two thirds of the States, so as to become part and parcel of the Constitution of the United States, and adopted by the seceded States, their relations with the General Government would be such that they might apply for admission, and, all other things being equal, I think I said they ought to be admitted, provided they came in loyal, provided they placed their States in harmony with the Union, and sent loyal men, &c. Then, sir, my pledge and my understanding was, they being in a condition to apply, if they were loyal and their States showed a disposition to be friendly to the Union, they ought to be admitted; but not barely because they, out of policy, adopted the amendment to get a foothold here, being disloyal, showing themselves disloyal, that they were entitled to all events to be admitted. That I did not mean.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The Senator from Ohio of course has a right to correct me if I did not state his position correctly. My question was put to the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. WILSON.] I wish to know what he understood, whether he agrees with his colleague or with the Senator from Ohio in relation to the submission of that constitutional amendment to the States of the South.

Mr. WILSON. I do not recognize the right of the Senator from Wisconsin to put a question in that form to me; but I say to him, and I have no hesitation in saying it, that I voted for the admission of Tennessee into the Union, not simply because she adopted the constitutional amendment, but because she had furnished thousands of men to fight our battles; had abolished slavery before the constitutional amendment prohibiting slavery had been adopted; had elected a loyal Governor and a loyal Legislature and a loyal delegation to Congress; had given the power by her revised constitution to her Legislature to confer suffrage upon her colored men, and her leading statesmen pledged their faith that her Legislature would promptly do that act of justice, wisdom, and policy. I believe that those pledges will be redeemed and that Tennessee will lead the van among the States in giving suffrage to the freedmen. I believed then and I believe now that the vote for the admission of Tennessee weakened the enemies of the black man and strengthened his friends.

But I know of no other State that went into the rebellion that is in any respect in her condition. We passed no act compelling us to admit rebel States on the adoption of the constitutional amendment. We are bound by no pledges, and after the action we have witnessed during the past few months, patriotism and liberty, justice and humanity, demand that we should go to the extreme verge of our power to protect the loyal men of the rebel States. For one, sir, I do not intend that this question shall be settled until every man in those States is in full possession of his natural rights—the right to be protected in life, liberty, and property, and the right of the ballot to protect life, liberty, and property. Seven States have already adopted the constitutional amendment. The Legislatures of thirteen loyal States meet next month, and before the 4th of March this constitutional amendment will be adopted by three fourths of the States represented in Congress.

Mr. SUMNER. That is enough.

Mr. WILSON. I regard that number as enough. But whether the amendment be adopted or not I hold it to be our duty, a duty that should have prevented us from adjourning, to take the governments of those States out of the hands of the men who now hold those governments and who have no moral or legal right to hold them. Neither the President nor Congress had authority to put those States into rebel hands as has been done, and we neglect our duty in permitting rebels to hold these States for an hour, or in allowing rebels to elect Governors and Legislatures and govern the loyal people. I shall go up to the extreme verge of constitutional power to protect these loyal people. I believe the only protection the black men of the South have, or can have, is to weapon their right hand with the ballot to protect their lives, their liberties, and their property. If it be necessary for the protection of his life, liberty, and property that the black man shall have the ballot, man and God will forever condemn us for withholding it. I give all my doubts in favor, not of the rebel, but of the loyal black man.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. My honorable friend from Massachusetts took some little time to make an answer to the question whether he agreed with his colleague or whether he agreed with the Senator from Ohio; but, sir, from what he says and the purport of what he says, I understand him not to consider himself or Congress bound in any respect, whether the States of the South do or do not vote for the amendment; that no act on our part in any respect has bound the faith of the Government to those States in case the constitutional amendment should be adopted and they should vote for it, that it will give to them any right to have their representatives admitted without imposing the further condition, upon which he now seems to insist, that they should also give universal suffrage to all the colored men in those States. That is the substance of his statement. But I do not understand the honorable Senator to deny that Congress did submit a constitutional amendment to the States, upon which the States of the South among others were invited to vote. I believe the Senator does not take such ground as that. The Senator from Ohio very distinctly stated in his speech, and he has said nothing to-day to qualify it, that this constitutional amendment was submitted to those States, to be voted upon by those States, accepted or rejected. That is enough for all the purpose which I have in hand at this present moment. What I desire to say is this: submitting a constitutional amendment to the States of the South is conceding them to exist as States, with Legislatures capable of ratifying or rejecting the amendment. No man, it seems to me, can logically say that they have the power to accept or to reject an amendment to the Constitution of the United States and at the same time say that they are neither States nor have any Legislatures at all. I know the honorable Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SUMNER] has been consistent, always maintaining that they were not States to which a constitutional amendment could be submitted. He has insisted that the constitutional amendment could not be submitted to the States of the South, because he has always consistently maintained that there were no States there to submit it to.

Mr. SUMNER. Not precisely. No State governments.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. No Legislatures.

Mr. SUMNER. No valid Legislatures.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. No valid Legislatures that could give any valid vote for or against it. Not so with the Senator from Ohio; not so with his colleague from Massachusetts; not so with a majority on this floor. They have contended that they were States; that they had State Legislatures; that those State Legislatures were called upon to vote either yes or no on the question of the ratification of the amendment; and I say there is no man who can stand up and logically say that they are States, with Legislatures, with the power to vote ay or no upon a constitutional amendment changing the Constitution of the United States, and in the same breath say that they are not States and have no Legislatures which can choose Senators. Men must take position. It is a question on which there is no neutrality. The men who say that there is a constitutional amendment now submitted and pending before them, and that they have the right to vote ay or no, cannot deny that they are States; they cannot say they have no Legislatures.

Mr. President, this voting on a constitutional amendment which is to change the fundamental law not only of their State but the fundamental law of our States also, is the highest possible act that can be performed by any Legislature, much higher than an ordinary act of legislation which only concerns their own people, much higher than an act of the Legislature that chooses a Senator; and yet men say they can vote on a constitutional amendment, accept it or reject it, and yet they are incapable of electing a Senator.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Who says that?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I say that is the substance of the whole argument.

Mr. FESSENDEN. But who says it?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. That they cannot elect a Senator?

Mr. FESSENDEN. No; but that they had now in their present form a sufficient State government to accept or reject a constitutional amendment.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I understand the honorable Senator from Ohio to say that this constitutional amendment has been submitted to these States. He says that five of these States have rejected it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. But he does not say it is legal action.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. How can they reject it if they have no Legislature to do it?

Mr. FESSENDEN. They can assume to do one thing or the other.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. But nobody but a Legislature can act upon it at all.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That is all very true.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. If they have no Legislature, how can they reject it?

Mr. FESSENDEN. I will reply to the Senator after he gets through.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Certainly, if called upon to vote on the question, a person who has the power to vote ay has the power to vote no. It is submitted to the Legislature to vote ay or no. If they can vote ay, they can vote no, and if they can vote no they can vote ay, and the giving them or acknowledging that they have the power to vote either way acknowledges them to be States with Legislatures. We cannot say as the hunter was said to have done when he loaded his gun and fired, to hit it if it was a deer and to miss if it was a calf. We cannot say that we submit a constitutional amendment to the State, and if they vote ay they are States and have joined in the ratification of an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, and if they vote no they are not States and have no power to vote at all.

Mr. President, I do not wish to continue this discussion. Indeed I dislike to be drawn into a discussion of other questions than those that are precisely the ones pending before the Senate on the admission of the Territory of Nebraska; but all the Senators who have discussed that measure have run off on to the question of the reconstruction of the States of the South and the constitutional amendment. Therefore, as that question seems to be before the Senate, though not necessarily involved in the pending question, the admission of Nebraska, I wished to say a single word as bearing on that subject.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Mr. President, I do not design to be drawn into any premature expression of an opinion upon a subject not under discussion; and the habit that some gentlemen have of asking questions upon matters foreign to the subject of debate, as to the opinions of Senators, would not have any effect at all as appert to me, because, in parliamentary language, I should say, when such a question was put, if I chose to say it, "It is none of the Senator's business; he would find it out when the time came." Now, the Senator from Wisconsin says that gentlemen must define their positions; there is no neutrality; they must be somewhere or other. We all know where he is just at this time, about as near the equator as he can get. [Laughter.]

him, so far as the committee on reconstruction is concerned, I think by a reading of their report their understanding of this whole matter may be arrived at. We submitted a constitutional amendment, and in the report itself we discussed the question of the standing of the States themselves. Unless I am very much mistaken in my recollection of the substance of that report, it does not admit but almost specifically denies that any one of the States in rebellion has ever since been in a condition to do a legal act as a State or one which we were bound to recognize; that any of them is so constituted that the men presuming to be the Legislature or to act as a Legislature are so in point of fact unless we choose to recognize the State government as such, which we have never done with regard to any of them excepting simply the State of Tennessee.

I understand that this matter of admitting a State is a matter of compact. A State may establish a government if it pleases, or a sort of government to suit itself; it may call a convention; it may institute a form of government if it likes and proceed to act under it; and if the Congress of the United States chooses to recognize that as such in a Territory, or in a State situated as these rebellious States are, they have the power to do so. But suppose they do not choose to do it, but take exception to the form, does the body assuming to act as a Legislature remain a Legislature so far as we are concerned? Does the so-called State government entitle itself to be the government of the State so far as Congress and the Government of the United States are concerned? Not at all, until we come into the compact. I think that principle will enable us to answer the question that is put by the Senator. We do not say that a State government is all right if it answers "ay" but all wrong if it answers "no." We submit our constitutional amendment in the regular form; we provide that it shall be submitted to the Legislatures of the States. We do not say what States. We do not submit it ourselves except by passing a vote to that effect. We authorize the Secretary of State to transmit a copy to the several States of the Union; no more than that; and when he receives the answer to let it be known. That is all. We do not undertake to say that either this, that, or the other State is in a condition to act so as that its action on the subject shall be binding.

Now, with reference to myself individually, I do not know, and I do not undertake to say, what I may or may not do in a given, specific case. But when we vote for a constitutional amendment to be submitted and it is submitted by the Secretary of State to the Legislatures now in existence, do we admit that those States are regularly constituted, and that we have got to recognize them after they have acted? Not at all. My own understanding is that I have a right to inquire, and it is my duty to inquire, whether this constitutional amendment has been legally adopted by a Legislature of a State which I am bound to recognize. Have I not a right to make inquiry? If an organization, no matter how got up, with or without the consent of the people or a majority of the people of a State, sets itself up as the Legislature, am I precluded from inquiring into the fact whether that is the Legislature of the State whose action is binding on the question submitted? That is a question which I have a right to examine. I am not prepared to say in the very teeth of the report of the reconstruction committee, so called, that these States are so constituted and so organized that their action, so far as the United States Government is concerned, is legal and binding upon any one subject. I have not admitted that; I do not admit it now.

And yet, sir, I am free to say that if from the conduct of a government assuming to be the government of a State, from the constitution that they submitted—and here let me say that no constitution has yet been submitted to Congress from any of these States—I saw that the principles of that constitution were such as would render it safe and proper in my judgment to say that it was the constitution of a State, and that the State should come into Congress, I might then come into that compact and say that such a State was to be admitted into the Union or to be recognized as one of the States of the Union, if gentlemen like that language better, on the constitution thus submitted to Congress and the provisions they had made. But is it to be held that before any such thing has been done, when the old constitutions have been overthrown, with everything, to use the language of the President, prostrate in the dust, nothing new done under the authority of Congress, or even by the assent of any one of these States, I am to take it for granted that that is the constitution of a State, and that they are States in the Union with all proper connections with the Government of the United States before I know what it is? I take it for granted that that is not obligatory on me in any sense; and I want to say here now with regard to the formation of these States, the new formation of these States if you please to call it so, because we all understand what their condition is, I conceive that I have a right to inquire what the terms of their constitutions are, to see whether those terms are satisfactory, whether they have placed themselves in a condition to be admitted, whether they were in a condition to adopt the constitutional amendment which we have submitted, and whether they have done it; not that any convocation of people called together by a satrap, forming new arrangements to suit themselves, which they have never chosen to submit to Congress or the people of their State, of which we know nothing officially, are necessarily a Legislature and a government, all of whose acts we are pledged to take as the acts of the proper, well-organized, constitutional governments of States in the Union and having repaired all their broken connections with the Union.

I admit no such doctrine, sir, and therefore I say, after a vote has been taken, if any should be by any one of these so-called States adopting the constitutional amendment, it may be a question preliminary with me: has the constitutional amendment been adopted by a legally organized constitutional government of a State, which I am bound to recognize? And, sir, I do not preclude myself from a right to look into the terms of the constitutions they submit to Congress. I rose simply to enter this caveat, and I think if gentlemen will read the report of the reconstruction committee they will find nothing particularly inconsistent with what I have said in relation to that matter. Upon all these questions, separate or otherwise, as they come up I am ready to act when they come; but no general rule can be established which will be binding upon me with reference to questions of this description: each one is to stand upon its own particular merits or demerits, as the case may be.

Now, sir, what the reconstruction committee submitted was this: when the constitutional amendment has been legally and constitutionally adopted and become a part of the Constitution itself, then, in connection with the bill which was introduced at the same time, any State which shall have adopted it may resume its position in the Union.

Mr. JOHNSON. You speak of the States in rebellion.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It referred to them of course, whether it said so or not, because it could have no application to States recognized as members of the Union.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I have the language of the report before me.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I remember its substance.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The language is "that whenever the above-recited amendment shall have become part of the Constitution, and any State lately in insurrection shall have ratified the same, and shall have modified its Constitution and laws in conformity therewith, the Senators and Representatives from such State, if found duly elected and qualified, may, after having taken the required oaths of office, be admitted," &c.

That was the language of the bill accompanying the report, and it went on:

"And be it further enacted, That when any State lately in insurrection shall have ratified the foregoing amendment to the Constitution"—

That is whether the other States ratified it or not—

"any part of the direct tax under the act of August 5, 1861, which may remain due and unpaid by such State may be assumed and paid by such State, and the payment thereof, upon proper assurances, may be postponed for a period not exceeding ten years."

These are the two provisions about the ratification of the amendment by the States lately in rebellion.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That is precisely as I recollected it, and it supports what I have said. "And shall have modified its constitution and laws in conformity therewith," is the language. Am I not to look to their constitutions and their laws? Am I not to see whether they are "in conformity therewith." Am I to take it for granted, because a Legislature formed as these Legislatures are has voted ay or voted no, that therefore their constitution and their laws, which have never been submitted to Congress, are "in conformity therewith?" Am I not to look at them? That brings it precisely to the point I have been suggesting, that all these matters are matters for consideration.

I consider that the question of the constitutional amendment has been submitted to the voters of the United States, and that the recent elections have established that that is to be supported and insisted upon. That was the issue made; it was the issue with the President and with all who opposed it; and that I deem to be established. The bill we have not acted upon. The bill has not been taken up in either House of Congress and acted upon. Congress has never expressed an opinion upon that proposition, although it is part of the report of the reconstruction committee. But I say now, as I have said before, I am as desirous as any man can be that this unhappy controversy should be ended; I am as desirous as any man can be that all these rebellious States should be back again in the Union on a perfect equality with those that are there now, and I will do everything in my power to bring it about, and I will not be too stringent as to conditions; I am willing to yield much and to suffer much; but I will not yield under any circumstances the guarantees we have insisted upon up to this date, and such further ones if necessary—I do not say now that any others are necessary—as will secure the Union against a recurrence of a disaster such as we have suffered.

Now, sir, if the Senator wants to ask me any question pertinent to what I have been saying I am perfectly willing to answer.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The point which I was discussing, and which my learned friend has passed over, in my judgment, without fully meeting, is this: whether Congress did submit that constitutional amendment to those States, assuming that those States lately in insurrection had the power as States to ratify or to reject it. That was the question I was discussing.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I will answer that distinctly if the Senator is ready for his answer now.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Certainly, I will hear what the Senator has to say.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Congress said nothing whatever on the subject; and the reason is manifest. Congress submits a constitutional amendment in the ordinary form; it says it shall be submitted to the Legislatures of the several States of the Union; and there it stops. There is the submission.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I agree with the Senator that Congress took no action—

Mr. FESSENDEN. I have not finished my answer yet. It does not follow that because we provide for submitting the amendment to the several States every State is in a condition to act upon it. The reconstruction committee recommended that when the amendment should be adopted by the number of States necessary in order to make it a part of the Constitution of the United States, without saying or intimating how many or how few were necessary, then any of the rebellious States which should have adopted it and conformed their laws and constitutions thereto should be admitted. What did that mean? It did not assume to say that either of those States was then in a condition to be admitted, or even in a condition to have the constitutional amendment submitted to them. But the time may arrive, if it has not yet come, when they may have Legislatures legally elected and constitutions properly formed. Because they are not endowed with the capacity to act as members of the Union to-day it does not follow that they may not be to-morrow or next week or next year. We could not undertake to say when that would be, whether it had taken place or not; but so far as the reconstruction committee expressed an opinion in their report it was that there was not a legal government in any one of those States; and if there is no legal government in any one of them they are not in a condition to act on this question or any other.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. President, it is true that Congress did not pass the bill or act on the bill any further than that in the House of Representatives when it was called up it was laid on the table by the yeas and nays by a very large vote; but the question that has arisen has not been on any act of Congress, but on the understanding of those gentlemen who took part in the submission of this constitutional amendment. Upon the one side it has been alleged that the submission of this amendment was made to the States upon an implied pledge that if it became a part of the Constitution and the States lately in insurrection ratified it and conformed their laws and constitutions to it, they would have the right to be admitted here on this floor if they sent proper representatives. The Senator from Ohio says that of the States acting upon this question five have rejected the amendment. The point which I was discussing was whether this constitutional amendment was submitted to these States for them to act upon, and whether by submitting it to these States we did not imply of necessity that these States were capable of either accepting or rejecting it.

Sir, the reconstruction committee, so far as they are concerned, are bound as a matter of course by the report which they have made, and the reconstruction committee, by the bill which they introduced, declared in so many words that the States in the South did have the power to ratify the amendment, and they held out a pecuniary inducement to those States to persuade them to the adoption of the amendment by pledging themselves that if any one of those States would ratify the amendment the payment of its direct tax should be postponed.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The distinction is, if the Senator will allow me to interrupt him, that the reconstruction committee did not say they were now in a condition to do it.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The reconstruction committee, in the bill which they submitted declared "that when any State lately in insurrection"—of course that referred to States of the South—"shall have ratified the foregoing amendment," the payment of its direct tax shall be postponed. I think that that on the part of the reconstruction committee assumes them to be States.

Mr. FESSENDEN. As now organized, at present?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. It assumed them to be States with power to accept or reject, to ratify or to refuse to ratify. If they ratified it, the pecuniary consideration was held out to them for doing it of postponing the payment of their direct tax. If they refused to do it, as a matter of course the tax was not postponed.

I undertake to say what I said a little while ago, that this is one of those questions upon which you must take either one ground or the other, and there is no neutrality between the positions. Either the Senator from Massachusetts is right when he says that they are not States—

Mr. SUMNER. There is no valid government; that is what I say.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. No valid State government to which a constitutional amendment can be submitted?

Mr. SUMNER. That I hold.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. You must either take that ground, or you must take the other ground, that they are valid State governments to which it can be submitted. What I said was that the Senator from Ohio insisted that it had been submitted, and that five of the States had already rejected it; and if they have the power to reject they have the power to accept, and it of necessity implies that they have a State Legislature with power to act either for or against.

Mr. President, I have no disposition to detain the Senate from a vote on the pending measure which is now before the body if it is desirable to come to a vote to-night; but so much had been said on this question that I felt called upon to say a single word myself.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, the debate has taken a very wide range and the proposition has taken several shapes. I do not wish just at this moment to make any extended remarks, but I feel called upon by what the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WILSON] has said in submitting his amendment to say a word or two. He asks me whether I will accept the amendment which he proposes. To this I have to say that the amendment as drawn by myself accords more nearly with my own idea of what is the best mode of arriving at it; still I am not tenacious about the forms in which the object shall be achieved. I understand that there are other amendments pending or proposed to be offered, one of which proposes to enforce this as a condition-precedent by attaching penalties to any who shall violate it. That would be another shape in which this might be enforced. The present amendment as presented by myself designs to submit it to a vote of the people. The amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts designs to submit it, as was done in the case of Missouri, to a vote of the Legislature.

My own view of this matter is that it would derive its force and its efficacy rather from the act of Congress which we might pass, and thus become a fundamental clause in that act, than from the mere mode of assent which it might receive from the people through their Legislature, or through their direct popular vote. That its force and its efficacy would inhere in it by virtue of the congressional act of the fundamental clause therein contained. And therefore I am not so very tenacious about the modes in which it may be arrived at; still I do want to get something that will be efficacious.

Now, it is proper and right to say in regard to the amendment which has been submitted by the Senator from Massachusetts, and which is a copy of the Missouri resolution, that that resolution has been efficacious up to this day. That resolution was placed upon the State of Missouri; it was assented to by the Legislature of that State, and it has never been violated by the people of the State nor I believe has it ever been decided unconstitutional by the Supreme Court.

However, I desire to say that I think the questions which are involved here are of too great a magnitude to be driven through under any pressure for the purpose of getting this State at once into the Union. I do not think that the ultimate object to be attained, the getting of Nebraska into the Union, will be forwarded one particle by undertaking to press it through in this manner at this time, in advance of a deliberate consideration of all these questions. Now, I for one should like to have some little time to examine these various propositions that are to be submitted and whose view is to harmonize our own friends in their position. Unquestionably the Republican party of this country has got to take a ground on the whole suffrage question, as relating to the Territories and as relating to the States, that will be inconsistent with the position taken here in the State of Nebraska. I would like to harmonize the party in its positions on that subject. I should like to have the necessary delay for concert and for consultation and for examination, and therefore, sir, I will move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. WADE. I hope not. I hope we shall get a final vote on this proposition before we adjourn.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is not debatable.

Mr. WADE. I call for the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken resulted—yeas 14, nays 25; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Brown, Buckalew, Davis, Dixon, Doolittle, Edmunds, Henderson, Johnson, Norton, Patterson, Poland, Sprague, Sumner, and Williams—14.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Cattell, Chandler, Crain, Creswell, Fogg, Foster, Fredlinghousen, Hendricks, Howard, Howe, Kirkwood, Lane, Morgan, Morrill, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Ross, Stewart, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Wade, Willey, Wilson, and Yates—25.

ABSENT—Messrs. Conness, Cowan, Fessenden, Fowler, Grimes, Guthrie, Harris, McDougall, Nemith, Nye, Riddle, Saulsbury, and Sherman—13.

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, in the interpolation between the Senator from Wisconsin and the Senator from Maine, I should have been glad if the Senator from Maine had been asked to give an explicit answer to some such question as this: suppose the States lately in rebellion had taken no notice at all of the proposed constitutional amendment, could they have formed any State constitutions which would have been satisfactory to my honorable friend from Maine, and which would have induced him to vote for their admission or readmission into the Union. I will illustrate it by the case of Tennessee. Suppose Tennessee had not acted upon the subject of the proposed amendment at all but had adopted precisely the constitution which she did adopt, and upon that constitution had asked to be readmitted as a State into the Union, would the honorable Senator upon that state of the case with regard to Tennessee have voted for her admission into the Union?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I had been desirous of submitting some observations to the Senate on the subjects which are under consideration at some little length, but inasmuch as I perceive that brethren of my political faith are not disposed to listen to any further debate on the subject, I shall not attempt at this hour of the day to go forward with what I was desirous of saying. If I had had an earlier opportunity without trespassing upon gentlemen older here than myself, I should have had something to say on the subject; but I do not wish to occupy the time which my friends here are desirous to devote to voting, with anything which I can say.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I do not think the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts ought to be adopted without some reflection on the part of the Senate. Although it has the form of the enactment of 1821 in relation to Missouri, I do not think the cases are at all analogous, and upon that subject I wish to submit just one or two remarks. The act of Congress of 1821 proposed that Missouri should be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States in all respects whatever—

"Upon the fundamental condition that the fourth clause of the twenty-sixth section of the third article of the constitution submitted on the part of the said State to Congress shall never be construed to authorize the passage of any law, and that no law shall be passed in conformity thereto, by which any citizen of either of the States of this Union shall be excluded from the enjoyment of any of the privileges and immunities to which such citizen is entitled under the Constitution of the United States."

It was claimed in Congress that one of the provisions of the constitution of Missouri was itself in violation of the Constitution of the United States. One of the provisions of that constitution prohibited the immigration into that State of free persons of color; and it was claimed by some that they being citizens of the United States could not, under the Federal Constitution, be excluded from the right of immigration to the State of Missouri. To settle that question, as a matter of compromise, this act was adopted which amounts to just this, that that clause in the constitution of the State of Missouri shall not be so construed by the Legislature of Missouri as to authorize the enactment of any law in violation of the Constitution of the United States. This act of Congress accepted by Missouri did not propose to change the constitution of Missouri at all, but was a declaration that the constitution of Missouri should not be construed so as to make it in violation of the Constitution of the United States.

But what is proposed here? It is proposed by the Senator from Missouri to change the constitution of Nebraska. Now, does Nebraska come here as a State with a constitution? If a constitution, then how was that constitution adopted? No Senator has claimed that the constitution of Nebraska was adopted merely by the act of the Legislature. It has greater force altogether than a mere legislative act. It is claimed to be a fundamental law deriving its validity and its force and power from the will and act of the people. A constitutional convention, it is understood, may adopt a constitution without submitting it to the people, because the delegates are elected for that purpose. The act of the delegates in constitutional conventions is the act of the people, and they may make a law above an enactment by a Legislature, a law that shall govern a Legislature.

Then it was the act of the people in voting upon this constitution that gave it the force of a constitution. Now, how can that constitution that is adopted be changed? Can Congress do it? The Senator from Ohio, who has charge of this bill has argued most emphatically that Congress cannot. Congress cannot change the constitution of a State proposing admission into the Union. Then this act of Congress proposed by the Senator from Missouri will not change the constitution of Nebraska. Then how is it to be changed? By submitting this act of Congress to the Legislature of Nebraska, and then saying that the Legislature of Nebraska acting with Congress may change the constitution; in other words, Congress and the Legislature of a State may make a bargain by which the constitution of that State may be changed.

I presume that this constitution has some provision in regard to its own amendment and how it shall be amended, and I suppose that that is by some formal proceeding which shall secure the judgment and wish of the people on the subject; but we propose to change the constitution upon a subject over which the State has exclusive control. Upon the subject of franchise we propose to change that constitution and in effect to strike out the word "white" and to allow white and black to vote, not by the voice of the people, not in any form of proceeding which has ever been recognized as changing a constitution, but by a bargain between Congress and the Legislature of the State. I submit to Senators whether that can be done. Can we now propose to the Legislature of Nebraska to change this Constitution which was adopted by the people; and if the Legislature of Nebraska agrees to it, will that make a constitution for Nebraska? If we can make one provision of a constitution, can we not make an entire constitution in that way; and is it possible that Congress can submit to a territorial Legislature a proposed constitution and that being accepted by the territorial Legislature it shall become a government for the people and bind all future legislation? I do not understand the most liberal to have ever gone so far. This, sir, is all I desire to say on this point.

Mr. SUMNER. Mr. President, every step we have taken in this discussion shows its importance, its magnitude. It is important as a precedent; but I submit that it becomes of transcendent importance when we consider its bearing upon our duties to the rebel States. It is on that account that I do not sympathize with my friend before me [Mr. WADE] when he seeks to press this to so swift a conclusion. There are Senators here who are now anxious to speak upon it. There is the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS,] who never speaks without engaging the attention of the Senate and saying what we are all glad to listen to. There are other Senators here who, unless I have been misinformed, are anxious to be heard upon this great question; and yet the Senator from Ohio insists that we shall stay here to vote while those Senators are practically silenced. He knows very well that at this late hour they will not undertake to speak. When therefore he presses his vote, it is to press them to be silent.

Now, sir, I cannot sympathize with that. I think that the time has come for the adjournment to-day. Let us go home and consider the new form which this proposition assumes, consider the criticism which is made by the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. HENDRICKS.] That certainly is entitled to much weight. I do not say, however, that it is entirely correct; but I do say that before we embark in favor of this proposition and commit the fortunes of the Republic to it, we ought to consider its character. We ought to consider whether in all respects it is sea-worthy, whether it can carry us safely over the great sea which we are to traverse. Let us therefore consider it carefully and let Senators who desire to speak upon it be heard. Do not let them be silenced by what I would almost call a snap judgment. This question, sir, has not been considered in this Chamber according to its dignity. It has not been debated enough. Senators do not yet see its importance, its grandeur, and how essential its right settlement is to the peace, security, and welfare of this Republic. If you go wrong on this question, sir, you do more than you can do in any other way to shut the gates of peace on this Republic. I say, therefore, for the sake of the Republic and that we may bring about a settlement of the great question before us, let us carefully now consider the form which the proposition shall assume on which we are to vote. In that view, sir, I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mr. President—
The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is not debatable.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I do not propose to debate it, but I propose to suggest to the Senate and to the Senator having this bill in charge that as we adjourn to-morrow for the holidays, some of us will want to start home to-morrow evening, and it is desirable to have a vote on this bill at some early hour to-morrow. We have frequently agreed upon an hour for a vote, and I suggest that we take a vote on this bill at four o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. POMEROY. That will do.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is moved that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Before that vote is taken I ask the Senator to withdraw the motion for a moment and I will renew it if he desires.

Mr. SUMNER. I withdraw it to accommodate the Senator.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I propose, if there be no objection, that it be considered the sense of the Senate that we shall take the vote at four o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. BROWN. I suggest that some Senators who are going away may probably start to-night, and there may be no quorum here to-morrow.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I know of no Senators going to start to-night.

Mr. BROWN. I know of several.

Mr. WADE. I know that when debates run into the night they take very long, and latterly we have been in the habit of making some arrangement as to the time of taking the vote. That seems to shorten debate and be more satisfactory. We have done it frequently.

Now, if I can be assured that we shall have a quorum here to-morrow and we can agree upon an hour when we shall certainly get the question and finish the bill before the final adjournment I shall be willing to accede to that, inasmuch as several gentlemen want to be heard. Of course, nothing can be done here that is binding among us, but if there is an understanding that there will be a quorum here—

Mr. TRUMBULL. There will be a quorum, I have no doubt.

Mr. WADE. Then with that understanding, if Senators assent to it all around, I shall not resist an adjournment any longer.

Mr. BROWN. I do not assent to it.

Mr. SUMNER. Now the motion to adjourn. The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Indiana is entitled to the floor.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania who wishes to say a word.

Mr. BUCKALEW. A bill like this ought to be voted upon with the Senate full, and if a number of members are going away to-night or in the morning it would be manifestly improper to take the vote on this subject to-morrow. As to myself, I am willing to conform my action to the pleasure of the majority of the Senate. I have been with an observant eye during the day looking to a point of time when I could address the Chair, not for the purpose of making a general discourse such as we have listened to, but for the narrow purpose, perhaps the unusual purpose in connection with such debates, of speaking upon the question itself and stating distinctly the reasons why I vote against this particular bill and shall vote against the bill which will follow it, and shall also at the present or future sessions vote against the several other bills of like character which will follow these.

Now, sir, I beg to remark that although this debate has been somewhat protracted, although it has gone over several days of the session of the Senate, and it has appeared no doubt tedious to gentlemen, yet we are discussing a question of the first magnitude and a question that will not expend its force and its interest with the present measure. Since the conclusion of the war we are passing upon the general question of the admission of States; and it will be a calamity, it will be an inconvenience, it will be an evil if the Senate, for the purpose of getting a hurried vote should commit itself upon this bill, because the position we assume here is a position which will control and perhaps ought to control our action hereafter.

Several gentlemen who have spoken are interested with reference to the connection of this bill with the general subject of suffrage. I feel no interest upon that point, but I do feel a deep and a real interest, and I have a right to feel it as the representative of a State of three million people, in the question of the magnitude of the new States which are hereafter to be introduced into this Union; of the time, manner, and circumstances under which constitutions framed by them shall be received as the basis of their introduction into this Confederacy of States.

Now, sir, I have some ideas that I would desire to express to the Senate, not after this bill is passed and the subsequent one, but now before the judgment of the Senate is pronounced. I do not know that anything I can say will change the ultimate vote of this body on the question we are now considering; but I desire to take up the enabling acts introduced in 1864 by the Senator from Ohio as the organ of the Committee on Territories; to show the circumstances under which those bills were passed; the objects in their enactment; and then to follow that out by a statement of the several steps which have since been taken in these Territories and in Congress with reference to their admission, and to show from an examination or exploration of this new field of inquiry that there are considerations which have not yet been presented to the Senate in this debate, which according to the best of my judgment ought to be considered before this question is determined.

All I have to say in conclusion is, that if the Senator from Ohio and the Senate are desirous of going on to-night I am content to occupy a brief space in the argument I have suggested.

Mr. HENDRICKS. If the Senator will yield to me, I will move an adjournment.

Mr. BUCKALEW. In a moment. I was going to say that I am willing to deliver my observations to-night if the Senate desire to proceed with the discussion to-night; or to reserve them for a future occasion.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. WADE. With the understanding before suggested, I shall make no objection.

Mr. BROWN. There is no understanding about it.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. Then let us have the yeas and nays.

Mr. RAMSEY. If there is no stipulation, let us vote down the motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 19, nays 19; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Brown, Buckalew, Cragin, Davis, Dixon, Doolittle, Edmunds, Harris, Henderson, Hendricks, Morgan, Norton, Patterson, Poland, Pomeroy, Sprague, Sumner, Van Winkle, and Willey—19.

NAYS—Messrs. Cattell, Chandler, Creswell, Fogg, Foster, Frelinghuysen, Howard, Howe, Kirkwood, Lane, Morrill, Ramsey, Ross, Stewart, Trumbull, Wade, Williams, Wilson, and Yates—19.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Conness, Cowan, Fessenden, Fowler, Grimes, Guthrie, Johnson, McDougall, Nesmith, Nye, Riddle, Saulsbury, and Sherman—14.

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. It seems there is rather a thin attendance. There are several absentees who I think have come into the Senate since the calling of the roll was commenced whose names were not on the roll. I suggest that the absentees be called again.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The vote has been taken, and the result announced; and that matter is not now open for discussion.

Mr. SUMNER. It is evident that several Senators went home supposing that the Senate was about to adjourn. I think on that ground, if on no other, it would not be advisable for us to go on now. I therefore move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. CRESWELL. Is a motion to adjourn now in order just after the same motion has been voted down, without any intervening motion?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is in order. Discussion has taken place since the last motion was put.

Mr. WADE. I hope we shall not adjourn. The motion was not agreed to; there being on a division—ayes 16, noes 16.

Mr. HOWE. I rise to inquire what the question is.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment moved by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. COWAN] to the amendment of the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. BROWN.]

Mr. HOWE. I should like to hear it read. The Secretary read Mr. COWAN'S amendment, which was to add to the amendment of Mr. BROWN these words:

Provided, and it is hereby distinctly understood, That the people of the Territory of Nebraska when admitted as a State into the Union shall owe direct and personal allegiance, each one of them, to the Government of the United States, and that the said State of Nebraska shall not hereafter claim nor be taken to have power or authority to convert the citizens of said State into foreigners or alien enemies, so that they may as a consequence of crime be held and considered as such.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is on the amendment of the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. BROWN.] Is the Senate ready for the question?

Mr. SUMNER. I do not think the Senate is ready for the question. I think it is too important a proposition for us to be called to vote on it without seeing it fairly before us and understanding its bearing in every respect, constitutionally, legally, and politically. I am not satisfied that the proposition in its final form will be effective. It may be; I am not sure of it. I am anxious that it should be considered in these aspects. I wish to know whether it is a proposition that we can safely accept at this moment. I hope, therefore, that it will be printed, and I move that the pending proposition be printed for the use of the Senate. I mean to include the amendment of my colleague, of course.

Mr. WILSON. I have sent my amendment to the desk.

Mr. BROWN. My amendment has been printed.

Mr. SUMNER. I mean the substitute of my colleague.

Mr. WILSON. I wish to have that printed. The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion to print the pending amendment.

Mr. WILSON. My amendment is an amendment to the amendment moved by the Senator from Missouri. It is proposed to print the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. SUMNER. I want them all printed.

Mr. CRESWELL. To print all the pending amendments?

Mr. SUMNER. Yes, sir. There is only one that I regard of very great importance, and that is the substitute proposition, and that I do think the Senate ought not to act upon without seeing it in print before them.

Mr. CRESWELL. I was about to remark—

Mr. WILSON. Will the Senator from Maryland give me the floor a moment?

Mr. CRESWELL. Certainly.

Mr. WILSON. I understand the question before the Senate is the amendment moved by me to the amendment of the Senator from Missouri. Does the Chair recognize that fact?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The vote having been taken upon the proposed amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania, the question now is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts to the amendment of the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. CRESWELL. I was about to remark that I have no objection whatever to the motion to print, provided gentlemen will make the understanding suggested by a gentleman on the other side, namely, that we have a vote to-morrow at four o'clock. If that meets the approbation of the chairman of the Committee on Territories I am content to accept it.

Mr. WADE. I offered to accept that, but it was not accepted as I understood. I was willing to make that compromise.

Mr. BROWN. I for one am not willing to make any such understanding as that.

Mr. WADE. I understand so.

Mr. BROWN. I do not wish to bind anybody else by it for this reason: that the small time that would be given to-morrow, one or two hours, would be totally insufficient to discuss this question as gentlemen here present would wish to discuss it. If we are going to enter into a discussion of it let us have time to discuss it fully and fairly. If we are not, let us be forced to vote upon it now. I, for one, am not willing to make any such arrangement as that. It will simply be to carry over the question without doing any good as far as discussion goes. It is perhaps right that I should say further, in justice to myself, that I shall probably be compelled to leave the city this evening by the eight o'clock train. I would therefore rather vote on the bill before I go, if it is not to be put over for some little time. It will be impossible for me to delay my departure for reasons that I could state if desirable.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion to print the pending amendment.

Mr. WADE. That motion to print of course involves a motion to adjourn before we take the question. If I could be made to believe that this simple proposition that is as common here in this legislative body as the common counts in assumpsit are in courts of justice, had all at once assumed a revolutionary importance, or such a degree of importance as is attributed to it, I should approach it with great fear and trembling; but I have been here a good while; several new States have been admitted into the Union since I have been here, and it was about the most peaceable proceeding we have ever had. It made no jar whatever in the body-politic. This Territory now stands upon precisely the same footing with every other one that has been admitted since I have been here. It contains nothing more nor less than all the rest of them have contained.

Gentlemen tell us that it is connected somehow with our dealings with the settled States. It has no kind of reference to them. It is an independent proposition not at all disturbed by anything that we have to do with the States that have seceded. In their reconstruction questions entirely detached and different, having no connection with this whatever, will be up. I know of no reason why we should not let this Territory come in upon the same principles that we ever have let other Territories come in. We let in the Territory of Nevada awhile ago. It has not more population to-day than Nebraska. It has no element in it entitling it more to be a member of this Union than Nebraska has. It ought to have come in. It was well it did come in. I want to see these States extending in a solid column right through to the Pacific ocean, as will be done if you admit the two States that are now knocking at your doors.

There is no great question involved in it. It seems to me that there is no necessity for that precaution that gentlemen allude to. The Senator from Massachusetts believes it is one of the most important questions that ever came before Congress.

Mr. SUMNER. I do not doubt it.

Mr. WADE. Well, I cannot be made to see it. Nebraska, one of the most patriotic, one of the most orderly of communities, with numbers sufficient, with a good, glorious republican constitution akin to all the rest of these western constitutions and just like them, coming in here, I do not think will make a revolution at all, nor bind anybody as to the course he shall see fit to take in reconstructing States in rebellion. Therefore I do not see any reason why we should not vote on the question to-night. We have got a vast deal to do this session. I never have known important business crowding upon Congress as it is now; and yet in full view of all this gentlemen would persist in adjourning for two weeks and now want to adjourn to deliver arguments hereafter. They have not had time for argument, they say. When the question of adjourning was up, I was opposed to that, and yet the same gentlemen who want to make arguments here and spend a week longer on this proposition are the very men who will adjourn you two weeks in the midst of an important session like this. I think we have got a good deal to do this session, even more than we have time to do, and I know the habits of this body well enough to know that if this question is suffered to pass off now for two weeks, all that has been said upon the subject will be said over again. We have spent I believe three days on it, and we shall have to spend three or four days more upon it, and we shall have no more light upon it than we have now. I am opposed to adjourning unless we can make an arrangement to take the vote to-morrow. Then I have no objection; but that it seems we cannot do, and therefore I hope we shall decide the question to-night.

Mr. HENDERSON. I am certainly a friend of this measure. I expect to vote for the admission of the State. I have not failed to vote for the admission of new States, and I expect to make no exception in this case to my usual course of conduct; but I have consistently voted this evening for an adjournment. I make it a rule when four and a half o'clock arrives to vote for an adjournment whether we are in the short session or the long session. I have been here long enough to find out that we do but little after that hour except to take the question upon motions to adjourn. Now, sir, we shall do nothing this afternoon. We may remain here until eight o'clock but we shall take no vote on this measure. The old adage of festina lente perhaps will apply very well. Shall we not get along better by taking a little time to consider and reflect upon this question? The Senator from Massachusetts offers an amendment. I am rather favorable to it. It is a very important question for us to consider who are friendly to this measure; shall we adopt it or reject it. I really do not know which is better. I am now inclined to vote for it. If we vote for it, can we carry the bill by a two-thirds vote? I apprehend it will be necessary virtually to pass this measure by a two-thirds vote. I understand from the Senators from this State that the Legislature can be called together in the course of a very short time and that they can act upon it. If so, I do not see any objection to the amendment. I am really in favor of the principle that all these Territories shall admit suffrage regardless of color. I believe we have got to come to it, not only in the new States, but in the old ones. I so expressed myself at the last session. I have not changed my mind. I believe that it is fair, it is right that every man should have a voice in the Government, who discharges the duties of citizenship. Hence I have no objection to it; I should like to see the amendment adopted; but would it not be better for the friends of the measure to consult together and see whether that makes it stronger or not? I apprehend it has eventually to be carried by a two-thirds vote in this body; and yet the Senator from Ohio insists that we shall remain here after five o'clock in the evening to discuss this question when a very large minority of the body are determined to have no vote on it to-night. I do not see that we ever do any good after that hour, and I now move that we adjourn.

Mr. SUMNER. I hope there will be an order to print.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion to adjourn supersedes all others and the question is not debatable.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I wish to appeal to the Senator from Missouri to withdraw that motion for one moment. I wish to move that this bill be postponed to and made the special order for January 7.

Mr. HENDERSON. I cannot withdraw it. The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is not withdrawn.

Mr. WADE called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 15, nays 20; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Brown, Buckalew, Cragin, Davis, Dixon, Doolittle, Edmunds, Henderson, Hendricks, Morgan, Patterson, Poland, Pomeroy, Sprague, and Sumner—15.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Cattell, Chandler, Creswell, Fogg, Foster, Frelinghuysen, Howard, Howe, Kirkwood, Lane, Morrill, Ross, Stewart, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Wade, Wiley, Wilson, and Yates—20.

ABSENT—Messrs. Conness, Cowan, Fessenden, Fowler, Grimes, Guthrie, Harris, Johnson, McDougall, Nesmith, Norton, Nye, Ramsey, Riddle, Saulsbury, Sherman, and Williams—17.

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is on the motion that the pending amendment be printed.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. SUMNER. I have one word to say in reply to the Senator from Ohio. He did not see the importance of this question. He says it is the question of every day, a commonplace question. There is the precise difference between the Senator from Ohio and other Senators on this floor. There have been occasions when the Senator has seen the importance of a question of human rights. In an unhappy condition now he does not see that importance.

Mr. WADE. A "fundamental condition." [Laughter.]

Mr. SUMNER. A condition of mind. [Laughter.] The Senator has not forgotten a contest in this Chamber in which he took part with myself to defeat a proposition not so objectionable perhaps as that which he is now favoring, to precipitate Louisiana back into this Chamber. The Senator remembers it well. He knows that that contest began at an earlier hour in the afternoon than this, and that it was only toward midnight when there was an adjournment, and nothing was gained. The Senator from Illinois [Mr. TRUMBULL] tried to put that question through the Senate; but even he, with all his abilities and the just influence that belonged to his position, could not do it. The Senator from Ohio will not be instructed by that example. He now proposes a kindred proposition. He seeks to introduce into the Union a State which defies the first principle of human rights. The Senator from Ohio becomes the champion of that community. He who has so often raised his voice here for human rights now treats the question as trivial. He says it is a technicality only.

Sir, can a question of human rights be a technicality? Can a constitution which undertakes to disfranchise a whole race be treated in that respect as only a technicality? And yet that is the position of the Senator from Ohio. Why, sir, the other day he did openly arraign the constitution of Louisiana and the effort of our excellent President, Mr. Lincoln, who sought to press it upon us. Now, forgetful of that he tries to do to-night what the Senator from Illinois tried to do then. I doubt, sir, whether he will succeed to-night better than the Senator from Illinois succeeded then. The constitution of Louisiana at that time was odious; it ought not to have been foisted upon the Senate; and I doubt if there is any Senator now on the right side who does not rejoice that that constitution was defeated.

But, sir, you are now to do the same thing for this constitution which you did for that of Louisiana. It must not be allowed to pass this body so long as it undertakes to disfranchise persons on account of color.

Mr. CRESWELL. Will you "filibuster" all the time?

Mr. SUMNER. I say it must not be allowed to pass this body if possible, if it can be prevented, so long as it contains so offensive an exclusion as that. But, sir, I do not wish to indulge in these remarks. I wish that this subject should be gravely discussed so that we may vote upon it properly. I wish that the proposition of my colleague may be carefully considered. I wish to know whether, if that is adopted, there will be a sufficient security. If there will be such security, I shall be very glad to vote for it and accept that, and then we may all harmonize in the support of the bill. But, if that or some kindred proposition cannot be adopted, I shall be obliged at the last moment, even if I stand alone, to go against this bill and to make every effort that I can to prevent its passage. I move now, sir, that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. WADE. I hope not.

Mr. SUMNER. On that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 18, nays 19; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Brown, Buckalew, Cragin, Davis, Doolittle, Edmunds, Henderson, Hendricks, Morgan, Patterson, Poland, Sprague, and Sumner—18.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Conness, Cowan, Dixon, Fessenden, Fowler, Grimes, Guthrie, Harris, Johnson, McDougall, Nesmith, Norton, Nye, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Riddle, Saulsbury, Sherman, and Williams—20.

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

Mr. WADE. One word in reply to the Senator from Massachusetts, who thinks that I am altogether pertinacious, if not obstinate on this subject, and thinks that my conduct at the present time is inconsistent with what it was when he and I were opposing the admission of Louisiana two years ago. There is no analogy, I say again, between the two cases, not the least in the world. Louisiana was a State organized under a military order emanating from the President of the United States—military order No. 37; and of course in my judgment it was not a constitutional body. It had no right to be in the Union. This is a Territory, as I have said a good many times, loyal, seeking to come into the Union in the old, beaten track—nothing unusual about it, nothing to hang an argument upon except it is the high-sounding words of the Senator from Massachusetts; and if a man were to hear him speak now about the importance of what I have compared to a count in assumpsit, would believe that it was an indictment on which half the world would be annihilated. And he speaks of my obstinacy! Why, sir, he stands up here almost alone against his friends, nearly all favorable to this measure. I have no doubt had it not been for what I will not call his obstinacy, this measure would have passed on Monday to the satisfaction of nine tenths of all those that generally act with him. His will must prevail against the whole body, or they must give way to him, for he intimates and gives us to understand that this bill never shall pass except it is in accordance with his judgment, or if it ever does it will not be until he is a good deal older than he is now. I generally content myself, if I differ with the great majority of my friends, to record that difference without any factious opposition to their will. I do not think that I ever can be accused of that.

Mr. SUMNER. How was it with regard to Louisiana?

Mr. WADE. In the Louisiana case I acted in accordance with many of my fellows, and all of us had the conviction that the measure was unconstitutional. You do not pretend that this is unconstitutional, or that it is any infraction of the usages of this body from time immemorial; but you allege that there is something connected with this proposition different from what has ever before been presented. Not at all. You say I am going against human rights. No, sir; in my judgment I am going in favor of human rights, to strengthen a body who are the advocates of human rights, to strengthen our arm, so that we may resist. If it becomes necessary, any and all departments of this Government that may seek to trample down human rights. Your view of the subject is an exceedingly narrow one. I am anxious to reinforce this body with elements that go for liberty and right, while you seek to exclude them and thrust them out on a mere technicality. I know, sir, that the cause we have in view will be greatly promoted by carrying out this measure to admit these States and the worthy men whom they have sent to represent them here; and I think it is very ungracious now as an after-thought to bring up objections to their admission that were never dreamed of till lately.

How long is it since you let in a State with a constitution exactly like this? If the Senator from Massachusetts made objection to it then, I am not aware of the fact. When the enabling act was passed without imposing any such condition as he now contends for, he made no objection that I know of. These people have complied with every demand you have made; and now all at once it is proposed to treat them as though they were rebels seeking to destroy this Union, instead of forming a most loyal and worthy part of it. I am not standing here to contend against human rights. I am in furtherance of the rights of man going to bring into this body those who can aid and assist us, and will do it always to maintain our great principles. The Senator from Massachusetts takes a narrow view. He would thrust them out and leave it uncertain whether the Territory may not be consigned to the hands of our mortal enemies. He has no regard to the consequences. A little miserable technicality, a "sticking in the bark," as Lord Coke would say, is the guide to his action here, and renders him too often entirely impracticable. I believe before high Heaven that the great cause of human rights would have been further advanced to-day than it is now if he had been more practical. I remember well how at the last session the Senator from Massachusetts withstood the first proposition to amend the Constitution reported by the reconstruction committee and threw it back five or six months, in opposition to almost every one of his friends here. It was, as a consequence, delayed till after the adjournment of the State Legislatures. There stood Maryland ready to adopt your constitutional amendment, if her Legislature could have received it in time; but it was opposed here, I will not say factiously, until the time for action there had passed by, and thus you lost one State, perhaps for many years; and the Senator finally voted for a proposition just as objectionable on the point upon which he made his opposition as the one that he contended against so strenuously.

Sir, it will not do always to stand upon these narrow grounds. It is not always statesman-like to do it. I think it is better to look to consequences, to see what great bearing measures before the Senate will have. I want these loyal States in the Union. I am more anxious that they should come in than I am that the southern States should be reconstructed. They can well wait and undergo a probation until we are satisfied that they have reformed, repented, and become loyal.

But, sir, I do not wish to pursue this kind of argument; I know it is taking time. Now, let me say to the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. HENDERSON,] who says that all the questions have been taken here early, at four or five o'clock, that I do not remember of one single great question that ever has passed this body since I have been here except after just such a scuffle as this late in the night. We always debate them until gentlemen are tired of debate and submit to have the question taken. I cannot remember, I say again, unless an arrangement has been made, an occasion when any question of considerable importance has been settled in this Senate in the daytime.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I move that the further consideration of this bill be postponed until the 7th day of January next and made the order of the day at one o'clock; and I desire to say just one or two words upon that subject.

It is very evident to every Senator that the discussion that is going on this evening is of no practical benefit so far as this bill is concerned. One or two hours have been expended in a controversy between the Senator from Massachusetts and the Senator from Ohio, and I sympathize with both Senators, [laughter;] but I do not see that it is of any particular advantage for us to stay here to continue that further. It is not a fair opportunity now, as every Senator will say, to debate this bill and the amendments that are proposed. The Senator from Pennsylvania wishes to address the Senate upon this bill; he says upon the bill itself; the Senator from Massachusetts wishes to be heard upon the question of the rights of man; and I wish to hear both of them, but not just now, [laughter;] and neither of them wishes to speak just now.

I will say to the Senator from Ohio, and I think he will concede the fact, that although I am opposed to his bill and will vote against it, yet I have interposed no factious opposition. I desire him to have an early and fair hearing of his bill, and if there is a majority of this body in favor of it let them pass it; if there is a majority against it, which I think is not very probable, then it will not be passed. If the Senator from Ohio will say that the measure is in any danger by being postponed to the 7th of January, when we can dispose of it in a reasonable time, then I will withdraw my motion; but there will be then two months very nearly left of the session.

I do not agree with him, and I do not think there is another Senator who will agree with the Senator from Ohio, that this is just as simple a thing as an action of assumpsit, the first or second count in a declaration. I think it is very different. There are some actions of assumpsit that are complicated, that it takes a good lawyer to understand, but I suppose he refers to a suit on a warranty of a horse. I think that is what he is thinking about. Now,

I am not able to see—I do not think it is a very simple proposition made by the Senator from Massachusetts that we shall change a constitution of a State by the joint action of Congress and of the territorial Legislature.

It is a first principle in regard to statutes that the power which enacts a statute can repeal it. The act which we may pass upon this subject we can repeal. The act that the territorial or State Legislatures out there may pass can be repealed; but where is the constitution? If the territorial Legislature agrees to our present proposition, as suggested by the Senator from Massachusetts, the next Legislature having equal power may repeal that, and what becomes of your provision of the Constitution? I am sure lawyers here will not say that this is a simple question. It is a troublesome question. If we postpone it to the 7th day of January it can be acted on. I do not think it is becoming to press a thing of this sort when Senators say they wish to discuss the merits of it, when we can easily pass it, and there is no difficulty about it, by postponing it to the 7th day of January.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I should be glad to know the effect of this motion. If the bill should be postponed until that day, and after the commencement of our session after the adjournment other business should be brought up and left unfinished from day to day on the 7th of January next, will not the unfinished business have precedence of this?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the rule of the Senate, the unfinished business of the day before takes precedence of all special orders.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I think, then, we had better keep it before the Senate until we adjourn. If we can do no better, let it be the first thing in order when we meet again.

I did not intend to say a single word in regard to this question, following my usual course of contenting myself with voting; but one or two remarks have fallen from the Senator from Massachusetts that in my judgment render it necessary that I should say a word. He compares the case of the Territory of Nebraska to that of the lately rebellious States. I think there is a great difference between them. The people of the Territory of Nebraska are loyal men; the people of the late rebellious States are not loyal; and when he compares the one with the other I think he does injustice to himself and to the people of that Territory.

Mr. SUMNER. I made no such comparison.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. He speaks of the constitution submitted by some persons in Louisiana as odious, as offensive, and compares the constitution of Nebraska and the constitution of that State or proposed State intending to convey the idea, I presume, that the constitution of Nebraska is odious and offensive. Now, I wish to say to that Senator that the constitution of Nebraska and the constitution of Iowa in this particular are identical. Does he call the constitution of Iowa odious and offensive? Does he call the constitution of Illinois odious and offensive? I do not stand here to hear the constitution of the State I in part represent on this floor so characterized; and the Senator from Massachusetts I think forgets what is due to him and due to the people of these States when he so characterizes them. The people of Iowa are as loyal as the people of Massachusetts are.

Mr. SUMNER. No doubt about it. I never said otherwise.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. But he said our constitution was offensive.

Mr. SUMNER. I made no allusion to the constitution of Iowa.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. But you made an allusion to a constitution precisely similar in this identical point to that of Iowa. The Senator from Massachusetts, it seems to me, sometimes assumes more than belongs to him in talking about these things. He should remember that there are other States in this Union besides Massachusetts; and when he speaks of particulars wherein those States do not agree with Massachusetts he should be careful of the terms he applies to them.

Now, what is this question? Why should the application for the admission of this Territory be compared with the application of the States lately in rebellion to be admitted here? It is doing injustice to these people—people who have been all the time during this rebellion as loyal as the people of any State in this Union. It is wrong to place them side by side with the men who have been in rebellion against our Government; it is unfair to them; and I repeat again I cannot see the difference between characterizing the constitution of Iowa as odious and offensive, and characterizing the constitution of another State that agrees with it precisely in terms, in that way.

Mr. SUMNER. May I ask the Senator if he considers that provision in the constitution of Iowa right or wrong?

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I conceive it to be the business of the people of Iowa and not the business of the Senator from Massachusetts. The people of Iowa will deal with it in their own way when they see fit; and as a loyal people they have the right to do so; and so I apprehend have the people of Nebraska.

Mr. SUMNER. The Senator from Iowa has not been in this body very long. Had he been here longer, he would have known that toward the people of Iowa, by my vote and voice, I have always been true. One of the earliest efforts that I made in this Chamber, now many years ago, was in protection of the interests of the people of Iowa. On that occasion, as the records will show, I received from the Senators of Iowa expressions of friendship and kindness which I cannot forget. I have never thought of the State of Iowa except with kindness and respect. I have never alluded to the State of Iowa except with kindness and respect. I have made no allusion to Iowa to-night. I have not had Iowa in my mind to-night in any remarks that I have made; and, sir, for one good reason: it is my habit when I speak in this body, so far as I am able, to speak directly to the question. The State of Iowa has not been before us; her constitution has not been before us. Therefore, I have had no occasion to express any opinion upon it.

But there is another constitution which has been before us and on which I have been asked to vote. On that constitution I express an opinion. I say it contains an odious and offensive principle; and I doubt if the Senator from Iowa would undertake to say that an exclusion from rights on account of color would be properly characterized otherwise than as odious and offensive. I did not know that the constitution of Iowa was open to that objection, or if I knew it it was not in my mind; but I do know that the constitution of Nebraska is open to that objection, and in that respect I pronounce it odious and offensive. It contains a disfranchisement of men on account of color, and it is a little difficult to speak of that without losing perhaps a little patience. It is difficult at this time, when we have such great responsibilities thrown upon us with reference to the States lately in rebellion, to look upon a candidate State like that of Nebraska, coming forward with a constitution containing this principle of disfranchisement, without feeling the strongest disposition to use language which I do not want to use, language of the utmost condemnation. I say that such a constitution at this moment from a new State does not deserve any quarter. I say the constitution ought to be a hissing and a by-word; and I am at a loss to understand how any Senator at this time, having the great responsibilities that we have with regard to the States lately in rebellion, can look upon a new constitution like this except as a hissing and a by-word. Sir, it is a shame to the people that bring it here, and it will be a shame to Congress if it gives it its sanction. I use that language advisedly, and I stand by it even at the expense of the criticism of the Senator from Iowa.

But when I say this I intend no reflection upon the State of Iowa. The State of Iowa is not before us. The State of Iowa is not a new State, or Territory rather, applying for admission; nor is it, thank God, a rebel State, but it is a true loyal State which in other days, some years ago, in haste and under the sinister influences of the hour, introduced words into its constitution which the Senator from that State now brings forward into this Chamber, not for condemnation, but from his tone I should suppose for praise. Sir, he should rather follow another example and throw a cover over that part of the constitution which is unworthy of the civilization of our times.

I am very sorry to have been led into these remarks. I was astonished that the Senator from Iowa should compel me to make them. When I go back to the earlier days, I think that perhaps I might have expected other things from a Senator of Iowa. However, I have said enough on that point.

And now, sir, I come again to the question which, in the opinion of the Senator from Ohio, is so trivial, nothing more than a question of assumpsit.

Mr. WADE. A common count in assumpsit. Mr. SUMNER. A common count. That is the way he regards it at one moment, and then in another moment it is a great question. Did he not say that no great question had ever been settled in this body except late in the evening, and in that way, unless his language was entirely vague, he meant to class the pending question among those of that character.

Mr. WADE. No, I did not.

Mr. SUMNER. He says no, he did not. Then so much the worse for him. He will regret hereafter that he did not see that this question was a great question; that whether we should admit a new State at this moment, with that offensive constitution, is a great question, one of the greatest that has ever been submitted to the Senate. However, I will not say any more, except that I move an adjournment, [laughter;] and on that motion I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 11, nays 18; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Brown, Doolittle, Edmunds, Hendricks, Morgan, Patterson, Poland, Pomeroy, Sprague, Sumner, and Wilson—11.

NAYS—Messrs. Cattell, Chandler, Creswell, Fogg, Foster, Frelinghuysen, Howard, Howe, Kirkwood, Lane, Morrill, Ross, Stewart, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Wade, Wiley, and Yates—18.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Buckalew, Conness, Cowan, Cragin, Davis, Dixon, Fessenden, Fowler, Grimes, Guthrie, Harris, Henderson, Johnson, McDougall, Nesmith, Norton, Nye, Ramsey, Riddle, Saulsbury, Sherman, and Williams—23.

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

Mr. POMEROY. I voted to adjourn because I supposed that there were Senators who desired to discuss this matter at considerable length, not because I was not willing myself to take the vote, and take it now, or because I desired to occupy any long time in the discussion. During the time I have been here I have never known at this stage of the session any effort to pass a bill when there were Senators like the Senator from Vermont, the Senator from Massachusetts, and the Senator from Pennsylvania, who said they desired to discuss the question. It was only out of courtesy to them that I voted to adjourn, because that courtesy has always been extended I think at this stage of the session. I admit that toward the close of a session when we are obliged to press measures, that courtesy is not always, and perhaps not often, extended; but at the commencement of a session, when there was no great pressure upon us, and when the shadow of a bill has come over us that looks as though the next Congress was going to be joined on to this, there can be no great pressing necessity for passing this measure to-night; at the same time, if it is insisted upon, I have no objections to staying.

I certainly shall vote for this bill; and I can state in a single word why I cannot vote for the amendment. I am embarrassed by the previous action of Congress. The Senator from Massachusetts, who believes just as I do upon this question of suffrage, is not embarrassed. I am embarrassed for this reason: when this Territory was organized, it contained precisely the same qualifications as the Territory which has since become the State which I have the honor in part to represent. Congress in that organic act said that over the question of suffrage, for the first Legislature, voters should have certain specified qualifications; but that the qualification for voting in this Territory for all subsequent Legislatures after the first should be made by the people of the Territory in their legislative capacity. Now, when we delegated this question of suffrage to the people of those Territories in the organic act, did it not pass from us?

Again, when we passed an enabling act in 1864, we said that the law of the Territory should be the qualification of voting. We had previously said that the people should have the right to fix it, in the organic act in 1854. Then in 1864, ten years from that time, we said that the law of the Territory should be the law of suffrage, that they should define the qualifications for voters. Now, the Senator from Massachusetts comes in and says that this question of voting shall be settled by an act of Congress and the State Legislature when that is called together. I submit that neither Congress nor the State Legislature to be convened under the call of the Governor of the Territory have anything to do with the question. It is a question of making a portion of the constitution, and neither Congress nor that Legislature can make any portion of the constitution. If they can make any portion they can make the whole.

Therefore I say I am embarrassed. If it was a new question, I would vote at any time to let every man who is a citizen of the United States and who has the qualification of age and residence vote, irrespective of color. If this was a new question there would be no division among us. But I say I am embarrassed by having previously voted that the qualification for voting in this Territory should be decided by the Legislature of the Territory. I do not believe that we can come in now and say that the new Legislature of the State together with Congress can make a part of the constitution on this subject; and therefore I shall have to vote almost against my own convictions; I shall have to vote against this amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts and then the amendment of the Senator from Missouri, because I believe our hands are tied up by previous legislation.

This question presented to us in this light does not apply to the rebel States at all. I shall not be embarrassed in my action in reference to the rebel States by my action on this bill. These people have vested rights by previous acts of Congress, and they have not forfeited them. They are loyal now and always have been. They have lived up to every contract we have made with them. We cannot come in and take any advantage of their action to repudiate our own. On that ground, I say that the question of suffrage for the people of that Territory is not with us. We lost it years ago. It is with the people, I admit, but it is not with us in any sense, so that Congress and the territorial or State Legislature can fix it. The people in their original capacity can do it, I admit; but that is not the proposition before us; that is not the proposition of the Senator from Massachusetts; and it is on that account I have to vote against his amendment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I do not rise for the purpose of entering at large into the discussion, because I perceive that gentlemen of the Senate are unwilling to hear; but I do rise for the purpose of saying one word in reply to my friend from Kansas, who admits that this constitution as it is now presented to us, or rather that this instrument which will become a constitution when we agree to it and not before, is radically unjust and wrong in its provisions, and yet he feels bound to agree to it on account of the fact that the previous action of Congress; and himself as a member of it, has committed him to that course. Now, I undertake to declare that in my opinion until this proposition which Congress holds out to the people of the Territory shall have become final by the action of both parties, ratified by the final action of both parties, it is wholly and perfectly within the control of Congress to undo it whenever, in its judgment, founded upon a sense of any previous mistake or upon any question of policy which may arise, it shall think fit to undo it. We may organize a Territory to-day; we may disorganize it to-morrow; and the whole course of the Government and judicial decisions under territorial laws has always been to uphold the doctrine that over the Territories, whether in an unorganized or an organized condition, the law-making power of the land has supreme and complete control, as much so as it has in this District, where by the Constitution, under other words to be sure, we are invested with legislative authority.

Now, I beg to put it to my friend from Kansas whether he would feel bound by the express committal of Congress in the act of 1854 to admit this Territory into this body as a represented State with a constitution such as the act of 1854 expressly authorized that people to make. The act of 1854, which organized that Territory, was born under the blessed influence of what is called the squatter-sovereignty or Douglas doctrine, and by that act Congress expressly committed itself to allow the people of that Territory to set up the institution of slavery if they pleased, and solemnly agreed in advance, if it be an agreement, that they would receive that State with slavery if it chose to have slavery. The language of the act of 1854 is in these words:

"And when admitted as a State or States, the said Territory, or any portion of the same."

Mr. FESSENDEN. Will my friend from Vermont allow me to make a suggestion?

Mr. EDMUNDS. With pleasure.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I understand he is desirous of addressing the Senate upon the whole subject, and as I have come to the conclusion that it is perfectly useless to attempt to get a vote on this bill to-night, on consultation with the honorable Senator who has it in charge, with the permission of the Senator from Vermont and the Senate, I should like to move an adjournment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I will yield to such a motion if it be agreeable to the gentlemen who have charge of the bill; but I do not wish to get time against the will of my friends.

Mr. FESSENDEN. If the Senator will give way, I wish to say that I am very much averse always to interposing a motion to adjourn against the wishes of those who have charge of the bill on my own side of the House, or stand in their way, but I have become convinced that it is out of the question to attempt to get a vote to-night, such a vote as we would be likely to have with the Senate so thin. Many Senators have gone home. Some Senators desire to address the Senate; and a question of this importance certainly ought not to be acted upon at such an hour and with so thin a Senate. Under such circumstances therefore, if my friend on my right [Mr. WADE] has no objection, I will move an adjournment.

Mr. WADE. Several of the friends of the measure who have been acting with me think it would be better to adjourn. My own judgment is that we shall have it just in this same fix the next time. Nevertheless, their judgment is that we ought to give more time. Some gentlemen wish to speak on the subject. I was exceedingly anxious to get this bill to a vote before we adjourn. However, finding that that is the wish of many of those acting with us, I will not resist the adjournment any longer, but shall expect to take the bill up to-morrow and finish it if I can.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Then I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, December 19, 1866.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by Rev. DAVID TRUMBULL, D. D., of Valparaiso, South America.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

REVOLUTIONARY PENSIONS.

Mr. UPSON, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill supplementary to an act to increase the pensions of the revolutionary pensioners now on the rolls of the Pension Office, approved April 1, 1864; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions.

CIRCUIT JUDGE OF KENTUCKY.

Mr. McKEE, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire into the expediency of reporting a bill to increase the salary of the judge of the United States circuit court for the district of Kentucky to the sum of $5,000.

Mr. McKEE moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

E. J. CURLEY.

Mr. McKEE. I move that the bill of the Senate for the relief of E. J. Curley, which was placed upon the Private Calendar without reference to a committee, be taken from the Calendar and referred to the Committee of Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

E. E. SHED.

Mr. PIKE. I ask leave to withdraw from the files of the House the papers in the case of E. E. Shed, upon which the Committee of Claims made an adverse report yesterday. The papers are desired for use before the Court of Claims.

Leave was granted accordingly.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. MAYNARD. I ask consent of the House to make a personal explanation.

No objection was made.

Mr. MAYNARD. The other morning, in the remarks which I made in connection with the resolution introduced by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES,] I am reported as having said that a young man by the name of Nelson, a captain in the Federal service, had been demanded, as I understood, by the Governor of North Carolina from the Governor of Tennessee as a felon, by reason of a homicide committed by him in the discharge of his duty while on a raid in North Carolina. I have since seen Governor Worth, of North Carolina, who assures me that he has never made any such demand of the Governor of Tennessee.

It is possible that in respect to the demand by the Governor I may have misunderstood the parties from whom I received the information touching the matter; I refer to the Governor of Tennessee and Captain Nelson, at whose house I passed a night a few days before I came here. Captain Nelson explained to me very fully the circumstances of the homicide, for which, as he told me, he had been indicted for murder in the State of North Carolina. He had been set upon and bushwhacked—if I may be pardoned the solecism—from a private house while on duty. He pursued the offender and put him to death on the spot. This had been the subject of indictment in one of the North Carolina courts as for murder.

It was that fact, and not the mere matter of his having been demanded by the Governor, that I wished to bring to the notice of the House. I wished to show how, under the forms of the local laws, our soldiers and officers are annoyed and persecuted. And in this connection I will add what I did not say at that time, that as I am informed his case is not the only instance but is one of a great many. I learn that Colonel Kirk, known very well to my colleague before me, [Mr. TAYLOR,] and many of his regiment have been indicted as murderers or robbers or horse-thieves or on some other charge of violating the criminal laws of North Carolina by reason of their hostile operations while in our military service. It was, I suppose, for these and similar proceedings that the Legislature of that State have condescended to grant a general amnesty to the Federal Army, from General Sherman down to the humblest soldier.

CAPTAIN ANDREW SMITH.

Mr. VAN AERNAM, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Claims be instructed to inquire into the propriety of directing the proper disbursing officer to pay a Treasury draft of $200, given in settlement of the accounts of Captain Andrew Smith, of the twenty-first New York cavalry, on the indorsement of Dr. W. W. Potter, of the New York State Military Agency, and report by bill or otherwise.

DISTRIBUTION OF SOLDIERS' MEDALS.

Mr. HUBBARD, of West Virginia, by unanimous consent, introduced a joint resolution authorizing certain medals to be distributed to honorably discharged soldiers free of postage; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. HUBBARD, of West Virginia. I desire that this resolution shall be considered at the present time. I think there can be no objection to it.

The joint resolution, which was read at length, proposes to authorize the adjutant general of the State of West Virginia to distribute through the mails, free of postage, to the honorably discharged soldiers of West Virginia and to the relatives and friends of those who were killed or died of wounds or disease while in service, certain medals furnished by the Legislature of that State; and it is provided that in such case the envelope inclosing the medal, shall be franked by the adjutant general in the mode prescribed by the Postmaster General.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HUBBARD, of West Virginia, moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

BLACK ROCK HARBOR, CONNECTICUT.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Connecticut, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a light-boat off Black Rock Harbor, on the coast of Connecticut.

TAXATION OF GROSS RECEIPTS.

Mr. PHELPS, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to inquire into the expediency of so modifying the internal revenue law as to dispense with taxes upon gross receipts.

SUPPLIES FOR INDIAN SERVICE.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I ask unanimous consent to submit the following resolution:

Whereas the Commissioner of Indian Affairs did, on the 21st day of November, 1866, advertise for sealed proposals for supplying the Indian service with certain goods, wares, and merchandise; and whereas it is reported that said Commissioner did, on the 18th day of December, 1866, award the contract for supplying said goods, wares, and merchandise on a bid much higher, and on samples inferior to those offered by other parties: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be directed to transmit to the House Committee on Indian Affairs the bids received on the 15th day of December, 1866, by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, in compliance with the advertisement above referred to, and the award made by him on the 18th day of December, 1866; and all papers received by said Commissioner in any way relating to said bids and award, together with all samples accompanying said bids; and that said committee be instructed to examine into the acts of said Commissioner and report the result of their investigation to this House; and in the mean time the Secretary of the Interior is directed to suspend contracts based upon said award.

The SPEAKER. This being a call for executive information unanimous consent is necessary for its consideration on this day.

Mr. LE BLOND. I object to the introduction of the resolution.

GEORGE ST. LEGER GRENFEL.

Mr. WENTWORTH. I ask unanimous consent to submit the following resolution, which it is very important shall be considered to-day:

Whereas it is represented in the newspapers that the Legislature of Florida has adopted a report and resolution recommending that one Colonel George St. Leger Grenfel, who was convicted as one of the leaders in the conspiracy to release the rebel prisoners in Camp Douglas, at Chicago, and then to burn said city, and sentenced to death therefor, but whose sentence was afterward commuted to imprisonment for life, be pardoned: Therefore,

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to furnish this House with copies of all the papers in his possession touching the case of said George St. Leger Grenfel.

Mr. NICHOLSON. I object.

Mr. WENTWORTH. I hope the gentleman from Delaware will withdraw his objection. If he knew the facts I know he would withdraw it.

Mr. NICHOLSON. I withdraw my objection.

The resolution was then adopted.

Mr. WENTWORTH moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SUPPLIES FOR INDIAN SERVICE—AGAIN.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Is the Speaker correct in deciding that my resolution is a call on the Executive Departments for information?

The SPEAKER. It directs the Secretary of the Interior to furnish certain information to this House; and that is calling for executive information.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I will change the resolution so as to call on the Commissioner of Indian Affairs.

The SPEAKER. That would not change the character of the resolution. A single objection will prevent any resolution being received or considered to-day.

DEFICIENCY BILL

Mr. STEVENS. I call up the amendments of the Senate to House bill No. 876, making appropriations and to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1867, and for other purposes.

The amendments were returned to the Senate at its request for the purpose of correcting a mistake made in their engrossment, and have since then been returned with the correction made.

The SPEAKER. As the bill came here the wrong sections were proposed to be stricken out. It is now returned with the proper amendments to strike out the following:

For facilitating communication between the Atlantic and Pacific States by electrical telegraph, $40,000. To enable the Commissioner of Public Buildings to pay the three watchmen appointed under resolution of July 25, 1866, at $300 each, $2,700.

Mr. STEVENS. I move concurrence in the amendments of the Senate.

Mr. BIDWELL. I would like to know the reason for striking out those paragraphs.

Mr. STEVENS. The Senate say that the contract has been violated and they are about to investigate it to see whether that is the fact.

Mr. BIDWELL. If that be so I do not object to its being suspended.

The amendments of the Senate were concurred in.

Mr. STEVENS moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendments of the Senate were concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

STATE DEPARTMENT EXPENSES.

Mr. WARD, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be requested to communicate to this House a statement of the amounts charged to the State Department since May 1, 1865, for services rendered by naval vessels.

Mr. WARD moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

OREGON LAND GRANT.

The SPEAKER stated the first business in order to be Senate bill No. 62, to amend an act entitled "An act granting land to the State of Oregon, to aid in the construction of a military road from Eugene City to the eastern boundary of said State," pending from the morning hour yesterday.

Mr. McRUER. Mr. Speaker, I think it is only necessary to refresh the minds of the House in regard to this amendment. It only seeks to provide for an omission in the original bill whereby the State of Oregon might receive three sections of land per mile in aid of the construction of this military wagon-road by going three miles beyond the original limits.

I will here state that by the act of Congress passed March 3, 1863, the same amount of lands we now seek was extended to the States of Michigan and Wisconsin. The last Congress, by act of June 30, 1864, passed another bill to aid in the construction of a wagon-road in the State of Michigan, granting three sections of land and permitting the parties to go three miles beyond the line of the road to get the designated amount. This amendment only seeks to give to the State of Oregon the privilege to select this land within six miles of this road. It does not increase the grant at all. This bill came from the Senate, was referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and is unanimously reported by them with a recommendation that it do pass. I call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. McRUER. I demand the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and the question being taken, no quorum voted.

Tellers were ordered; and the Chair appointed Messrs. McRUER and COOPER.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 79, noes 20.

So the bill was passed.

Mr. McRUER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. TROWBRIDGE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled a bill (H. R. No. 876) making appropriations and to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1867, and for other purposes; when the Speaker signed the same.

MILITARY WAGON-ROAD IN OREGON.

Mr. McRUER, from the Committee on Public Lands, reported back House bill No. 21, granting land to the State of Oregon to aid in the construction of a military wagon-road from Dalles City, on the Columbia river, to Fort Boisé, on Snake river, with a recommendation that it do pass.

The bill was read. It grants alternate sections to the extent of three sections in width on each side of the road. It provides that the lands so granted shall be exclusively applied to its construction and shall be disposed of only as the work progresses. It reserves all lands heretofore reserved or appropriated by the United States except so far as may be necessary to locate the route through the same one hundred feet in width. The road is to remain a public highway for the use of the Government of the United States free from tolls. It provides that the land so granted shall be disposed of only as fast as each ten miles are constructed, and also limits the time for its completion to five years. The manner of the construction is to be such as the Legislature of Oregon shall direct.

Mr. McRUER. This military wagon-road is to run through a mountainous and unsettled country for a distance of about two hundred and seventy-five miles. The country is for the most part a wilderness, inhabited only by Indians. It is no new thing to grant lands to aid in the construction of military roads. Similar grants have been made to States not so remote nor so wild as Oregon—for instance, to the States of Wisconsin and Michigan.

This bill, in the first place, went to the Committee on Military Affairs, and I believe it received the favorable consideration of that committee. It was finally referred to the Committee on Public Lands. It has been considered by them and unanimously reported with a recommendation that it do pass. The subject was referred to the War Department, and in reply we received a communication from the Secretary of War inclosing a copy of a letter written by General Grant, in which he says:

"I am in favor generally of encouraging and assisting the opening of roads through the Indian country. They enhance the value of the United States lands in their vicinity, and render military transportation easy."

This is a cheap way of securing a military road by the Government. This bill provides that no tolls shall be exacted of the United States Government for transportation of any troops, mails, or military stores over this road. It is more carefully guarded than any other bill which has been passed to aid in the construction of a wagon-road. Unless the State of Oregon performs this work she receives none of the lands. It is expressly provided that before any grant of land is made the State must build ten miles of the road. Upon the completion of ten miles she receives a grant of land continuous with those ten miles and not beyond. Heretofore grants have been made in advance of construction. I think there can be no good objection to this bill.

Mr. DAWES. Is there any time limited in the bill?

Mr. McRUER. It must be completed within five years, which is comparatively a short time. The bill is carefully guarded and I know of no reason why it should not pass.

Mr. PIKE. Is this for a wagon-road?

Mr. McRUER. It is.

Mr. PIKE. Are there any restrictions proposed by the bill?

Mr. McRUER. It provides that the State of Oregon shall specify how this road shall be built, what shall be its width, &c.

Mr. PIKE. This is a grant to the State of Oregon?

Mr. McRUER. Yes, sir. The road is to be entirely within the jurisdiction of the State of Oregon.

Mr. PIKE. Will the gentleman from California [Mr. McRUER] accept an amendment to make a grant of land to the State of Maine for a similar road?

Mr. McRUER. If I am not mistaken, the Government built a road in Maine at its own expense.

Mr. LE BLOND. I would inquire of the gentleman from California [Mr. McRUER] if this bill has been printed?

Mr. McRUER. It has been printed; it was offered in the early part of the last session, and is House bill No. 21.

Mr. LE BLOND. Has it not undergone some changes since that time at the hands of the committee?

Mr. McRUER. It has been amended by the committee, but all the amendments are of a restrictive character. The bill is not so liberal now in its terms as it was when it was originally introduced.

Mr. LE BLOND. Mr. Speaker, if this was an original proposition to grant the public lands for purposes of the kind specified in this bill, I should feel compelled to vote against it; it certainly has become alarming to see the quantity of land donated by the Congress of the United States for these private purposes. Now, it does seem to me that before we make any more such grants of land as this we should see what restrictions are imposed by this bill. As I understand it, this bill is based upon the alleged necessity of a military road in the State of Oregon. If I understand the history of these land grants, the real object of all such bills as this is to confer public lands upon private corporations organized within the several States. I think Congress should consider whether they are willing to donate the public domain in this wholesale manner, without any beneficial results being obtained for the Government of the United States. I think it is time that we put a stop to this wholesale system of disposing of the public domain.

Mr. McRUER. I now yield to the gentleman from Oregon, [Mr. HENDERSON.]

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. Speaker, I would say to the House, and especially to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. LE BLOND,] who has just taken his seat, that I have no doubt if he understood the nature of the country through which this road is to pass, and the necessity of a road through it, he would have no sort of objection to it. But a man who has never been in that country, who knows nothing of the circumstances there, cannot appreciate the importance of a measure like this.

I desire to say to members of this House that formerly it was the custom to ask for an appropriation of money to build such roads as these. We have lately come to the conclusion that money cannot be obtained for such purposes, and so we are not disposed to ask for it. But knowing that the building of such roads as this not only facilitates commerce and intercourse, but also enhances the value of the public lands, we feel that we have the right to ask Congress for liberal grants for this purpose.

Now, I would say to gentlemen here that they cannot expect new countries like Oregon, Washington Territory, and the other Territories west of the Rocky mountains to build these roads without the assistance of the General Government. How is a sparse population like that in these countries to build roads of two hundred and seventy-five or three hundred miles in length, through a mountainous country, infested with Indians all the time, and to sustain themselves without other assistance? I want to inform gentlemen that in the eastern part of the State of Oregon for the last five or six years, and I might say almost from the first settlement of the country, there has been a perpetual warfare between the Indians and the white people there.

The route of this road, with the map of that country, was drawn by the military commander on the Columbia river and sent here with a request of that officer that Congress should make an appropriation to build that road to facilitate the transportation of arms and munitions of war, so that the ravages of the Indians may be stopped and the lives of white settlers and traders be preserved. A bill was drawn and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs. It was carefully examined by that committee, who reported in favor of its passage. The bill was printed and referred to the Committee on Public Lands. The latter committee also carefully investigated the subject. In order to satisfy themselves fully they sent a draft of the bill to the Secretary of War, asking his opinion upon it. The Secretary of War not being so conversant with the subject as he supposed General Grant to be, sent the bill to that officer, who, after investigating the subject, reported favorably upon it.

I wish to say to members of this House that the warfare by the Indians on that route is now carried on to such an extent that trade between the settlements and the mining region of the country is almost entirely broken up. By this warfare of the Indians hundreds of lives have been destroyed and tens of thousands of dollars' worth of property have been wasted within the last two or three years. These lives and this property are worth infinitely more than it would cost to build this road. This warfare by the Indians is now going on in the very country through which the road is to pass, although there are two or three military posts upon it. It will be far cheaper for this Government to donate a few sections of land to open a military road than it will be to fight the Indians there for years to come, which will have to be done if things continue as at present, unless the Government intends to leave the people of Oregon to fight their own battles and foot their own bills, as they have been obliged to do to a great extent since the settlement of that country. I do hope that the House will take a liberal and just view of this matter and pass this bill.

Mr. THAYER. I desire, with the consent of the gentleman from California, [Mr. McRUER,] to ask him a question.

Mr. McRUER. Certainly.

Mr. THAYER. I desire to ask whether this bill contains any clause excepting mineral lands from this grant?

Mr. McRUER. The mineral lands are excepted by a general law; but I have no objection to the insertion of a clause specially excepting mineral lands.

Mr. THAYER. Then I move to amend by adding the following:

Provided, That the grant hereby made shall not embrace any mineral lands of the United States.

Mr. McRUER. That is very acceptable. I now call for the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the amendment of Mr. THAYER was agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. McRUER. I call for the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania, called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 76, nays 37, not voting 78; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Baker, Baxter, Bidwell, Bingham, Bromwell, Bundy, Chanler, Reader W. So the bill was passed.

During the roll-call,

Mr. MORRILL said: The gentleman from Ohio, Mr. GARFIELD, is absent from his seat to-day on account of sickness.

Mr. PERHAM said: My colleague, Mr. LYNCH, is confined to his house by illness.

The result was announced as above stated.

Mr. McRUER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ADVERSE REPORTS.

Mr. McRUER, from the same committee, submitted adverse reports on the following cases; and the same were laid upon the table:

A bill (H. R. No. 244) concerning certain lands granted to the State of Nevada;

A bill (H. R. No. 245) concerning public lands in the State of Nevada;

A bill (H. R. No. 707) to relinquish title to the town of Santa Cruz, California; and

An act (H. R. No. 689) to encourage the construction of a telegraph line between the State of California and the Territory of Idaho.

KANSAS LAND GRANT.

Mr. DRIGGS, from the Committee on Public Lands, reported back Senate bill No. 320, to amend an act entitled "An act for a grant of lands to the State of Kansas, in alternate sections, to aid in the construction of certain railroads and telegraphs in said State," approved March 3, 1863, with amendments.

The bill, which was read, provides that whenever it shall be deemed impracticable or inexpedient to construct any portion of said Atchison, Topeka, and Santa Fé railroad in manner as in said act required, and whenever the Governor of said State shall certify to the Secretary of the Interior that upon such portion, in lieu thereof, said railroad company have constructed a road suitable for the running of a steam traction-engine with its train of cars over the same, the grant of lands in said act made shall be confirmed to said State for the purpose of aiding in the construction of said road, and in all other respects as in said act provided; provided that the amount of lands granted in said act, when applied to the construction of said steam traction road, shall be three alternate sections of land per mile, designated by odd numbers, on each side of said road; and provided that patents shall issue upon the completion of every twenty miles of road upon the certificate of the Governor as aforesaid.

Section two authorizes said company to construct said roadway from the boundary line of the State of Kansas, through the Territories of the United States, on the most eligible route to Santa Fé, in the Territory of New Mexico, and to such Government forts in said Territory as the President of the United States may approve. And there is granted to said company the right of way through the public domain to the extent of two hundred feet on each side of said road. And for the purpose of aiding in the construction of said roadway and its equipment, and to secure the safe and speedy transmission of the mails, troops, munitions of war, and supplies over said road, the same amount of land, not mineral, but not excluding iron or coal, is granted to said company, as in the first section of this act is provided, and upon the same terms and conditions, but upon the certificate of a commissioner, appointed by the Secretary of the Interior, that said conditions have been complied with.

Section three provides that said grants are made only upon condition that said road shall be constructed in a substantial and workmanlike manner, with all necessary culverts, bridges, viaducts, crossings, stations and watering-places, and other appurtenances, including engines and cars sufficient to move not less than fifty tons, or two hundred passengers in one train, at a rate of six miles an hour.

The amendments of the committee were offered and agreed to, as follows:

In section one, line twelve, strike out the word "three" and insert the word "five."

In section one, line fourteen, strike out all after the word "numbers," to include the word "aforesaid" in line sixteen, and insert "to be selected within ten miles of said road, with all necessary ground for depots, watering-stations, switches," &c.

In section two, line nine, strike out the word "two" and insert "one."

In section three, line seven, after the word "of" insert the words "at least."

At the end of section three insert the following: "And upon the further condition that no land shall be acquired by or patented to the company or corporation building said road until fifty miles shall have been completed, and the same shall be in practical operation and engines and cars running over the same, when two hundred and fifty sections of land, in alternate odd-numbered continuous sections, may be patented to said company; and so on from time to time for each additional fifty miles that may be completed, equipped, and running as aforesaid, until the whole is completed, at which time the company shall receive patents for any fractional miles, so as to acquire the full amount of land granted by this act for the whole number of miles of road built."

Add a new section, as follows: "And be it further enacted, That this act shall not take effect until the State of Kansas, through the Legislature thereof, shall consent to and approve of the same."

Mr. DRIGGS. There is a report from the Committee on Public Lands, which I ask the Clerk to read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The undersigned, to whom was referred Senate bill No. 320, being an act to amend an act entitled "An act for a grant of lands to the State of Kansas, in alternate sections, to aid in the construction of certain railroads and telegraphs in said State," approved March 3, 1863, has examined the same, and finds that it proposes to reduce and limit said grant upon the following contingency: that the company to which said lands shall be granted by said State may substitute for railroad steam traction-engines; and when they shall have constructed and equipped twenty miles of road, and shown an ability to move in one train fifty tons of freight, or two hundred passengers, at the rate of not less than five miles per hour over it, they shall be entitled to obtain lands at the rate of five sections per mile instead of ten, as now provided by said act for the railroad; but the bill simply modifies and changes the conditions on which a grant heretofore made may be claimed. I can see no good reason why this change may not be made. If the terms of the bill are not complied with, or, in other words, if the experiment, if it may be properly called such, is not successful, then no lands can be claimed. If it is successful it certainly seems as if the Government could well afford to grant for the demonstration as much as it has repeatedly given for the construction of an ordinary wagon-road. The committee therefore recommend that the bill be reported back to the House with recommendation that it be passed, with the following amendments.

JOHN F. DRIGGS,

For Committee.

Mr. DRIGGS. I have but one word to say in regard to this bill, and it is this: that it presents the single feature of asking Congress to reduce the ten sections to five. It provides also instead of a railroad over the western prairies they may employ traction steam engines. I have before me a report of several scientific gentlemen who have examined the machine and give it as their decided opinion it will work successfully. If the experiment proves to be successful it will be the means of traversing that vast region of prairie lying east of the mountains and be of incalculable benefit to the Government. The committee thoroughly investigated the proposition, and we propose to reduce the grant from ten to five sections; and with the proper restrictions provided in the amendment we recommend the passage of the bill. I demand the previous question.

The House divided, and there were—ayes 36, noes 29; no quorum voting.

The SPEAKER, under the rule, appointed Mr. DRIGGS and Mr. MORRILL as tellers.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 49, noes 51.

So the previous question was not seconded.

Mr. THAYER. I move that the bill be laid upon the table.

Mr. DRIGGS. Allow the bill to be recommitted. I did not explain the bill as I did not think there would be any objection.

Mr. THAYER. I agree to that.

The bill, as amended, was recommitted to the Committee on Public Lands.

PAY OF TENNESSEE MEMBERS.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I ask unanimous consent to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Sergeant-at-Arms of this House be instructed to pay Hons. SAMUEL L. ARNELL, WILLIAM B. CAMPBELL, and ISAAC R. HAWKINS, the mileage due them for the first session of this Congress.

These gentlemen were in attendance, except Mr. ARNELL, during a part of the session before the State was admitted; and Mr. ARNELL started from Tennessee on receiving a dispatch informing him of the fact, and got here the next day after the adjournment, having been detained on the way by a railroad accident. The Sergeant-at-Arms decides that he cannot pay them. I merely offer this in order that he may be authorized to pay them. I move the previous question.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I move to refer the resolution to the Committee on Mileage.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I have no objection.

The resolution was accordingly referred to the Committee on Mileage.

Mr. BENJAMIN moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was referred; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LEASE OF SCHOOL LANDS.

Mr. HOLMES, from the Committee on Public Lands, reported back House bill No. 553, to amend section two of an act entitled "An act to authorize the Legislatures of the States of Illinois, Arkansas, Louisiana, and Tennessee to sell the lands heretofore appropriated for the use of schools in those States," with a substitute therefor.

The substitute was read, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives, That section two of said act be, and the same hereby is, amended so as to read as follows, namely: SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the Legislatures of said States be, and they are hereby, authorized to make such laws and needful regulations as may be deemed expedient to secure and protect from injury or waste the sections reserved by the laws of Congress for the use of schools to each township, and to provide by law, if not deemed expedient to sell, for leasing the same for any term not exceeding four years for agricultural lands, and fifteen years for mineral lands, in such manner as to render them productive and most conducive to the object for which they were designed.

Mr. HOLMES. In 1843 Congress passed a law authorizing the Legislatures of the States of Illinois, Arkansas, Louisiana, and Tennessee to sell the lands appropriated for public schools. The second section, proposed to be amended, authorized the States, in case the lands were not sold, to provide by law for leasing them for four years. Some of these lands have been discovered to contain minerals, and it is found impossible to lease them advantageously for so short a term as four years. The amendment changes the second section only by authorizing the Legislatures in those States, if they shall think proper, to provide for the leasing of the mineral lands for a period not exceeding fifteen years.

Mr. GRINNELL. I would inquire of the gentleman if there is any such thing in his judgment as a Legislature of the State of Arkansas?

Mr. HOLMES. The gentleman is as competent as I am to answer that question.

Mr. GRINNELL. I am not desirous of legislating on any such supposition. If there is no Legislature, of course they cannot legislate.

Mr. HOLMES. The original bill applies to several States which are assumed to have Legislatures, and this bill simply changes the former law in such a way as to allow the Legislatures of those States to lease the mineral lands for a term of years not exceeding fifteen, if they shall see fit.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. Is this bill printed?

Mr. HOLMES. It is not.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. Then I move it be printed and postponed.

Mr. HOLMES. I decline to yield for that purpose.

Mr. STEVENS. I think the gentleman had better have it printed.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I have no disposition to oppose the passage of the bill, but I shall vote for no bill recognizing any of these illegal Legislatures or bogus governments, and I must have this bill printed before I vote for it. I will therefore move that it be printed and postponed or recommitted to the committee, whichever the gentleman chooses.

Mr. HOLMES. I do not desire to have it recommitted, and I do not propose to yield for any such purpose or motion.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I move to postpone it till the 3d Monday in January.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that in the present condition of the Calendar, with the various special orders made, by an ordinary postponement the bill would not probably be reached during the session.

Mr. HOLMES. I want to say in reply to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ASHLEY] that this is not an original bill. It simply proposes to amend section two of the law of 1843, and this bill does not in my opinion recognize the Legislatures of any of the States lately in rebellion.

Mr. STEVENS. The law to which the gentleman refers was passed when a different state of things existed from what exists now: I am opposed to recognizing Louisiana and Arkansas as States of the Union, and I move to lay the bill on the table.

Mr. HOLMES. I have no objection to the insertion of a proviso excluding any of the States not now represented in Congress, if the gentleman desires it.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I would suggest that the following proviso should be inserted:

Provided, That this act and the act to which this is supplementary shall not be applicable to any States declared in rebellion by proclamation of the President of the United States.

Mr. HOLMES. I will yield to allow the amendment to be offered.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I move the amendment I have indicated.

Mr. HOLMES. I now call the previous question upon the bill and amendment.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed it was accordingly read the third time.

The question was upon the passage of the bill.

Mr. HOLMES. I call the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. BROMWELL. I would inquire if the amendment adopted upon the motion of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ASHLEY] does not exclude the State of Tennessee, because it has been declared at one time to be in insurrection?

The SPEAKER. That amendment has been adopted, and the House is now acting under the operation of the previous question.

The bill was then passed.

Mr. STEVENS. I move to amend the title of this bill by striking out the words "Arkansas, Louisiana," so that it will read as follows:

An act to amend section two of an act entitled "An act to authorize the Legislatures of the States of Illinois and Tennessee to sell the lands heretofore appropriated for the use of schools in those States," approved February 15, 1843.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOLMES moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour has expired.

Subsequently, on motion of Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio, by unanimous consent, the amendment offered by him to the bill amending the act relating to the sale of school lands, was so amended that it would read as follows:

Provided, That this act and the act to which this is supplementary shall not be applicable to any States declared in rebellion by proclamation of the President of the United States except the State of Tennessee.

NATIONAL BANKS AND CURRENCY.

Mr. LAFLIN, from the Committee on Printing, reported the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That there be printed for the use of the House, in bill form, one thousand extra copies of bill No. 771, to amend the national bank act.

Mr. LAFLIN moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

HOMESTEAD LANDS.

Mr. JULIAN, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Lands be instructed to inquire into the expediency of so amending the act approved June 24, 1866, for the disposal of the public lands for homestead actual settlement in certain States therein mentioned, as to require the applicant, from and after the first day of January, 1867, to make oath that he has not borne arms against the United States or given aid and comfort to its enemies.

SUPPLIES FOR INDIAN SERVICE.

Mr. INGERSOLL, by unanimous consent, submitted the following preamble and resolution; which were read, considered, and agreed to:

Whereas the Commissioner of Indian Affairs did, on the 21st day of November, 1866, advertise for sealed proposals for supplying the Indian service with certain goods, wares, and merchandise; and whereas it is reported that said Commissioner did, on the 13th day of December, 1866, award the contract for supplying said goods, wares, and merchandise on a bid much higher, and on samples inferior to those offered by other parties: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be directed to transmit to the House Committee on Indian Affairs the bids received on the 15th day of December, 1866, by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, in compliance with the advertisement above referred to, and the award made by him on the 13th day of December, 1866; and all papers received by said Commissioner in any way relating to said bids and award, together with all samples accompanying said bids; and that said committee be instructed to examine into the acts of said Commissioner and report the result of their investigation to this House; and in the mean time the Secretary of the Interior is directed to suspend contracts based upon said award.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I would say that I suppose the House alone can hardly direct the Secretary of the Interior not to carry out a contract he has made.

The SPEAKER. The objection comes too late. The resolution is agreed to, whether the House has such power or not.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. STEVENS moved that the rules be suspended, and the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. LAWRENCE, of Pennsylvania, in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of House bill No. 896, making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending the 30th of June, 1867.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill, and read the following:

For compensation to the private secretary, assistant secretary, short-hand writer, clerk of pardons, three clerks of fourth class, steward, and messenger of the President of the United States, $13,800.

Mr. GRINNELL. I move to amend by striking out in the paragraph just read the words "clerk of pardons." I believe that the insertion in an appropriation bill of an appropriation for this officer is of very recent date. We have endeavored to ascertain by resolution how many pardons have been granted. We have thus far been unable to obtain this information. Now, sir, I wish to grant as few facilities as possible for the granting of pardons.

It is known that one prominent rebel, the great pirate of this century, has received a pardon, and has been permitted to become the professor of moral philosophy in a southern college. I propose that we shall dispense with this clerk for the present. Hence I have submitted my amendment.

Mr. WENTWORTH. I am opposed to striking out the appropriation for the pay of this clerk. We have sent to the President calls for information with reference to pardons, and it would be impossible for him, so numerous have been the applications for pardons, to make out a full reply without this clerk. At least I hope the resolution that was adopted this morning at my instance will not fail to be answered for the want of clerical force. I find by looking at some southern papers that the members of the Legislature of Florida—a Legislature of traitors—pretend to have recently paid a visit to the Dry Tortugas, where they have been investigating the claims of prisoners there to pardons. They have recently taken up the case of a notorious leader in the attempt to liberate the rebel prisoners at Chicago and afterward burn the city a few years ago; and that Legislature has decided that he was convicted on the testimony of perjured witnesses. I suppose they would say the same of every other criminal there. That there was a conspiracy to liberate the prisoners in Camp Douglas on the night before the election, and to take possession of the polls and burn the city, has been proved to the satisfaction of every one who ever investigated the subject. The evidence was so overwhelming that one of the prisoners on trial killed himself. Another was sentenced to be hanged, but his sentence was commuted to imprisonment for life, and he is now at the Dry Tortugas. The Legislature of Florida has now taken his case in hand, petitions President Johnson to pardon him, and charges that he was convicted by perjured witnesses. I would like to see the papers in the case before the President takes action, if possible. If not possible before the pardon, it would gratify my loyal constituents exceedingly to know upon what ground our President pardons traitors and convicted incendiaries.

Mr. SCOFIELD. Mr. Chairman, during the last session I was told that on all these pardons sent South each recipient was subjected to a charge of $300. A gentleman residing at the South informed me that he saw a great many pardons come there, which were delivered by the express company, and each was charged with $300.

Mr. WARD, of New York. That is cheap enough. [Laughter.]

Mr. SCOFIELD. I made some inquiries here of persons perhaps not altogether responsible, but whom I thought trustworthy enough, and they informed me that the Adams Express Company were receiving a great many pardons from the State agent of Alabama, who also acted as agent for the State of Tennessee; that many hundred pardons had been sent by this express company to the persons entitled to receive them through some State authority; that each one had marked upon it "C. O. D. $300"—"C. O. D." meaning, I believe, "collect on delivery," and that the money had been returned here. Now, I would not assert this to be the fact, because I do not know it, although at that time I thought the authority was pretty good; but if fees are being charged by agents here they certainly ought to pay this clerk of pardons. [Laughter.] Therefore I believe I shall vote for this amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For paper, special dies, and printing of circulating notes, and expenses necessarily incurred (including express charges) in procuring the same, in the office of the Comptroller of the Currency, $200,000.

Mr. MAYNARD. I desire to inquire of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations whether the item just read is intended to cover the printing of such Treasury notes and fractional currency as are now issued.

Mr. STEVENS. That is the object of it. The Clerk read the following:

For salaries and expenses of collectors, assessors, assistant assessors, revenue agents, inspectors, and superintendents of exports and drawback, together with the expense of carrying into effect the various provisions of the several acts providing internal revenue, excepting items otherwise estimated for, $6,000,000.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I move to amend by adding at the end of the paragraph just read the following:

Provided, That no assessor or collector shall be entitled to any portion of the salary pertaining to the office until such assessor or collector shall have been confirmed by the Senate.

Mr. MAYNARD. I suggest to the gentleman whether it would not be proper to modify his amendment by inserting "unless" instead of "until."

Mr. BENJAMIN. I cannot see that the change would add to the force of the amendment in any way, though I do not know that I would have any serious objection to the modification.

Mr. MAYNARD. The word "until" would imply that the payment was to be postponed, and the word "unless" would imply more than that, that unless he was confirmed he should not have pay at all.

Mr. DAWES. Though he be confirmed by the Senate he would not be entitled to pay until he was confirmed.

Mr. MAYNARD. "Unless" is the better word.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I have nothing to say in regard to the word to be used.

Mr. MAYNARD. If the word "until" be used would the officer draw any pay for services rendered prior to the time of his confirmation?

Mr. BENJAMIN. I apprehend he would after he has been confirmed.

Mr. MAYNARD. If he has been appointed regularly by reason of a vacancy and is confirmed he ought to be paid from the time he was appointed.

Mr. CHANLER. Mr. Chairman, I suggest to the gentleman from Missouri this is nothing but an intimation to collectors and assessors of internal revenue to reimburse themselves. If these men are to receive no salary they will certainly take their case into their own hands.

I have no complaint to make in regard to the system of internal revenue as administered by the Administration, nor have I any personal charge to make against the different collectors and assessors; but it is very weak legislation to say to a body of men throughout the whole country, "Though you are entitled to compensation for your labors, you shall not have it unless you are confirmed by the Senate." You use your political power to put these men upon the defensive; and if the records in the office of the internal revenue are correct, a more rotten and corrupt system never was invented and does not exist. You are but adding another incentive to the same men to continue the system of corruption into which you have appointed a select committee in this body not two weeks since to examine and report. If this is done for political personal reasons, if this is done for the purpose of visiting upon those who have been put into office where certain gentlemen elected to the Fortieth Congress have questions of revenge to settle, let us know the facts. Let the committee of investigation, when it comes to lay before the House its report, tell us the causes for visiting upon these men the chastisement of the law.

But, sir, for a Legislature to pass such an amendment is a stultification, if honesty is the basis of your legislation. If mere party persecution is the rule here, then make the law as the gentleman suggests. You have created a committee; trust that committee. They are men of your own choice, appointed by the Presiding Officer of this body. Their investigations are now going forward.

I hope, sir, no such act will be passed in the face of the existing charges against the Internal Revenue Bureau. It would be much more consistent with the dignity of the body and common sense and the common principles of human nature that you should allow the officers in authority to do their duty, under the contract which is always implied, that they will be paid for their services. Whether the Executive has placed them there, or they were appointed at the suggestion of certain members upon this floor, is a matter of no consequence. I have nothing to say on that subject, but I do ask the gentleman to withdraw his amendment in view of the facts of the case, until the report of the committee of investigation comes in. Let us see what we are doing before we drive these men to the wall and force them to take their salary out of the proceeds of the revenue, thereby cheating the citizen. These men will not work for nothing. The honorable gentleman from Missouri does not work for nothing, patriotic as he is; and patriotic as this body is, the increase of their salary at the last session is an indication that they will not work for nothing.

Now, sir, men who are not remunerated for their services are tempted to help themselves. It is a bid for dishonesty in every bureau of the internal revenue throughout the country. On that I rest the question. It is not sound legislation. It is not creditable to this body. It is not dignified.

Mr. BINGHAM. I move the following amendment to the amendment:

Except in cases of commissions to fill vacancies which may have happened by death or resignation during the recess of the Senate.

I call the attention of the committee to the fact, as the amendment stands it excludes the payment of assessors or collectors commissioned by the President to fill vacancies happening during the recess of the Senate. If a vacancy happen by death or resignation, so stands your Constitution, the President is empowered to fill that vacancy by a commission which shall expire at the end of the next session of the Senate. There is certainly no man here prepared to say that that duty, enjoined upon the President by the express words of the Constitution, shall nevertheless be so far interfered with that the person so commissioned shall receive no compensation. There is no excuse for any such legislation. On the other hand, I am free to confess that I am not of that class of persons who suppose that the words in the Constitution of the United States, "vacancies that may happen during the recess of the Senate," may be tortured into any such construction as has been attempted to be put upon them by the present Executive, to wit: that he will make vacancies at his arbitrary will and pleasure without regard to the public interest. Satisfy this House that a vacancy has been created in that way for corrupt ends, and you satisfy it at once that the Executive is guilty of a high crime and misdemeanor within the meaning of the Constitution. When he is armed by the Constitution with all executive power and charged with the duty to take care that the laws are faithfully executed, it never by implication or otherwise was intended that he, under pretense of executing the laws of the United States, should remove men from office duly appointed and commissioned by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, not because of incapacity or infidelity to duty, but men of eminent capacity, because of their stern fidelity to duty and unwillingness to corrupt a trust.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman allow me to ask a question?

Mr. BINGHAM. Yes, sir.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I wish to inquire whether President Lincoln did not during the whole term of his tenure of the executive power, exercise it in the same manner in which the gentleman now complains President Johnson has done?

Mr. BINGHAM. The gentleman misunderstood me. I qualified the words which I uttered, and when the gentleman asks me a question of that sort he assumes that I have decided myself that removals have been made for corrupt purposes.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. It is not for me, Mr. Chairman, nor for the gentleman from Ohio to inquire into the motives of either President Lincoln or President Johnson, but I do assert that they have occupied exactly the same position in reference to these removals from office. In other words, that Mr. Lincoln removed persons from office during his term in the same manner as Mr. Johnson has done, for political purposes. I do not assert that Mr. Lincoln did it for corrupt purposes at all; neither do I believe that Mr. Johnson has done it for such. And I am glad to hear that the gentleman from Ohio qualifies his statement, and says he has not made up his mind on that point.

Mr. BINGHAM. I was only saying that the gentleman had done me injustice in overlooking the fact before he took the floor at all.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I did not mean to misstate the gentleman's position.

Mr. BINGHAM. I have no doubt the gentleman did not mean it, but I was explaining to the House why I made this exception, and having said that much and the gentleman having made the suggestion which he has by way of explanation of his position, I beg leave to notify him—and it is a further justification of the exception that is made here for the present—that we are charged by the Constitution and by our oaths, in case the question comes before us, with the duty of deciding that very question, whether the President of the United States has for corrupt personal ends created vacancies in any office hitherto filled, in accordance with the provisions of the Constitution, by joint act of the President and Senate of the United States.

I repeat what I said before in justification of the exception I have made by the amendment which I have offered, that in case the House of Representatives, upon full investigation and inquiry, comes to the conclusion that the President of the United States, for corrupt personal ends and not because of incapacity or of infidelity to duty, has removed a competent and faithful officer, he is guilty of a high crime and misdemeanor within the terms of the Constitution. The decision of that question in the first place belongs to the House. Therefore it is I make the exception.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I can only say that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BINGHAM] has given us some sort of notice of what he is going to do with the President. I doubt not the acts of the President will stand the test of examination, and the sooner you commence your work and cease to threaten the better.

Mr. BINGHAM. I have not said what I am going to do. I have only stated why I made the exception which I indicated.

The question was upon the amendment of Mr. BINGHAM to the amendment of Mr. BENJAMIN.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I desire to modify my amendment so that it will read as follows:

Provided, That no assessor or collector, not appointed to fill a vacancy caused by death or resignation, shall be entitled to or paid any portion of the salary pertaining to the office of said collector or assessor unless confirmed by the Senate.

Mr. STEVENS. I understood yesterday that the Committee of the Whole, by unanimous consent, adopted the five-minute rule, which allows but five minutes debate for and five minutes against any one proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair so understands.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I desire to say in regard to the amendment I have offered, that I have no desire to interfere with those assessors and collectors who have been appointed to fill vacancies caused by death, resignation, or anything else that should entitle them in justice to receive their pay. But we know this very well, that persons who have been rejected by the Senate, who have not been able to command a single vote in that body for their confirmation, have been reappointed by the President, and are now discharging the duties of assessors and collectors under the internal revenue law.

Now, we all agree that the Senate is entitled to a voice in this matter; that the Senate is entitled to a say-so as to who shall discharge the duties of these offices. The Senate has expressed its opinion in condemnation of many of these persons; but in spite of that expression of opinion the President has appointed them, and they are now discharging the duties of these offices. It is to prevent payment in such cases that I have offered this amendment.

There is a case of the kind in my own district. An individual was appointed there during the session of the Senate at the last session of Congress. He failed to receive in favor of his confirmation a majority of the votes of the Senate; I am not certain that he received one vote. Yet immediately after the adjournment of the Senate he was reappointed and commissioned, and is to-day the collector of the district which I represent in this House. And other members here know of other cases of the kind, not only assessors and collectors, but many other officers. I have, however, offered my amendment to this appropriation, which is for the purpose of paying assessors and collectors, to prevent the payment of such officers as I have mentioned.

Mr. O'NEILL. I desired the floor a few minutes ago, in order to say a few words in reply to my colleague from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] on the other side of the House. It may be a little out of order for me to do so upon this amendment, and yet I may as well state to the House the difference, so far as Philadelphia is concerned, between the political appointments of Mr. Lincoln and those of the present Executive of this country.

Mr. STEVENS. I wish to ask for the enforcement of the rules.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is closed upon the pending amendment.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I hope my colleague [Mr. O'NEILL] will be allowed to proceed and that I may be allowed to clean him out. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. It requires unanimous consent.

No objection was made.

Mr. O'NEILL. What Abraham Lincoln did during his administration, and what Andrew Johnson has been doing during the last campaign, in the matter of political appointments, are entirely different things. The late President of the United States, I do not think, ever permitted or ever acquiesced in any such acts as have been performed under the present Executive. For instance, the present Secretary of the Navy within the past few months permitted a board of naval officers, two of them officers of the line, and another an officer of the engineers of the Navy, to sit in judgment upon the political status of the working men and master mechanics employed in the Philadelphia navy-yard. He permitted these officers officially to ask the question whether these poor working men and master mechanics belonged to a political organization opposed to the policy of Andrew Johnson. I do not know whether the present President ordered that to be done. But I do know that those officers of the Navy, departing from the true line of their duty; obliged, I have no doubt, to depart from it by an order; did sit as a board and inquire of master mechanics and others whether they belonged to the organization which elected radical Republican members to this House, and whether they marched in the processions of that organization. These inquiries were made a matter of record, which record I believe is now in the Navy Department.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, in reply—

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is exhausted.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I hope I shall be allowed the privilege—

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman can only proceed by unanimous consent. Is there any objection?

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I condemn as much as my colleague the act to which he alludes—

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I object to the gentleman from Pennsylvania proceeding out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The remarks of the gentleman from Pennsylvania are out of order, objection being made.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I move to amend by striking out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. No further amendment is in order. An amendment to the amendment is now pending.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I thought there was an understanding that I should be permitted to reply to the remarks of my colleague.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair must rule that debate is out of order.

The question being taken on the amendment to the amendment, it was agreed to.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I move to amend the amendment by striking out the last word. I wish to say in reply to my colleague, that I condemn just as much as he does the sitting of that board, which emanated from the authority of the commandant of the yard, a Republican; and so soon as the Navy Department was informed of the matter an order was issued countermmanding the action of the commodore of the yard.

Mr. O'NEILL. I desire to say that this board did sit, and that after its sitting those working men and master mechanics and others were discharged for the reason I have mentioned.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I rise to a point of order; there is an amendment pending, and debate is exhausted upon both.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I have proposed a new amendment to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BINGHAM] was voted upon; and the question recurring on the amendment, the gentleman from Pennsylvania moved an amendment to the amendment. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is in order.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. Now, I desire to say one word as to what Abraham Lincoln and those under him did in that navy-yard, during the period of his presidency. Abraham Lincoln wrote with his own hand a letter, which was read individually to the workmen of that yard, demanding that at the election then about to take place I should be beaten at all hazards. Gentlemen may talk about men in high position descending to small things. Why, sir, I felt humiliated to think that the President of the United States should have done such an act.

Again, sir, my colleague is perfectly well aware that during the Administration of President Lincoln a secret committee was organized in the city of Philadelphia, headed by an ex-sheriff, to inquire into the political sentiments of every man, woman, and child holding any employment under the Government; and according to my information every woman who had a brother who was a Democrat was deprived of employment as a sewing-woman in the United States arsenal at Philadelphia. Yet my distinguished friend [Mr. BINGHAM] has the effrontery—he will pardon the expression, for I entertain for him great respect—to complain of Andrew Johnson because he has made removals from office for political reasons. I am only sorry that he did not carry the war further into Africa than he did, and see how the action of Abraham Lincoln would stand the test which he would apply to the course of Andrew Johnson.

The secret committee to which I have alluded did not emanate from any Department; it had no legal authority whatever; it originated in a desire to persecute people for opinion's sake; and at that time my respected colleague was very ready to be the recipient of all the political benefits arising from that sort of a crusade.

Mr. O'NEILL. Mr. Speaker—

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. O'NEILL. Mr. Chairman, I was very much pleased to hear my colleague say that he felt humiliated at the fact of this board sitting in the Philadelphia navy-yard. I could name the gentlemen who were upon that board—distinguished officers of the Navy, some of whom had fought the battles of their country upon the sea. Not one of those men dared to protest officially against the requirement of this duty which they were called upon to perform. I will say here boldly that I consider it a high misdemeanor on the part of the Secretary of the Navy, or any other officer, to call naval officers from the discharge of their legitimate duties to perform the miserable work which was required of these officers. Whether they were ordered to do it by the President or the Secretary of the Navy or the chief of the Bureau of Yards and Docks or by the commandant of the yard, all I have to say is that the record of their examination into the political status of the employés in that yard is now on file in the Navy Department, and those who did not pass the examination satisfactorily to the political exactions of the Johnson party were discharged, although many of them but one year before had successfully passed a competitive examination, open to the whole world, for the places which they filled.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. And some of the men who had been indicted for stealing were reinstated.

Mr. STEVENS. I must rise to a point of order, for the purpose of putting a stop to this discussion, which is clearly out of order.

Mr. O'NEILL. I want to say a word in reply to my colleague.

Mr. SPALDING. I hope Pennsylvania may have the floor.

Mr. STEVENS. Subjects have been brought here and discussed which have nothing to do with this bill; and the rule is, in the five-minutes debate, that gentlemen should be confined strictly to the pending amendment.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I thought my colleague was always in favor of a "scrimmage," and I hope he will not stop this one.

Mr. STEVENS. I insist the debate shall be confined to the pending amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order. The question recurs on the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. BENJAMIN.]

Mr. LE BLOND. I rise to a point of order. While the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri was pending, the gentleman from Pennsylvania moved to amend it by striking out the last two words; and the question now is, therefore, not upon the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri, but on the amendment to the amendment moved by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understood the gentleman from Pennsylvania offered his amendment merely for the purpose of making some remarks. Indeed, when it was offered no amendment was in order.

Mr. LE BLOND. I understand when a motion is made the Chair is not to determine whether it is made simply for delay, or for the purpose of speaking on it, or made in good faith. I understand that to be the jurisdiction of this House. I insist, therefore, on the question being presented to the House in its proper form.

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania will say that he made the amendment in good faith the Chair will put it to the House.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I did make my amendment in good faith, and I thought I had one minute left. [Laughter.] If not, I will withdraw my amendment to the amendment.

The amendment, as amended, was then agreed to.

Mr. LE BLOND. I move to amend the amendment by striking out the last two words.

The CHAIRMAN. As I understand the parliamentary rules the gentleman's amendment is not in order.

Mr. STEVENS. The words cannot be stricken out because they have just been inserted.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment, as amended, has been adopted, and is not subject to further amendment.

Mr. LE BLOND. I understand the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania was still pending, and hence the other proposition could not be offered.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. The Chair has decided, and I object to further debate.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not want to be rude to gentlemen. He is only temporarily in the chair and he hopes the gentlemen will confine themselves to the rule.

Mr. LE BLOND. I take an appeal from the decision of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair decides that the amendment to the amendment, and the amendment as amended were adopted. From that decision the gentleman takes an appeal.

While the question was being put to the House Mr. LE BLOND continued to seek the floor, but was not recognized by the Chair.

The decision of the Chair was sustained.

Mr. LE BLOND. I yield to power but not justice.

The Clerk read as follows:

Contingent expenses of the Treasury Department. In the office of the Secretary of the Treasury:

For copying, labor, binding, sealingships' registers, translating foreign languages, advertising, and extra clerk hire for preparing and collecting information to be laid before Congress, and for miscellaneous items, $10,000.

For temporary clerks in the Treasury Department: Provided, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized, in his discretion, to classify the clerks authorized according to the character of their services, $50,000.

Mr. MAYNARD. I move, in line three hundred and seventy, after the word "services," to insert the following:

And in his discretion to employ ladies when their services can be made equally profitable.

I do not propose to argue this amendment. It is a subject we have all had before us. I leave it to the good sense and good feeling of the House. It gives to the Secretary of the Treasury, in expending this sum of $50,000 for temporary clerks, the discretion to employ ladies when they can be employed as economically as men. It has been tried for several years and in the main has worked well.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I move to strike out the whole paragraph in reference to temporary clerks. It will make no difference so far as the amendment of my friend from Tennessee is concerned, for the Secretary of the Treasury has already the authority to employ ladies as temporary clerks, and there is no necessity for giving him the authority over again.

I am against giving the Secretary of the Treasury authority to employ clerks at his discretion, and at his discretion to classify them. I think it is high time to stop the giving of this discretionary power to employ and classify these temporary clerks. If any legislation is needed it is a law to reorganize and classify the clerks. We have seen how the Secretary of the Treasury has exercised the discretion which Congress has heretofore given him. We gave him $250,000 two years ago to be distributed through his Department to clerks according to merit and the character of their services. He expended a portion of that by giving it to the heads of bureaus, and fourth-class clerks, perhaps giving a little of this money to third-class clerks, but not a dollar to the first and second class clerks or to the ladies and messengers employed at a small compensation. Last year Congress provided how he should distribute the balance of the appropriation. We directed it to be expended on the low-class clerks and employes of the Department. We then gave him an additional appropriation at his discretion again, and how has he disposed of that. In the same way that he disposed of a portion of the first appropriation of $250,000, by giving it to the heads of the bureaus and higher-class clerks. So, if we give him this $50,000, according to the precedent already set, how will he expend it? Why, he will give it to the heads of the bureaus, and perhaps to such of the clerks as he happens to like best. He will give a portion of it to the fourth-class clerks, but not one cent to those men with families who are trying to live on $1,200 a year.

Mr. HILL. I would inquire of the gentleman what information he has as to the manner in which the money has been expended. A resolution was introduced a few days ago calling for that information, but I am not aware that it has been replied to.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I am not aware that any official information is before the House. I get my information from the persons about the Department who say they know that the money has been distributed in this manner. So, I hope this giving the Secretary money to distribute to his clerks according to his discretion will be stopped.

Mr. LE BLOND. I wish to offer a few remarks in reference to this proposition. It is curtailing the powers of the Secretary. It is akin to the proposition disposed of by the House in a very summary and unheard-of manner but a few moments ago. Sir, this system of legislation I for one feel it my duty in my my humble capacity to oppose, and I do so in good faith and not with any captious disposition.

Who is best qualified to know the character of persons that are serving under another; their capacity to discharge their duties and their worth as officers in the Department? None so well as the men who have charge of the Departments. This same principle prevails throughout your whole Government. There is no one who knows better the worth of an officer and his faithfulness to the Government than the man who has the appointing power, or who is chief executive over a certain class of these officers. He has control of them and he should make the appointment.

There are gentlemen here who in the last political contest went over the country saying that a certain party was a "bread and butter brigade." What evidence have we had of the truth of the assertion on this floor? It is a struggle on the part of these men who shall hold these offices and strip the Executive of the appointing power. Who constitute the "bread and butter brigade?" Why, sir, the very Constitution is stricken down, all the powers that have been conferred upon the President of the United States and exercised since the foundation of the Government are to be upturned, and for what? For the purpose of saving the "bread and butter" to the party here who seek to control matters in their own way, right or wrong.

Sir, sound policy and economy require that the power of appointing these officers should be in the President. It has been so exercised by all the Executives from President Jackson down to the present time. There never was a time in the history of the American Republic when so many officers' heads fell as during the three months when General Harrison was President of the United States. That fact has become history. Did you find the party then in power saying it was wrong? Did you find the opposition party legislating against the Executive for the purpose of retaining patronage? No, sir. The party then in power adhered to the policy that had been inaugurated because it was wholesome. Did you find any of the gentlemen on the other side complaining during the administration of President Lincoln because he removed Democrats? Not a word of complaint emanated from that side. Everything was right. But now, when the present Executive, a man of their own choice, seeks to exercise that power and to use the patronage for the purpose of carrying out constitutional measures, you find these very men rising up here and complaining of the Administration for the exercise of lawful power.

Now, the contest goes on as to who is to have this bread and this butter, who are to have epaulettes on their shoulders as the officers of this "bread and butter brigade." Well, sir, from the strides that are being taken by the dominant party in this House I think there is no question where it will rest. My colleague [Mr. BINGHAM] has even thrown out an intimation—if I understand him aright, and I call his attention to it—that removals for political reasons are to be considered as corruption in office. He spoke of removals for cause and removals for disability, but did not allude to the other class of removals. That leaves it to be inferred that where the Executive removes for political considerations it is corruption in office.

Mr. BINGHAM. Will the gentleman allow me to say that I said nothing of the sort?

The question was upon the motion of Mr. FARNSWORTH, to strike out the paragraph.

Mr. BINGHAM. I move to amend the paragraph pro forma, by striking out the last word. It was very far from my purpose, when I introduced the proviso to the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. BENJAMIN], to excite or authorize any such remarks on the part of any gentleman as have just fallen from the lips of my friend over the way, [Mr. LE BLOND.] On the contrary, lest they might be some apology or excuse for such utterances as the gentleman has just made, I qualified my meaning by my own language so as to exclude any conclusion like that which the gentleman has announced. I stated that where the President of the United States makes a removal from office corruptly and for personal ends he was guilty of a high crime and misdemeanor, and that the Constitution charged us upon our oaths to make that inquiry and decide that question.

Mr. LE BLOND. Will my colleague permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. BINGHAM. Certainly.

Mr. LE BLOND. Does my colleague wish it understood that a removal from office for political reasons merely is one of the class he speaks of?

Mr. BINGHAM. I have made no intimation that would even justify such an inquiry. So far as I am personally concerned I excluded all inquiries of that sort. But as the question comes up, I am free to say further—and if anybody will persuade me that I am wrong in my judgment at any time, upon this or any other question, I will change it—I am free to say that where the removal is made merely because of personal considerations toward the party removed, and not with any corrupt motive on the part of the Executive, the removal being made in accordance with the continued practice of the Government from its organization to the present time, it would not in my opinion be a high crime or misdemeanor. Is my colleague [Mr. LE BLOND] satisfied?

Mr. CHANLER. Will the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BINGHAM] yield to me for a moment?

Mr. BINGHAM. No, sir. I introduced that proviso for the purpose of preventing what I believed would be a flagrant violation of the written text and spirit of the Constitution of my country. I was provoked into these other remarks in the course of the debate, yet I intend to ask no pardon, to offer no apology for what I have said upon that subject. But I will take care that no man shall make a speech for me, or put into my mouth words which I never uttered or intended to utter. I think it would be well when this bill comes into the House to amend this portion of it—the amendment of my friend from Missouri [Mr. BENJAMIN]—so as to make it conform to the exact words of the Constitution. Gentlemen may say that it would be nugatory. I admit that it would be unless we proceed with the legislation already inaugurated to determine by law the legal effect of the words in the Constitution.

I have said this much to vindicate my own position, and to correct the impression which might otherwise be produced by the remarks made by my colleague, [Mr. LE BLOND.] I now withdraw my amendment to the amendment.

Mr. CHANLER. I renew the amendment. Mr. Chairman, in the remarks which I made in regard to the original motion of the gentleman from Missouri the same question arose as to the patronage of the Administration. With such patronage, whether it be in the hands of the Executive, or directly in the hands of the people's representatives in Congress, I wish to have nothing to do.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I rise to a point of order. I must insist that this debate is entirely out of order. My amendment has no political bearing whatever.

Mr. CHANLER. I am not speaking on any political question.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. CHANLER] will confine himself to the amendment, which is to strike out the word "dollars."

Mr. CHANLER. I call for the reading of the whole paragraph as proposed to be amended.

The paragraph was read.

Mr. CHANLER. I modify my amendment, and move to amend by striking out all after the word "employ."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentlemen will proceed in order.

Mr. CHANLER. Now, sir, the question is as to the employment of persons by this Government in certain Executive Departments; and I shall proceed to debate that question as I was proceeding to debate it when thus discourteously interrupted by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FARNSWORTH] who presented the amendment. I was proceeding to debate it in good faith, as I suppose he offered it in good faith. But the part of the political bully, played by the other side of the House, is performed with especial grace by the individual who has assumed to cut off debate upon his own proposition.

Now, sir, I wish to set myself right upon the record here with regard to this question of executive patronage, whether in the Treasury Department or any other Department. I am no advocate of the President, and I cannot take the position assumed by my friend from Ohio, [Mr. LE BLOND.] I am, sir, for the limitation of executive power. I am for the limitation of the administration of patronage by every department of this Government, and for the distribution of it through and among the representatives of the people. This is the only wholesome basis on which the Democratic party can exist.

I thank the gentlemen from Illinois for bringing this question before the House. We on this side of the House cannot support the policy of Abraham Lincoln, even though it be under the protection of Andrew Johnson. What was done under the plea of a "military necessity" shall not, with my sanction, be done when that plea is abandoned by those who originated it. When gentlemen on the other side have abandoned their own official, elected by themselves, for the distribution of patronage, I for one will not take him up.

I have had nothing to do with the distribution of patronage in the Treasury Department. As a Representative elected by Democratic votes I do not wish to participate in that patronage. It never has been at my command, and until I join with the Administration I will not condescend to ask any share of it. I wish the line to be drawn between Democrats of the Democratic party and Democrats of the Conservative Republican party who desire to live upon the pap and patronage of the Administration. I wish to be understood, sir, as belonging to the young Democracy of this continent, and not to the Democracy of the Treasury Department or any other Department. I wish to be understood as being a radical of radicals in the Democratic faith. I am not one of those who are willing to make discriminations against their own race and to exclude white men in order to let in black women to work in the Treasury Department. I cannot follow the gentleman from Illinois in all the ramifications of his philanthropy and his love for the female sex.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. Chairman, I rise to oppose the amendment of the gentleman from New York, as I understand it. I merely want the House to know the condition of this whole provision.

Last year Congress granted an appropriation of $160,000 to be distributed at the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury among the clerks and officers of the Department. That provision was not acceptable to the House, but was assented to in the committee of conference and agreed to by the House in order that the bill might pass. I then made up my mind that I should vote for no more such appropriations with so large discretion allowed in the expenditure. The Secretary of the Treasury distributed that money in a manner which some gentlemen may consider right, but which I deem a great abuse of it. Instead of making allowances to those who had salaries of $1,200 and $1,400, he paid the auditors $1,000 additional; the chief clerks $800, and so on. All those who did not need any extra allowance received it; and the Secretary's only justification, as far as I know, is to be found in the Bible, where it speaks of taking from those that have not and giving to those that have. [Laughter.]

I will refer to the estimates. It asked for an appropriation for temporary clerks in the Treasury Department, provided that the Secretary of the Treasury be, and is hereby, authorized in his discretion to classify the clerks authorized according to the character of their services; and provided further, that the Secretary of the Treasury may award such additional compensation to the officers and clerks as in his judgment may be deemed just and may be required by the public service. That continued the discretion. The Department asked $250,000. The committee struck out all discretionary power, and left the Secretary of the Treasury $50,000 for temporary clerks, thinking there may be a time when regular clerks may not be needed and temporary clerks might be employed to the extent of $50,000. We struck out all discretionary power on the ground that this discretion was exercised without discretion and with gross partiality for the last two years. It was disagreed to by the House at the last session, but was adopted in the report of the committee of conference. I do not care whether the $50,000 is voted or not. The committee reduced it from $250,000 to $50,000, and I do not care whether it is all stricken out.

Mr. CHANLER. I withdraw my amendment to the amendment.

The question then recurred on Mr. FARNSWORTH'S amendment, and it was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL asked and obtained unanimous consent to return to the following paragraph:

For rent, dies, paper, and so forth, for stamps and incidental expenses, including the cost of subscriptions, and so forth, of such numbers of copies of the internal revenue records and customs journals as the Secretary of the Treasury may deem necessary to supply the revenue offices, $250,000.

Mr. MORRILL. I move to strike out the words "and so forth" in lines three hundred and forty-eight and three hundred and fifty, and also in lines three hundred and fifty and three hundred and fifty-one to strike out "Internal Revenue records and customs journals," and to insert in lieu thereof, "Internal Revenue Record and Custom Journal," it being a newspaper published in New York.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For compensation of additional clerks in the General Land Office, under the act of 31 March, 1855, granting bounty land, and for laborers employed therein, $83,640: Provided, That the Secretary of the Interior, at his discretion, shall be, and he is hereby, authorized to use any portion of said appropriation for piece-work, or by the day, week, month, or year, at such rate or rates as he may deem just and fair, not exceeding a salary of $1,200 per annum.

Mr. HARDING, of Illinois. I offer the following amendment:

Add the following: Provided, further, That said work shall be given only to persons in indigent circumstances, and to soldiers and to widows of soldiers who served in the Union Army during the late rebellion, and to be done only by the employé in person.

I do not intend to take up the time of the House with any lengthy remarks on the subject. I wish to correct an abuse I understand to exist relative to the service contemplated by this section. I hear, sir, that persons obtain work under that section and sub-let it so that they are able to make quite a sum of money, and are thus enabled to travel for pleasure and to spend a considerable portion of the summer at the springs. I know that persons, competent to perform the service, widows of soldiers who fell at Gettysburg, have been turned away after repeated efforts to procure some portion of this work to pay their daily board. I think I can assure the House, if proper investigation be made, it will be found that persons not at all in indigent circumstances, who have friends high in office, are receiving most of this work, for which they are receiving high compensation. I have for this reason moved the amendment.

Mr. STEVENS. I believe what the gentleman says about the employment of clerks, and it is true in regard to all of the Departments. I believe a great many who do not need it are appointed. A great many are appointed because members of Congress insist upon the employment of their friends; and they are employed without regard to their merits and necessity. I suppose it is so with regard to those who have been appointed at the suggestion of members on the other side of the House, as we have no power of appointment. It has been the practice, and I do not see how the Committee on Appropriations can refuse to pay those who are there under the law. We must make the appropriation if they are there according to the law.

Mr. HARDING, of Illinois. I beg leave to correct the gentleman; it is not to refuse to pay but to limit the employment to persons in indigent circumstances and soldiers and the widows of soldiers.

Mr. STEVENS. I suppose they will say any one is indigent who wants money. [Laughter.] The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GRINNELL. I move to strike out the following:

Bureau of statistics:
For contingent expenses, namely: laborers, office furniture, carpets, fitting up files, and miscellaneous items, $4,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For compensation of the Secretary of War, Assistant Secretaries of War, solicitor, chief clerk, and the clerks, messenger, assistant messengers, and laborer in his office, $61,340.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I move to insert the word "Secretary" instead of "Secretaries." I do not suppose there is any necessity for two Assistant Secretaries of War.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STEVENS. I move to strike out the word "solicitor."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I move to strike out this item under the head of "Post Office Department":

For additional and temporary clerks, $40,000.

I would like to understand the reason for the employment of these additional clerks, and what reason there is for employing more clerks in the Post Office Department than they had before the war. During the war they were employing not so many on account of the post offices being closed in all the southern part of the country. Now, I suppose the post offices are reopened and the post routes restored, but there is yet no addition, as I conceive, to the duties of the Post Office Department beyond what they were before the war. I know it is the custom of the heads of the Departments to increase their estimates from year to year. If you give them the right to employ additional clerks this year they send in an estimate for more the next year. They always increase but never diminish their demands.

Mr. STEVENS. This is the usual appropriation. It has been going on from year to year. The Department always finds it convenient to employ others than the regular clerks from time to time.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I think my friend from Pennsylvania is mistaken. This has been going on for the last year or two, but I do not think a precedent can be found for it before the war. The excuse for the last year and the year before was the additional labor in the Post Office Department, in consequence of reopening post offices and post routes throughout the South. Now, I admit that they are entitled to all the clerks they had when all the post offices in the country were in operation, but I see no necessity for more.

The question being taken on the amendment, it was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For compensation of Commissioner of Agriculture, chief clerk, entomologist, chemist, and the clerks and employes in his office, $33,020.

Mr. MAYNARD. I move to insert after the word "chemist" the words "and assistants." I am aware that this Department of Agriculture is in a little bad odor with this body, and perhaps elsewhere, but that it is a most important Department in the economy of our Government I have long been satisfied. And there is no branch of it I think of more importance than the chemist's laboratory. At present the laboratory is confined to a very small, dark, unhealthy room, hardly sufficient for a private gentleman to conduct experiments as an amateur. The amount of apparatus is also very small and wholly insufficient. The principal chemist is expected, as some one has expressed it, to be "his own glass-holder and bottle-washer," and perform all the manual operations without assistance. The chemist of the Department ought to have leisure for a great many other things than the mere manipulation of the laboratory.

This department of agricultural chemistry connected with the Department of Agriculture should, in my opinion, be enlarged and made more serviceable and effective than it now is. In order to do that it is necessary to give the chemist at least two assistants, and I think we might as well make the provision to that effect at this point in this bill as at any other. I do not desire to detain the committee by enlarging on this subject. It is one of not very lively interest, I am aware, but one of great practical importance to a great number of agricultural people.

The amendment was not agreed to.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill, and read as follows:

For purchase and distribution of valuable seeds, namely:

For purchase of cereal, vegetable, and flower seeds, and for labor in putting up seeds, seed bags, and miscellaneous items, $80,000: Provided, That the Commissioner of Agriculture shall only purchase and distribute, with the fund herein appropriated for that purpose, such seeds as are rare and uncommon to the country or such as can be made more profitable by frequent changes from one part of our own country to another.

Mr. WENTWORTH. I think there should be another proviso to this paragraph. I therefore move to amend it by adding the following:

And provided further, That he shall purchase seeds in this country only for distribution in foreign countries, and that he shall distribute in this country only seeds purchased in foreign countries.

I have, as an agriculturist, been familiar with this Department of Agriculture from its origin. I think it has gone far beyond the original intention of the agriculturists who labored for its establishment.

Mr. BIDWELL. I would suggest to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WENTWORTH] that he can accomplish his object better upon another bill, upon the bill for the reorganization of the Agricultural Department.

Mr. DAWES. And I would suggest another amendment to this effect; that the beans which have already been left with members be returned. [Laughter.]

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I second that amendment.

Mr. WENTWORTH. I very frequently find that I have been sending home to my constituents seeds that can be bought anywhere in the West. Now, I do not censure the present Commissioner of Agriculture for this. All other Commissioners of Agriculture have done the same thing, and the present Commissioner is expected to continue doing what they did.

I find upon going to the seed department, especially in the spring of the year, the inhabitants of this city and the neighboring country up there begging for seeds. A great many of them have learned to go there to get their supply of seeds from the Department. Yet I am not one who entertains the opinion of the present Commissioner which seems to be entertained by many gentlemen in this House. I think he is a very worthy gentleman, one well qualified for the place he occupies. I think he will comply with any restrictions or limitations which we may apply. Those of us who have paid any attention to this subject certainly know that great abuses have crept into that Department, abuses which the Commissioner may not feel authorized to remove at his own instance.

Mr. MAYNARD. I wish to call the attention of the gentlemen from Illinois [Mr. WENTWORTH] to this fact, that different portions of our country with different climates and different soils require different seeds. Those that flourish very well in one locality will not flourish in another. By changing seeds from one part of the country to another, their growth is vastly improved. For example, the growth of wheat in our country has been almost entirely renovated, once if not twice, within a few years past in that way. That feature of the Agricultural Department, the transmission of seeds from one portion of the country to another, has been of great service.

Mr. WENTWORTH. I think I understand this subject as well as the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. MAYNARD,] for I have thoroughly investigated it. The people of the North are raising and sending seeds all through the country, North and South; and the people of the South are raising seeds. You can buy almost anywhere such seeds as are required in this country. But I have no objection to the purchase of foreign seeds for this country, or the purchase of seeds in this country for foreign countries.

Mr. STEVENS. I know that every year some assault is made upon this Department of Agriculture. I know also that there is no branch of this Government in which the people generally take so much interest as in this Department. The distribution of seeds especially is valued very highly in the agricultural portions of the nation. I do not know anything in which my constituents feel more interest than they do in getting a change of seeds even from portions of our own country. Transferring seed from one locality to another, as the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MAYNARD] has well said, is a very excellent thing, having very often a most remarkable renovating effect. If you strike out this appropriation, therefore, you strike out that which is very much desired by all the agriculturists of Lancaster county, Pennsylvania.

I know that in the distribution of these seeds there are many things that look frivolous. There are some things done, I suppose, to please the ladies, and some things to please the gardeners; yet this distribution of seeds is all very useful, and I do not think that heretofore there has been any abuse in this matter except such as is incident to all human affairs. I believe that this distribution of seeds, together with all the other operations of the Department of Agriculture, has been of great public advantage, and the Department ought to be cherished for the benefit of the public at large. Although it is easy to ridicule a few items introduced in this bill, yet I think that these appropriations for the benefit of the agricultural interests of the country are of great importance. The Department of Agriculture has been so conducted that it has proved more valuable than I ever expected it to be.

Mr. BIDWELL. I move to amend the amendment by striking out the last word.

Notwithstanding all the embarrassments and imperfections that may be connected with the operations of the Department of Agriculture, I think we ought not to do anything which may have the effect of crippling it and marring still further its efficiency. I believe that this Department might be and should be reorganized and made more efficient. It is a Department in whose operations the entire country takes an interest and a pride.

The proposition of the gentleman from Illinois is one which cannot be introduced here so as to be made effectual and practical. There is no doubt that seeds can be purchased in Europe and introduced in this country to very great advantage; and the practice should be continued. I think, also, that it is of advantage to purchase seeds in our own country and send them to Europe, exchanging them perhaps for European seeds. It is also desirable to exchange the seeds of one part of our country for those of another portion. But the necessary legislation for carrying out this object cannot be properly embodied in a brief amendment to an appropriation bill. We cannot in this hasty manner prescribe the necessary legislation as a guide for the Commissioner of Agriculture, so that the object we have in view may be put into practice. We had better allow the clause of the bill to stand as it is, and let a bill be introduced hereafter for the reorganization of that Department. This is my judgment on the matter. I hope that the amendment will not prevail.

Mr. MAYNARD. I would like to ask the gentleman from California [Mr. BIDWELL] a question: is there not as much difference between the crops of his State and those of mine as there is between the crops of either of our States and those of any country in Europe?

Mr. BIDWELL. Oh, yes, sir. And I believe that the Commissioner of Agriculture ought to require every person upon the Pacific coast to whom seeds are sent, to send in return a certain quantity of seeds raised in that region. In other words, seeds raised in the Atlantic States should be distributed on the Pacific coast, and those raised on the Pacific coast should be distributed in the States of the east. There are great advantages in exchanging seeds, as I know by experience. I withdraw my amendment to the amendment.

Mr. WENTWORTH. I renew the amendment; and I desire to say that I trust nothing I have said may be construed as reflecting in any way upon the Department of Agriculture, and least of all upon the Commissioner, although I think that great abuses have crept into the Department with reference to the purchase of American seed for American distribution. But, as the gentleman from California, [Mr. BIDWELL], who is the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture, and no doubt understands this subject thoroughly, has declared his intention or willingness to introduce a bill for the reorganization of this Department, a measure which will provide a cure for existing abuses and secure the intended efficiency of this branch of the governmental administration, I am willing to withdraw my amendment. I shall look to him to introduce a proper measure for remedying all existing defects.

Mr. BIDWELL. I pledge myself to the gentleman to use my urgent exertions to accomplish that end.

Mr. WENTWORTH. Then I withdraw the amendment to the amendment, and also the original amendment.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I move to amend by striking out in the seven hundred and eighty-sixth line the word "eighty" and inserting "sixty"; so that the clause will read:

For purchase of cereal, vegetable, and flower seeds, and for labor in putting up seeds, seed bags, and miscellaneous items, $60,000.

This will make the appropriation correspond in amount with that made last year.

Mr. BIDWELL. I trust the gentleman will give us some reason why this amendment should be adopted.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Sixty thousand dollars was considered sufficient last year; and I do not see why the same amount should not be enough now.

Mr. BIDWELL. I think that $80,000 was the amount appropriated last year.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. The document in my hand shows that the appropriation last year for this item was $60,000. This year the amount called for by the estimates of the Commissioner was $90,000. The committee reduced it from $90,000 to $80,000, striking off $10,000; and I desire the Committee of the Whole shall reduce it to the appropriation of last year.

It will be observed by the House that these estimates are increasing from year to year. If Congress gives every time they ask all they ask, they will run up thousands every year. It is our duty to keep them in bounds. I wish to keep this within the bounds of last year. My proposition of seeds under that appropriation is all I ask.

Mr. MORRILL. I move to amend the amendment by reducing the sum to $40,000.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I accept that.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. Chairman, I have heretofore struggled to make some reformation in that Department, but our friends are so fond of the "stistics" and "anilyas" of the Department that I have never been able to succeed. We have here an appropriation of $38,000 for employes without any specification and left entirely to the disposal of the chief of Department. When this Department was first established that sum was, I believe, about the amount of the whole cost of its annual maintenance. As the gentleman from Illinois has stated, all we allowed last year was $60,000—much more than was necessary if economically expended. All of the items as this year proposed in this appropriation amount to $162,000—every year increasing, as will be seen, and more than three times what it cost only a few years ago. And beyond this the Commissioner is allowed to go to the Public Printing Office and have published a monthly or semi-monthly document costing the Government, as I am informed, an amount equal to this whole appropriation. Some of the articles published in this governmental periodical may be of some value, but they might much better be included in the annual report.

It strikes me we should at this time pay some attention to the expenditures made in this as well as in other Departments. And what is the character of the seeds we receive? Seven eighths are precisely such as you can go to any agricultural seed-store and buy. I will do the justice to say that even the old names of thirty years ago have not been changed. It is nothing more than a bonus to those people who see fit to write to the Department or call upon it for their regular annual supply of common garden seeds. Look at the way in which these seeds are expended, saying nothing of the equally extravagant manner in which they are purchased. One half at least are given to those who call either in person or by letter upon the Department for their supplies. For those who happen to live near by it is just the thing to call and select their annual supply of seeds without paying for them; while those who live at remote distances are compelled to forego such privileges. It seems to me equally unfair that persons living near by or remote from the capital shall be allowed annually to address a letter to the Department for parcels of seed, thus sponging them out of the Government instead of paying for them at the agricultural seed-stores. These are little matters but they constitute a large item in the expenditures of the Department. And I speak from knowledge that the quality of these seeds is inferior to what they were some years ago. Then we had the best kind selected from the old varieties, and some of a new and rare sort. Now we have the commonest varieties and sometimes the poorest distributed in small parcels, a large share of which are useless when received because not suited to the climate. I do not wish to cripple this Department. I wish to reform it and make it worthy of the Government; and now everybody knows that it is discreditable.

Mr. SPALDING. I move that the committee meet now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. LAWRENCE, of Pennsylvania, reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union having had under consideration the state of the Union generally, and particularly House bill No. 896, making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending the 30th of June, 1868, had made sundry amendments thereto.

OCCUPATION OF SAN JUAN.

Mr. DENNY, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to this House, if this can be done compatibly with the public interest, a copy of all correspondence between the Government of the United States and Her Britannic Majesty's Government on the subject of the joint occupancy of the island of San Juan, in Washington Territory.

RECONSTRUCTION.

Mr. STEVENS. I desire to move to take up House bill No. 623, to enable the States lately in rebellion to regain their privileges in the Union, for the purpose of offering some amendments and having them printed. It is an important bill lying over from the last session, and ought to be taken up and acted on after the holidays.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I object.

Mr. STEVENS. I move to postpone all the preceding special orders.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. STEVENS. I present certain amendments to the bill and move that they be printed. The motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. JOHN W. FORNEY, its Secretary, informed the House that the Senate had framed a joint resolution (S. R. No. 140) for the relief of Charles Clark, marshal of the United States for the district of Maine, in which he was directed to request the concurrence of the House.

ORDER OF BUSINESS FOR TO-MORROW.

Mr. HALE. I ask unanimous consent that the House devote to-morrow to the consideration of the President's annual message, in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and that no other business be transacted.

Several MEMBERS. Oh, that will not do.

Mr. STEVENS. I hope we will have no such understanding. If there is no quorum here that will be the fact, but I object to losing another day in addition to the two weeks' recess.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. As chairman of the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, I desire to say that there are many gentlemen, some thirty I believe, who desire to make speeches; and I hope unanimous consent will be given to devote to-morrow to speech-making. We lose no time by it.

Mr. STEVENS. Suppose we say to-morrow and during the vacation. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. That will not be in order, as the two Houses have resolved not to be in session.

Mr. SPALDING and Mr. FINCK objected to making the order.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. COBB, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled a bill (S. No. 62) to amend an act entitled "An act granting lands to the State of Oregon to aid in the construction of a military road from Eugene City to the eastern boundary of said State;" when the Speaker signed the same.

LIBRARY OF CONGRESS.

Mr. HAYES, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing under the law:

Resolved, That the usual number of copies of the report of the Librarian of Congress for the present session be printed for the use of the House.

UNITED STATES TROOPS IN MEXICO.

Mr. RANDALL, of Kentucky, by unanimous consent, offered the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the President be requested to communicate to the House, if in his opinion not inconsistent with the public interest, any further information in regard to the occupation of the Mexican Territory by the troops of the United States which he may have received since he sent to this House his message of the 8th instant.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

On motion of Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts, leave of absence was granted to his colleague, Mr. HOOVER, who had been called home on account of death in his family.

And then, on motion of Mr. FINCK, (at ten minutes before four o'clock p. m.,) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS.

The following petitions were presented under the rule, and referred to the appropriate committees:

By Mr. HAYES: The petition of Ernst F. Kleinschmidt, of Hamilton county, Ohio, for the return of $12 50 paid to the collector of the second district of Ohio at a tax sale made without authority of law.

By Mr. STOKES: A petition from a portion of the loyal colored men of Tennessee, asking for justice and equal rights.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, December 20, 1866.

Prayer by Rev. A. WRIGHT, of Fort Laramie, Dakota Territory.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday. After the reading had continued for ten minutes,

Mr. WILSON. I move that the further reading of the Journal be dispensed with. The most of it is taken up with the record of the yeas and nays on motions to adjourn.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It requires the unanimous consent of the Senate to dispense with the reading of the Journal. Is there any objection? No objection being made, the further reading of the Journal will be dispensed with.

PERSONAL EXPLANATIONS.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I desire with the indulgence of the Senate to say a word or two in reference to a report that I made last Tuesday morning by the direction of the Committee on Finance, which has been greatly misrepresented and misunderstood.

During the last session of the Senate the ladies of the Treasury Department presented a petition to the Senate asking to have their compensation increased. That petition was referred to the Committee on Finance, and in accordance with their request a law was passed increasing their pay, which law I earnestly supported in the committee and in the Senate. When the committee resumed its business at this session that petition was found upon the files, and I was instructed to report it back and ask that the committee be discharged from any further consideration of it, because the subject had been disposed of at the last session. That petition related in no way to any application made at this session for an increase of salary or to any compensation to the men employed in the Departments.

Since that time several clerks have called upon me for information as to the nature and effect of that report, which I have given, I suppose, to their satisfaction. Others have written letters to me representing the difficulties under which they labor on account of the lowness of their salaries; and some have written scurrilous and abusive letters to me upon the assumption that, because I made that report, I was opposed to any increase of their salaries. I have, sir, upon all suitable occasions expressed the opinion that the compensation paid to the officials of the Government in Washington was too low, although I have not favored adding a certain per cent. to all the salaries without respect to the merits, abilities, and responsibilities of those connected with the Departments.

My opinion upon that subject has not been changed; and I do not intend to allow my action to be influenced by the fact that some of these clerks who are now so clamorous for an increase of their salaries, at the last session formed what were called "departmental clubs" to denounce and vilify Congress, with the view I suppose of ingratiating themselves with the appointing power, and eating with safety the crumbs that fell from their master's table. Nor do I intend to allow my action to be influenced, to the prejudice of the good and deserving men in these Departments, by the course pursued by some who have few qualifications for office, and less of the characteristics of gentlemen. But I think it is proper to say, for the information of all concerned, that those persons asking for that legislation will not promote the end they have in view by addressing anonymous letters, full of scurrility and abuse, to the members of the Senate and the House who are performing what they conceive to be their duty in respect to this matter.

Mr. JOHNSON. I do not see how any action of Congress can be had on the sending of an anonymous letter to members of Congress, or to the President of the United States, or to the judges of the Supreme Court of the United States. Those things are very common, I am sorry to say. It is an outrage, but perhaps one which Congress is incompetent to correct. I cannot imagine by what legislation they can provide practically against it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I have asked for no legislation.

Mr. JOHNSON. Now, in relation to another thing: the attack upon Congress by the press is not to be defended; nor is such an attack if made by any individual, private or official. It may be in harsh terms assailing the motives of members of Congress. It is equally indefensible for any one holding a public capacity to assail the integrity of the Supreme Court of the United States. The Senate will understand I suppose to what I allude. There appeared yesterday in a paper, which is semi-official as far as the party in power is concerned, an attack upon that high tribunal founded upon false assertions of fact, and couched in terms which if the facts had been true should never have been used toward such a tribunal or toward any department of the Government. They gave an opinion a few days since in which the court were unanimous, that under the law as it stands military commissions could not legally be constituted, and that everything that such commissions may have done in the trial of individual citizens not constituting a part of the Army or Navy of the United States, or the militia in the service of the United States, was entirely void and inoperative. The majority of the court thought that it was not in the power of the United States or of Congress, by law to authorize the trial of citizens by a tribunal of that description; the minority thought otherwise; but they all concurred in holding that the law which was passed upon the subject did not authorize the President to constitute such tribunals for the trial of individual citizens; and because that opinion was announced—the opinion of the majority was given by a man whose character, public and private, stands beyond possible reproach, placed upon that high tribunal by the late lamented President, loyal throughout the civil contest in which we have been engaged—the editor to whom I allude thought proper to say that treason had found a refuge in the bosom of the Supreme Court of the United States. I am sure no Senator on this floor will justify such an attack; but what are we to do? It is owing to the license which the press may take under the protection of the Constitution of the United States, which proclaims freedom of the press as one of the rights of the citizen. The only remedy is for the individual who may be assailed to institute suits against the assailant; but such remedy as that will never be resorted to, it is to be hoped, by the judges of that high tribunal. They will stand upon the character which long lives of honor and integrity have earned for them, while the assailant will reap all the reward to which he may be entitled by such an assault.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. RAMSEY presented the petition of clerks of inspectors of provisions and clothing at navy yards, praying for an increase of compensation; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. I present the petition of William T. Connell, John Keplinger, and Isaac Conrad, three West Virginia soldiers who enlisted in August, 1861, but within a month prior to their being mustered in were taken prisoners, and were held as prisoners until January, 1863. They say that the accounting officers decide that they cannot get their pay for the time they were prisoners without the action of Congress, and they therefore petition Congress for pay as privates from August 17, 1861, to January 9, 1863. I move its reference to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WADE. I present a memorial and resolutions, adopted by the Southern Republican Associations, at a meeting held at their rooms, No. 226 F street, Washington, District of Columbia, on the 8th of December, setting forth their views of what ought to be done and on what principle the State of Texas and the other rebel States ought to be reconstructed. The resolutions are long and voluminous, and I shall not undertake to read them through, nor even to state all the principles which they deem important. I move that the memorial and resolutions be referred to the committee on reconstruction.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CATTELL presented the petition of carpet manufacturers of the city of Philadelphia, praying for the repeal of the five per cent. internal revenue tax on manufactures; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

ADMISSIONS TO THE FLOOR.

Mr. GRIMES. I offer the following order, which, under the rule, will lie over until the next meeting of the Senate:

Ordered, That the forty-eighth standing rule of the Senate be, and the same is hereby, repealed and abolished.

Mr. SUMNER. What is that rule?

Mr. GRIMES. It is the rule which excludes all persons from the floor of the Senate except persons therein named. Until within a few years it has been regarded as unseemly and improper for members of this body to violate that rule; but it has been relaxed to a very great extent, and every day some gentlemen see fit to introduce their friends upon the floor; others choose to abide by the rule. The result is, that when their friends, who think that they possibly ought to be admitted on the floor as well as other people, go into the gallery and see persons who are not authorized on the floor, an explanation is required which is exceedingly undesirable for any one to give. If we are going to have the rule relaxed in regard to one person, or the friends of one person, I want it relaxed as to all. I shall therefore call up this order at the next meeting of the Senate.

Mr. WILSON. I hope this matter will pass over for the present. I desire to introduce a joint resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It lies over under the rule.

LIBRARIAN'S REPORT.

Mr. ROSS. I move to take up the joint resolution that I introduced yesterday in relation to the government of the States lately in rebellion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Reports from committees are first in order.

Mr. ANTHONY. The Committee on Printing, to whom was referred a resolution to print the report of the Librarian of Congress and five hundred copies for the use of the Library, have directed me to report it back without amendment and recommend its passage; and I ask for its present consideration.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution, which is as follows:

Resolved, That the usual number of copies of the report of the Librarian of Congress for the present year be printed for the information of the Senate, and five hundred extra copies for the use of the Library.

Mr. SUMNER. Is that a report from a committee?

Mr. FESSENDEN. This is the report of the Librarian of Congress made to the Committee on the Library, giving information which they called for and which is important.

The resolution was adopted.

GOVERNMENT OF THE REBELLIOUS STATES.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Mr. President, I suppose that by unanimous consent, the honorable Senator from Kansas [Mr. Ross] may now be permitted to call up his resolution. I understand that he desires to call it up in the morning hour with a view to make a few remarks upon it, and as this is the last opportunity he will have before the recess, I think the Senate will be disposed to indulge him.

Mr. POMEROY. I hope the resolution may be allowed to be considered.

Mr. FESSENDEN. If the Senator now makes his motion, I presume, by unanimous consent, it will be allowed.

Mr. POMEROY. It will occupy but a few moments.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No objection being interposed, the motion of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. Ross] will be entertained. The motion is that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution named by the Senator from Kansas. Is there any objection to its present consideration.

Several SENATORS. No objection.

Mr. HOWE. I shall not object to this motion of course under the circumstances, though it embarrasses me somewhat to allow it to be done, considering that I was deeply interested in the business pending in the morning hour yesterday; but I shall waive that out of deference to the wishes of the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. SUMNER. I will make a similar remark. I have given notice that I should call up this very day the joint resolution reported from the Committee on Foreign Relations, tendering the thanks of Congress to Cyrus W. Field; but as the Senator from Kansas desires to occupy the time, I shall let that pass over until after the recess.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No objection being interposed, the resolution named by the Senator from Kansas is before the Senate. It will be read.

The Secretary read it, as follows:

Joint resolution (S. R. No. 152) relating to the government of the States lately in rebellion.

Whereas the amendment to the Constitution of the United States, proposed at the first session of the Thirty-Ninth Congress, known as article fourteenth, and submitted to the several States for their acceptance or rejection, not having been accepted by a constitutional majority of the States, and certain sections of the country lately in rebellion being deemed thereby in danger of falling into a state of anarchy, by reason of their having no legitimate civil government; Therefore,

Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the joint committee on reconstruction be directed to inquire into the expediency of establishing such regulations for the government of such districts lately in rebellion against the United States as shall have refused or may hereafter refuse to adopt the said proposed amendment, as may be found necessary for the preservation of the peace and the protection of society and the interests of the Government in those districts.

Mr. ROSS. Mr. President, it would appear to be a work of supererogation to attempt to demonstrate the necessity for the adoption of the measures contemplated in this proposition. Of the justice and reasonableness of the pending constitutional amendment, the non-acceptance of which is proposed to be made the basis and pretext for further legislation for the purpose sought to be attained thereby, there is no occasion for further argument. That amendment has passed the ordeal of the most exhaustive public discussion to which any policy was ever subjected, and the voice of the people has been overwhelmingly in its approval. A verdict of commendation has been passed upon it which no political measure ever before received, and we are admonished thereby, to adhere faithfully and persistently to it, as the only one upon which the people of this country are willing to risk the work of reconstruction—as the plan, of all others, which will most speedily, most effectually, and most safely compass the great object we all have in view—the rehabilitation of that section of the country lately in rebellion against the General Government, and its restoration to its former peaceful prosperity in the Union.

Thus far all attempts to that end have failed of accomplishing the desired object, in fact have worse than failed, through causes that have been needlessly and unexpectedly thrown in the way, and we are to-day witnessing an apparent negation of the axiom that “revolutions never go backward.”

There is now no protection under the law, in many of those districts, for life or property; and it has become a grave question how the rights of loyal citizens there may be best conserved and society reorganized upon a stable and enduring basis. Manifestly in no way but by the assertion of the power of the Government in such a manner as to compel respect. Theorize as we will about the particular legal status of the late States we cannot escape this conviction: that they are practically out of the Union; that so far as the exercise of the functions of sovereign States in the Union are concerned, it is an impossibility. Those functions have been destroyed by the acts of rebellion, war, and a general surrender. Those people surrendered all they had and were, including the right to exist as States in this Union, consequently they cannot again exist as States until political vitality is breathed into them by the general Congress. The labor now demanding our attention is, instead of simply discussing theories, whether practicable or impracticable, to devise forms which shall accomplish the great aim of human government—the protection of the citizen in all his rights. If those States persist in refusing to be reconstructed within the Union, it is our duty to reconstruct them outside of the Union. They are none the less under the obligations of citizens because traitors; their obligations to the Government remain unimpaired notwithstanding their rebellion; while the duty of the Government to preserve so far as possible the organization of society, and to secure a complete and impartial administration of justice among them, is equally enduring and unimpaired.

But a brief period has elapsed since the whole country was ablaze with joy as the tidings of peace spread over the land. The most despondent were hopeful of a restored Union and the reestablishment of better and safer counsels. Under these inspiring impulses, that magnificent Army which had exceeded in equipment, in discipline, in fortitude, in heroic devotion to the cause in which it was enlisted, and in splendor of achievement, all previous military establishments of the world, suddenly melted away and was absorbed in the commercial, mechanical, and industrial pursuits from which it had been drawn at the call of its beleaguered and endangered Government. Our country appeared about to resume, as a whole, its march on the high road of material prosperity and political greatness which had been so summarily checked by the inauguration of the rebellion. The rebel armies had been vanquished and scattered. Disloyalists everywhere had seen and experienced the futility of their treasonable armaments and schemes. The power and vitality of the Government and people had been demonstrated to them in a most convincing and fearful manner, and nothing appeared to remain to them but submission to and acquiescence in the decisive verdict that had been pronounced upon the field of battle. Nothing but a desire to gather up the wrecks of what they had been, and prepare, submissively yet joyfully, for such a future as their magnanimous and forgiving conquerors had hastened to declare they might hope for, seemed to actuate them; and the country, from one end to the other, joyously proclaimed the advent of peace.

But in an evil hour of our destiny that good man who, like the fabled Atlas, had, as it were, carried the nation upon his shoulders through its four years of war and tribulation, was permitted to be taken from the post of honor and responsibility which he had so worthily filled, and the fruition of that hope which had been the ever-present and abiding faith of loyal men, was put far from us. The hand of the assassin had nearly undone the work of years and scattered the bright visions of the future. An insidious, baleful influence seemed to have taken possession of a portion of the Government, and unrepentant rebels were permitted to swarm at the capital of that Government which had so recently been the object of their vengeance, impudently demanding the restoration of rights which their great treason had forfeited. Treason, instead of being made odious, became apparently the surest passport to executive clemency and favor. Under no other Government and in no other age was a parallel to it ever witnessed.

Encouraged by favor and patronage, where there was a conscious merit of punishment, the central idea of the rebellion, resistance to the always and everywhere aggressive spirit of liberty and progress, seemed again to take possession of that people, and the hope was tacitly held out to them by wicked and designing men, in power and out of power, that that which physical force had failed to accomplish might yet be secured by partisan machinations and the ballot.

In furtherance of this diabolical plot we have knocking at our doors to-day the representatives of former States which yet stand unwashed, unpurged of the greatest crime of the age—treason to the Republic and to liberty. The party of treason, which gave no word of encouragement to the armies of the Republic in the day of its sore trial, which pronounced the war a failure, and clamored for disbandment and separation, finds in those late States its warmest partisans and adherents. There the more prominent a man may have been in the rebellion, and the greater his zeal in resisting the proposed measures of restoration, the more certain are his chances for official preferment by the suffrages of the people; while the reverse is equally true, that continued and consistent loyalty to the Government is deemed ample warrant for oppression, ostracism from society, and expatriation. So long has this state of things continued, and to such an extent has it been carried, that there is now practically no law in many localities of that country, for the protection even of property or life. Loyalty to the Government is made a social crime, for which the offender is, in too many instances, thrust beyond the pale of society, beyond the protection of law. The Constitution and the laws of the country are daily and hourly violated, in that a discrimination in political creeds is established which excludes the citizens of many of the States from residence and the prosecution of commercial and industrial pursuits in large portions of the Republic.

The first business of this Congress should be to seek and find a remedy for this grievous and growing wrong. The abortive and ill-conceived subterfuges thus far applied by the executive branch of the Government have but aggravated the evil, and already brought this question into almost interminable complications. The pretended Governments attempted to be established there, are but a sham and not worthy to be dignified by the term. The most practicable and effective plan for its solution now presented is, in my judgment, that contemplated by this joint resolution—the institution by this Congress of a vigorous system of government for that country, which shall enforce obedience to the law and respect for the rights of others; which shall be able to create a degree of loyalty to the Government, if not in this generation, then in the next. Let it be understood as a foregone conclusion, that the just and righteous principles of the pending constitutional amendment must be acceded to in some legal, responsible form, by convention or otherwise, before they can ever again enjoy the privileges and prerogatives of citizens of the United States.

Whether that plan shall conform to the one now maintained for the government of the Territories, or whether it shall combine the territorial with the State organization, is proposed to be made in part the duty of this joint committee to determine and report. The main thing to be accomplished is the successful government of the turbulent elements and the protection of society in that country against that confusion and anarchy to which, under its present misgovernment, it is rapidly hastening. If we would not see repeated at our own door, and within our own borders, the supremacy of violence, and that absence of law and order which has characterized the history of neighboring nations, we must act promptly and decisively. We have within the body-politic a stupendous moral and political evil, which can be removed only by the application of the most vigorous measures of cure, those measures to be continued in effective, practical operation until that people shall consent to be governed, in common with ourselves, by a Constitution broad enough to embrace within its protecting folds the humblest of God's creatures, who confesses to it allegiance and support. It is my own deliberate and settled conviction that a thorough, complete readjustment of the machinery of government of those States, entirely in harmony with the General Government in all its parts, can never be secured until the ballot shall have been placed in the hands of every loyal man in those communities, whatever may have been his previous condition, or what his color.

I take the broad ground that suffrage is a natural right, one which inheres in every human being, not to be restricted except for incompetency or the commission of crime—circumstances which render that restriction imperative for the preservation and well-being of society and of government. It is upon this principle that all forms of republican government and law are based, and without which those forms would be tyranny and oppression, in that they would deny the right of the individual to participation in the formation of laws for his protection and for his government.

Where does any man, any class, or any race, procure the exclusive authority to make laws for his fellow or his neighbor? Where all are contending for equal political right, who is to decide in which party or race that right shall rest? I am aware that the custom of the world has been for the stronger to arrogate to itself the right to govern and make laws for the weaker. In our own day it has ever been so, and the further back we go in the history of our race, the more marked and prominent becomes that custom, the more conspicuously and hatefully is that old idea illustrated, that certain races were born to rule; that certain classes in those dominant races were still more elevated in the scale and fitted for government; and to carry the logic to a legitimate conclusion, there were in those superior classes certain families and individuals peculiarly endowed with the capacity for the government of their neighbors—a peculiarity which came to constitute in the ignorance and superstition of that day a sort of divine right to rule and lord it over their fellows from generation to generation.

Sir, if that species of logic was good then, it is good now, and our forefathers made a fearful mistake when they established this Government of the people, and introduced the sad innovation of declaring that all men were invested by nature with equal inalienable political rights; and were entitled to an equal voice in the selection of their rulers.

Now, sir, if this theory proves anything it proves too much, unless its advocates are willing to go back to the political systems of the early ages of mankind, which vested in the patriarch of the clan the sole sovereignty, descending from father to son. To that does the principle inevitably tend. There is no escape. If one race is endowed by nature with political prerogatives over another, then the same must of necessity be true of classes, families, and individuals; and we find ourselves reverting back to the most absolute forms of monarchy. So that, admitting for the sake of the argument, the general inferiority of the negro as a race, the deduction therefrom that he is incapable and not entitled to exercise the right of suffrage, the principal argument used by the opponents of all measures for his enfranchisement and elevation to political equality, by proving too much, proves nothing. The proposition to invest the negro with the right of suffrage has been denounced on this floor as monstrous.

Sir, another proposition has also been advocated on this floor equally monstrous—the continued exclusion of a race from the enjoyment of the rights of manhood because they have from time immemorial been deprived of them. It is simply a proposition to perpetuate a wrong upon a whole race because, forsooth, that race has borne it so long that they are not deemed worthy of redress. What can be more monstrous than this?

Again, sir, we are accused of insincerity in our profession of a desire to deal justly and generously with this despised race; and gentlemen claim for themselves credit for the performance of acts of kindness toward these people, which those who are demanding for them concessions of political right would not deign to perform.

Sir, what is kindness? Is it simply the doling out of a few crumbs, or perchance a pleasant word, to one whose manhood or womanhood we are daily and hourly grinding out of them under the iron heel of oppression? Or is it a confession and fostering of that manhood, and a concession of those God-given rights which it carries, the right to live, the right to work, the right to be peers in the Commonwealth, the right to own ourselves and be ourselves? That, sir, is kindness, that is justice, and it is not strange that those who are most nearly interested should be quick to perceive it.

For one, sir, I confess that I do not share the fear expressed by some gentlemen, of the effect of precipitating a mass of ignorance, as it is styled, upon the ballot-box. The black man's aspiration for liberty has always been as fervent and enduring as the white man's, notwithstanding the lamentable fact that he was totally unable to decipher the printed word which spelled it. He has ever been an enthusiastic lover and devoted follower of our beautiful flag, although totally unable to read or comprehend the cabalistic device inscribed thereon. He has always known enough of astronomy even, to comprehend the fact that the north star pointed to liberty, although he and his fathers were prohibited, by most solemn legal enactment, and under fearful pains and penalties, from learning it from books.

Where will you draw a line of demarcation which shall rule out such men as these? Shall the fact that a man is able to make a scratch with a pen and call it his written name, or read his A, B, C, alone entitle him to the almost sacred right of suffrage? By no means. There is a test infinitely above these by which they should be judged—a test established by God himself when he set his seal upon his finished work and saw that it was good. That test is manhood, and by no other can we safely abridge that right which was an outgrowth and has become a characteristic of this western world. That test, thank God, has been established here at the fountain head of the Government, and I have an abiding faith that it will be eventually copied and imitated by all the branches, and this country made in truth what it has been in theory—the home of liberty.

These are laid down simply as the bases of correct republican government, to be ultimately provided for in the reorganization of these States, though it is not my purpose to insist upon them as a condition precedent to their readmission. We have proffered to those States specific terms of readmission in the proposed amendment. We have virtually said to them that their claim for representation in these Halls shall be granted upon the acceptance of that amendment, necessarily, of course, in the nature of our Government and in view of constitutional provision, with the right to criticize and determine the qualifications of individuals who are thus returned by them for admission. I regard the proposal of this amendment as in the nature of a compact by which at least this Congress is virtually pledged to so admit them upon the fulfillment of the terms proposed, and that to do otherwise would be an act of bad faith which could not but be disastrous in the operation of the precedent which would thus be established. Especially in view of the fact that a portion of that people, as in the State of Tennessee, have accepted the terms and returned to their allegiance, would it be unjust to vary those terms to others who are even now laboring for their acceptance in their own States, and with whom the proposed amendment is being daily strengthened and its ultimate ratification becoming more certain.

In a limited sense we are treating with them as with a foreign nation; we offer them terms of readjustment; we have had with them a war which, though it practically destroyed their former governments and relations with the Federal Union, yet demonstrated their inability to discard their allegiance to this or permanently establish other governments in its stead.

The question now recurs, their governments having been destroyed by a war which has left in existence but little of the material of which they were originally composed, having incapacitated themselves by treason from participating in any form of loyal government until authorized to do so by the removal of that disability by Congress, and having relinquished the right to maintain any other by the implied and universally understood terms of a general surrender—who shall reorganize those Governments, and by what power can they be vested with the authority so to do? Manifestly that authority must be delegated to whatever loyal persons may be found there who have survived the chaotic condition which has passed over them, together with such others, if any, the Congress may deem it safe and proper to reinvest with that franchise.

This theory cannot be justly made obnoxious to the charge of destroying those governments and seeking to replace them with others, as so far as practical operation and efficiency are concerned, no matter what theory may obtain, they were already destroyed, and by the hostile act of those people themselves. The law-making power of the country not having reorganized them or instituted others, the conclusion becomes inevitable that there is now no legitimate local government in those late States.

Under this state of facts the duty of the Congress, in my judgment, becomes clear and palpable. The Constitution imperatively requires us to guaranty to every State a republican form of government. The dictates of humanity require that individuals and society shall be protected in the enjoyment of rights incident to manhood and associated communities, while the integrity of the Government demands that its power shall be asserted through forms competent for the protection of the loyal citizen in the exercise of his political rights.

In my judgment these ends can be reached in no way so effectually as by reinvesting the power of the State in the hands of those who, be they few or many, have been its faithful friends in the day of its extremity, and guaranteeing to them the support of the military power of the nation, if that should be necessary, for their maintenance, and the administration of impartial justice throughout the limits of those districts.

It is not sufficient to say that Congress is unmaking States by the institution of this process, for they first unmade themselves. They first subverted or destroyed the forms which had been originally given them; the permanency of which had been guaranteed by the Constitution, and assumed to set up in their stead a spurious government in contravention of that guarantee. That spurious government assumed to make war upon the General Government, and was in its turn destroyed; all its functions, all its powers, all its rights—if that term were admissible—having been surrendered unconditionally at the close of that war.

Now, what is an unconditional surrender? Manifestly a yielding of all pretensions, forced though it be, which were in dispute and which had produced the state of war. When an army is vanquished and its members surrender themselves as unconditional prisoners of war, they manifestly surrender their cause as well as their persons, the right to resume the same to accrue only at the voluntary consent of the victor. So it is to-day all over the South. Those ten late States are simply ten camps of paroled prisoners of war, every man of them who voluntarily pronounced allegiance to the confederate government being liable to be arrested and shot by a drum-head court martial upon the first manifestation of turbulence or insubordination. How can such a people organize or reorganize a political government? Manifestly only by the consent of the conqueror. There is obviously no power but in the general Congress for their resuscitation.

Another most potent reason why the action I now propose should be taken, and that without delay, is that the youth of that country are growing up under the baleful influence of the political dogmas which inspired and sustained the rebellion, unchecked by that wholesome, restrictive legislation for which loyal men everywhere are now looking anxiously to this body. It is our bounden duty to throw around that rising generation the better influences of loyalty, to teach them the necessity of obedience to law, by punishing disobedience and enforcing order and respect to the authority and rights of the Government and society. It is to those who are now coming upon the stage that we must look for the permanent maintenance of peace and the ultimate restoration and reorganization of the social and political systems of that region.

The great bulk of those who have been engaged in the effort to overthrow the Government can never be expected to enter with any genuine heartiness into this work. The virus of treason has been too long rankling in the body politic; has too thoroughly permeated the social system and characterized the habits of thought of that people to admit of any future dependence upon them for any coöperation in the great labor of reconstruction which the history of the past five years has imposed upon us. With them the question is not one of conciliation. It is simply one of government; whether they shall be permitted longer to insult the Government for which their fathers and ours passed through untold horrors to establish; whether they shall be permitted longer to defy its just and equal laws; whether they shall continue with impunity to harass and oppress those to whom the law of God and of the land vouchsafe the right to live and traffic among them.

In those who are so soon to step upon the stage of political life and in their turn to assume the privileges and prerogatives of citizenship, we have a plastic element which, by wise and just, yet decisive legislation, we may mold into firm and faithful adherents of the Government, out of which may be evolved a powerful and consistent loyalty that will bind together the extremes of this country with an indissoluble bond. This is one of the paramount objects of legislation on this subject. It should be ours. We are not making laws for to-day, nor for this generation simply, but for all time to come. The influence of a right determination of this now long-mooted and distracting question of reconstruction cannot but be felt to the latest day of the Republic.

Let us keep steadily in view that magnificent future which the concurrent data of the past warrants us in anticipating, and legislate for that as well as for the present. Let us secure a firm reunion of this Republic, now stepping upon that elevated political dais assigned to the front rank of nations, by the institution of measures which shall irrevocably establish justice and equality of political right between all its citizens. In no other way can we hope to secure this beneficent result. The measures to that end now pending before the country in the proposed constitutional amendment promise all that is asked or hoped for. In the language of the bronzed and scarred veterans who fought out the late war to its so successful termination, language spoken by one of the mightiest gatherings of freemen ever witnessed upon this continent, that amendment is wise, prudent, and just:

"It clearly defines American citizenship and guarantees all his rights to every citizen.

"It places on a just and equal basis the right of representation, making the vote of a man in one State equally potent with the vote of another man in any State.

"It righteously excludes from places of honor and trust the chief conspirators and guiltiest rebels, whose perjured crimes have drenched the land in fraternal blood.

"It puts into the very frame of our Government the inviolability of the national debt, and the nullity forever of all obligations contracted in support of the rebellion."

But in their blindness and the madness of their folly, a portion of this people have refused the terms of restoration thus fairly, even generously offered, and persist in those practices which in the late war made our country a reproach to the humanity of the age. In the insanity of their treason they have contemptuously spurned the proposition, and thrust it ignominiously from the doors of their legislative assemblies. It is too just and equitable a proposal to find favor in the eyes of this generation of traitors. It breaks down the barriers which successive ages of class legislation have established between men. It humbles that gilded and guilty aristocracy which for two hundred years has preyed upon the rights and lived upon the labor of those it had succeeded in despoiling of their manhood. That amendment lifts a race from that condition of abject serfdom in which the end of the war found them, and invests them with the common rights of man. Yet it is spurned and jeered, and those who now essay to wield the destinies of one third of the Republic will have none of it. They vainly and foolishly throw themselves in the way of the pacification of the country, and would retard its progress to its high and inevitable destiny, heedless of the misfortunes of those who are blind to the logic of events, and resist the decrees of fate.

What then? Shall we regard the impotent ravings of madmen and recede from the work so well begun and so vehemently approved by the country? Undo the labor of a year, and abandon a cause which is watered by the tears and carried to the throne of the Most High upon the prayers of good men everywhere? By no means. The Divine curse rests upon him who puts his hand to the plow and looks back. We are enjoined by every consideration of justice, of mercy, and of wise and prudent statesmanship, not to retrace our steps, not to yield the vantage ground thus far attained in the scheme of reconstruction and national progress, but to press forward and to seal with further discreet and opportune legislation, that triumph which time will speedily unfold to our view.

It is useless for that people to demur against this proposed amendment, that it disfranchises those who have taken prominent part in the war of the rebellion, and guarantees the faithful payment of the debt created for their subjugation. This action is but a repetition of the history of all unsuccessful rebellions. Not to thus protect ourselves, our institutions, and our credit, would justly subject us to the criticisms which have been so lavishly made upon our form of government by the statesmen of other nations, of instability and of containing within itself the germ and moving cause of its own dissolution. Not to do it would but sow the seeds of another and perhaps more potent rebellion in future years.

But we must stand by that amendment. It has triumphantly passed the ordeal of public criticism, and is practically established as a feature of our fundamental law. Let us be admonished by the spontaneous outburst of popular feeling in its favor. Not only the people proper, but that grand army of the Republic, which carried the country through the terrible fires of the rebellion, which left dead upon the field an eighth of its entire number, sacrificed in the fury of battle that the Republic might live, has resolved that no traitor whose hands have been lifted in impious and fratricidal strife against his country, shall ever again have it in his power to use the functions of the Government for its destruction. We want no more examples of public officials, who but seek power that they may the more effectually subvert the purposes of treason and repudiation.

We who have stood shoulder to shoulder in the battle's red front, where the fires of carnage lighted the souls of brave comrades to death and immortality, will not now insult the cherished names of the dead; will not falsify the issues upon which we have fought and conquered in this war; will not now blacken the record of devotion to our country and to liberty which has been signalized upon a thousand battle-fields by honoring treason and exalting traitors. We have not forgotten our murdered President—we have not forgotten our martyred comrades, starved in the loathsome pens of Libby, of Andersonville, of Saulsbury, and of Belle Isle. We have not forgotten those faithful spirits who piloted our escaped prisoners through dreary nights of wandering in southern swamps and forests, who fed and secreted them from their blood-hound pursuers, and then paid the penalty with their lives. We have not forgotten those unconquerable southern loyalists who braved persecution and death to signalize their love for the old flag and their faith in the ultimate triumph of the cause which it symbolized. We have with us the widowed and orphaned ones of this war. We have with us an army of scarred and maimed heroes, who are condemned, but wrecks of their former selves, to walk the earth in sadness and in sorrow all their after lives. We remember that it was by this great affliction that the country was saved—that they unflinchingly stood in the breach between the Republic and her foes, and we will be true to them. No diabolical rebel scheme of repudiation shall ever deprive them of the just and grateful tribute which our rescued country pays to these stricken ones.

In view of the distracted condition of that country the most effective and speedy legislation consistent with prudence is imperatively demanded. Everywhere throughout the late rebellious States loyal men are imploring with outstretched hands for that protection which only this Congress can give, through the operation of just and equal laws. Not alone to the persistent, long-suffering loyalists of that country, who through the night of horror which followed the attempted secession of their States bravely kept the faith, but to ourselves and to the world, do we owe the duty of suppressing the reign of violence inaugurated by the war and fostered by the machinations of demagogues. The humanity of the enlightened and progressive age in which we live, demands at our hands that the massacres of Memphis and New Orleans shall not be repeated; that the sacred regard of human life and human right which characterizes this age of all others shall again be restored there; that the downtrodden poor, who for two centuries have borne in meekness and humility the lash of the taskmaster, shall be reinvested with their manhood and protected by the strong arm of the Government in the enjoyment of those rights which the contemporaneous verdict of all other nations has given them, and which ours can no longer withhold with safety to our political or social fabric.

It is to this end that I offer the joint resolution now submitted, and I move its reference to the joint committee on reconstruction.

The motion was agreed to.

LAND OFFICE REPORT FOR DISTRIBUTION.

Mr. STEWART. I am instructed by the Committee on Public Lands to report the following resolution:

Resolved, That there be printed of the report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, with the accompanying large connected map, five thousand copies in the German language, five thousand copies in the French language, five thousand copies in the Swedish language, and five thousand copies in the English language, for distribution in foreign countries; and five thousand copies for the use of the Senate; and the Secretary of State is requested to cause the distribution of the aforesaid twenty thousand copies through the Commissioner of the Paris Exposition, or such other persons as in his discretion he may deem proper.

The cost of this printing with the large connected map will be $27,297 25, according to the estimate of the Superintendent of Public Printing. That estimate includes the printing of twenty-five thousand copies, five thousand for distribution in this country, and twenty thousand for distribution in foreign countries with the large map. The large map includes all that is in the other maps and excludes a variety of maps that accompany the report. The large map will be sufficient for all purposes. The translation is to be done in the Interior Department, where there are several clerks competent to that duty, and of course that will involve no expense except the employment of their time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands the Senator from Nevada to ask for the present consideration of the resolution now reported by him from the Committee on Public Lands. It requires unanimous consent to consider it at this time. Is there any objection?

Mr. WILSON. It is evident that it will lead to debate, and I hope it will not be pressed as another question is to come up very soon.

Mr. JOHNSON. I suppose the probability is that the expense will be $100,000 instead of $27,000.

Mr. WILSON. The proposition will evidently lead to debate.

Mr. STEWART. If the resolution is to be passed at all, it ought to be passed before the holidays.

Mr. WILSON. You had better not hurry it. The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there any objection to the consideration of the resolution at this time?

Mr. FESSENDEN. Yes sir, I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution must lie over under the rules.

NAVY REGISTER.

Mr. ANTHONY submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That one thousand extra copies of the Navy Register of the United States for the year 1867 be printed for the use of the Senate.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. POMEROY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 484) to secure the speedy construction of the Union Pacific railroad, southern branch, and telegraph line, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WILSON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 153) authorizing the President of the United States to prevent the infliction of corporeal punishment in the States lately in rebellion.

Mr. GRIMES called for the reading of the resolution at length; and it was read.

Mr. JOHNSON. Is that offered for consideration now?

Mr. WILSON. No, sir; for the purpose of reference.

Mr. JOHNSON. Then I have no objection to its introduction.

The joint resolution was read twice, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed an enrolled bill (S. No. 62) to amend an act entitled "An act granting lands to the State of Oregon to aid in the construction of a military road from Eugene City to the eastern boundary of said State;" and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a joint resolution (H. R. No. 222) prohibiting payments by any officer of the Government, to any person not known to have been opposed to the rebellion and in favor of its suppression.

The message further announced, that the House had passed the joint resolution (S. R. No. 123) in relation to the settlement of the accounts of William P. Wingate, collector at the port of Bangor, Maine.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following House bill and joint resolution were severally read twice by their titles, and referred as indicated below:

A bill (H. R. No. 553) to amend section two of an act entitled "An act to authorize the Legislatures of the States of Illinois and Tennessee to sell the lands heretofore appropriated for the use of schools in those States"—to the Committee on Public Lands.

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 222) prohibiting payments by any officer of the Government to any person not known to have been opposed to the rebellion and in favor of its suppression—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

UNITED STATES TROOPS IN MISSOURI.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour has arrived for the consideration of the unfinished business of yesterday.

Mr. HENDERSON. With the permission of the Senator from Ohio, who has charge of that business, I desire to state that I have just received a dispatch from the Governor of my State which makes it necessary, in my opinion, to offer a resolution of inquiry. I submit this resolution:

Resolved, That the President be requested to inform the Senate whether since the 1st day of December, 1866, he has caused troops in the service of the United States to be marched to the interior of the State of Missouri, for any purpose whatever; and if so, that he communicate the reasons for such orders, and also whether such action has been taken on the application of the Legislature or the Executive of said State.

By unanimous consent, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of the resolution.

Mr. HENDERSON. I have just received a dispatch from the Governor of the State, in the following words:

JEFFERSON CITY, MISSOURI, December 19, 1866.

General Grant has sent United States troops to Lexington. I have protested against their presence there unless asked for by me. I will not submit to the interference with a matter of exclusive State jurisdiction. I ask Congress, if he does not remove them, to require him to do so. Correspondence by mail to Henderson.

THOMAS C. FLETCHER.
Governor of Missouri.

To Senators HENDERSON and BROWN of Missouri, and Representatives BLOW, KELSO, McCLEURG, VAN HORN, LOAN, BENJAMIN, and ANDERSON.

Mr. President, I know nothing, of course, in regard to the matters upon which the dispatch is predicated. The Constitution requires that the President shall interfere upon the request of the Legislature, or, if the Legislature be not in session, on the request of the Executive of the State, in order to suppress domestic violence. I suppose that the object of sending the troops there is merely to enforce obedience to the laws of the State. I understand that the State Executive feels himself perfectly capable of doing so, perfectly able to enforce obedience to the laws. The people of the State take it upon themselves so to do, and do not ask the interference of Federal troops. I desire merely to get the facts, because I do not know from the dispatch the Governor sends me what the facts are, and it is better that the President communicate them; and until he does communicate them, or until I receive a letter from the Governor, I am utterly unable to explain the reasons for his action. Of course there will be no objection to asking for the information.

Mr. DAVIS. I am no advocate for the enlargement of executive power, nor am I an advocate for the enlargement of congressional power. I want these branches of the Government to be restricted by the Constitution and to know no call except that which the Constitution makes. Now, if I understand the communication of the Governor of Missouri, which has been read by my honorable friend, he simply states the fact to be that the General-in-Chief of the United States ordered some Government troops to be stationed at Lexington, and that he requested their removal and the President had not removed them.

Mr. HENDERSON. It was to suppress domestic violence.

Mr. DAVIS. I did not so understand the communication of the Governor.

Mr. HENDERSON. The newspapers so state.

Mr. DAVIS. I am not speaking of the newspapers; I am speaking of the communication officially sent by the Governor of Missouri to her Senators. Does the Governor of Missouri intend to controvert the position that the President of the United States has the perfect and the undeniable constitutional power to locate the troops of the United States in any State he may choose, and in any locality in any State? Is there any plainer principle of constitutional law than that? Was it ever thought of being controverted before? Are the times becoming so out of joint, so frenzied, so utterly mad, as to deny propositions so unquestionably true as that?

Mr. President, it is not my purpose to interfere in any way to prevent the object which the honorable Senator from Missouri has in view. I merely state my understanding of the law that regulates the case as presented by the Governor of the State of Missouri. I have nothing more to say.

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. President, I of course cannot take up the time of the Senate now, because I have asked this only as a favor of the Senator from Ohio, who has charge of the business regularly before the Senate. The Governor, I may state, cannot be expected to state all the facts connected with this matter in a telegraphic dispatch. He states that he has written to me. I do not know the circumstances, nor has the Governor undertaken to communicate them to me. I suppose that this was not the case of a mere order that the troops should go to the city of Lexington, there to be stationed; and my friend is mistaken when he supposes that to be the purpose of the order. I find outside of this dispatch, in the newspapers, that they have been sent there for the purpose of suppressing domestic violence, that they have been ordered there for the purpose of enforcing obedience to the laws of the State, and that the Governor has protested against their interference.

Mr. DAVIS. Will the gentleman just allow me to make a suggestion?

Mr. HENDERSON. Certainly.

Mr. DAVIS. The communication of the Governor of Missouri to my honorable friend, is not that the President had ordered those troops there, but that General Grant had sent them there.

Mr. HENDERSON. I suppose—

Mr. DAVIS. That is the power which has made the order, but of course the General would act in subordination to the President.

Mr. HENDERSON. I suppose that there is no objection to the resolution, and I desire that it be passed.

The resolution was agreed to.

ADMISSION OF NEBRASKA.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 456) for the admission of the State of Nebraska into the Union.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending question is on the motion of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HENDRICKS] to postpone the further consideration of the bill to the 7th of January and make it the special order for that day.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, when I was interrupted last evening by the motion to adjourn I was about to read from the act of Congress of the 30th of May, 1854, to show the position that the Congress of the United States, under the influences which then controlled it, assumed in respect to this Territory and in respect to the sister Territory of Kansas. I was about to read from it also to show, in reply to the observations of my friend from Kansas who addressed us last evening, [Mr. POMEROY,] that if there be anything in this notion of estoppel upon the legislative power of the country, when we go back to the foundation of the thing we find that we should be now estopped from refusing admittance to this Territory into the State representation of the nation if she presented herself, as happily she does not, with a constitution which authorized involuntary servitude and perpetual slavery. That act declares:

"That when admitted as a State or States, the said Territory or any portion of the same shall be received into the Union with or without slavery as their constitution may prescribe at the time of their admission."

Another section of the act provides, "that the true intent and meaning of this act is to leave to the people of the Territories" the exclusive right and privilege of regulating their own domestic affairs in their own way. It is a complete delegation of the power, which the very passage of the act itself implied to have resided in Congress before that time, to the people of the Territory to set up institutions, which should be in opposition to what we all now agree is the proper political status of a Territory, or not, as they pleased, and Congress committed itself if it had the power to do so, committed us if it had the power to do so without question, without objection, to receive this Territory into the galaxy of States with slavery if she chose to have it. For one, I wish to repudiate once for all the idea that the Congress of 1854 or of 1864 or of any other year had any rightful authority whatever to forestall the action which we here and now think it fit to take respecting the political condition of the people of any Territory or any section of the country over whom by the Constitution we are authorized to exercise control. It is a doctrine which would carry us, as Englishmen are fond of saying, to grief very rapidly indeed.

When in 1864 what is called the enabling act was passed, Congress did not feel itself bound by the political opinions of ten years before that time; it did not find itself committed then to any faith which would preclude it from imposing such further conditions and restrictions as it might think desirable for the welfare, not only of the people of this Territory, but of the whole nation, and therefore it provided that the seventy-eight thousand miles of territory which composed the Territory of Nebraska might be admitted as a State, the language of the act being that "the inhabitants of that portion of the Territory" within the described limits "are hereby authorized" to set up a State government—

"Provided, That the constitution when formed shall be republican and not repugnant to the Constitution of the United States and the principles of the Declaration of Independence: And provided further, That said constitution shall provide by an article forever irrevocable"—

And I beg the learned Senators who believe in the power of the States to repudiate their constitutional compacts the moment they get in, or to repudiate the conditions upon which we may choose to admit them, to observe it—

"By an article forever irrevocable without the consent of the Congress of the United States:

1. That slavery or involuntary servitude shall be forever prohibited in this State.

2. That perfect toleration of religious sentiment shall be secured, and no inhabitant of said State shall ever be molested in person or property on account of his or her mode of religious worship.

3. That the people inhabiting said Territory do agree and declare that they forever disclaim all right and title to the unappropriated public lands," &c.

It makes no provision as to the class or color or race of persons who shall be authorized to set up that Territory into a State, and who shall then be entitled, having complied with these conditions, to present themselves to us that their claims for admission may be considered.

There is, therefore, it appears to me, no plainer proposition than that now, when the constitution is presented to us, we are, without any estoppel or committal or other qualification, left free to exercise our judgment and discretion which the Constitution has reposed in us upon the question whether, under the circumstances as they now exist, in the light of the history that since then has passed over the country, it is fit and right that this Territory ought to be admitted as a State with the constitution which she brings to us; because, as I have said, in the nature of things there can be no binding estoppel upon the legislative power of the country at any time, and because it is manifest to me that the act of 1864 which authorized the creation of a State from this Territory commits us to no principle whatever upon the subject of the right of suffrage, the right of representation, the method upon which the State should organize its government, except upon the general declaration of principles which should be the guide to that people in forming a constitution. Hence, if we find in that constitution anything respecting the establishment of its courts; the trial by jury—a right held in most civilized countries, deriving their ancestry from Anglo-Saxon sources, at least, to be sacred—if we find in it anything which does not commend itself to our sound sense of what is just and right, is it to be said that by any implied estoppel our mouths are to be closed and we must accept that now which otherwise we would not have done?

I think, then, sir, that it is clear that we must meet this case upon the reality, if it be a reality, of the question which is presented, and that we cannot shelter ourselves, however much we might wish to do it, behind the thin disguise that we have committed ourselves to this false step which we are asked to take. We must meet the question as it is. Now, what is the question? The question is, first, whether we have the power under the Constitution of the United States to dictate the terms and conditions and qualifications under which Territories shall be created into new States and admitted to an equal participation in the active operations of the Government. If we are a mere machine, obliged to act whenever a Territory presents itself and in whatever form it presents itself, as the Douglas doctrine upon which this Territory was first organized seems to declare, then of course there is no room for debate; we are exercising, then, merely executive and not legislative functions, and we have no opportunity for the exercise of any discretion whatever. If, on the contrary, the grant of power which the Constitution gives to Congress to admit new States into the national councils is one which implies judgment and discretion, implies that sense of responsibility which ought to operate in all legislative affairs, then most clearly it is our duty to scan to the uttermost letter the constitution of any new-formed State which is presented to us. The Constitution of the United States upon the subject of our power over the admission of new States reads as follows:

"New States may be admitted by the Congress into this Union; but no new State shall be formed or erected within the jurisdiction of any other State, nor any State be formed by the junction of two or more States or parts of States, without the consent of the Legislatures of the States concerned as well as of the Congress."

There is an unqualified grant of power in the first instance; discretionary, depending upon the will of the law-making power of the country for the admission of new States. Then there are imposed upon it conditions and qualifications respecting the carving of new States out of old ones, and no other condition and no other qualification whatever. Therefore I take it to be plain and beyond contradiction that it is within the clear constitutional power of Congress to prescribe the terms and qualifications and the time and the fitness upon which any new State shall be created out of any of its Territories. It is a right which cannot be questioned at all; and it is a right which, independent of the Constitution, flows logically and necessarily from the supreme legislative dominion which we have over the Territories of the United States; Territories many of whom, this very Territory indeed itself, were not within the dominion of this Government when the Constitution was formed, and which, therefore, the Constitution itself by its own vigor never could have operated upon. We having exclusive and complete jurisdiction over these Territories, and having complete discretionary power by the express letter of the Constitution over the admission of States, is it to be said that we must shut our eyes to what is contained in the constitution of a Territory which is offered to us for acceptance, and are we to be told that this objection or that objection which may be just in itself cannot be heard because we are trampling upon the rights of any body or set of men? I take it not. There is no inherent right in the people of any Territory to be constituted into a State. Congress may never organize a Territory at all; it may never dispose of its public lands there; when organized it may keep it in the perpetual condition of a Territory if it pleases; because all the considerations which govern such questions are considerations which merely appeal to the ordinary legislative discretion of the law-making power, and therefore every circumstance and consideration which enters into the fitness of the thing itself which is proposed to be done is a matter that we have no right to set aside.

Then, Mr. President, if we have the power, and it is our duty in the exercise of that discretionary power to exert it as we do all other legislative power upon the principles of legislative and political justice, the question is what this constitution ought to contain to authorize us to receive this new State into the family of the nation. It would hardly seem that, on this side of the Chamber, in reaching forward to the discussion of a question of that kind, I should be met with any objections from the gentleman who so properly leads us on these territorial measures, a man who has been all his lifetime in the skirmish line and front battle rank of liberty and equal rights everywhere. He can hardly, I think, rise in his place and tell us that it is not right and fit that men, irrespective of race and color, should be entitled in a republican and a free government to the exercise of political rights. I mean innocent men; I mean men who have forfeited no natural or social or political rights which they may have been otherwise entitled to by treason or any other crime; but innocent, honest citizens of the country, without respect to race or color, are certainly, the honorable Senator must admit, entitled, as a matter of justice as well as a matter of policy and purity, to be represented, to have a voice in the selection of their representatives, and to be among those who consent to the laws which are to affect their life, their liberty, and their pursuit of happiness.

Why, sir, the notion that Government is instituted for a select few who are to be discovered by their descent as kings are, or by their learning as the priests used to be, or by their property as aristocratical Governments generally are, ought to have been exploded in the light of recent events in this country. There can be no solid foundation upon which democratic government—I do not mean to use the term “republican” because that seems to excite the opposition of the other side of the Chamber as to the definition of the term—there can be no solid foundation upon which democratic government, if we have any faith in it, can rest except that the people, irrespective of what their race is, irrespective of the accidental conditions of birth or fortune or learning; must consent to the laws and have a voice in the selection of the agents who are to make and execute the laws under which they are to live.

I believe that every writer upon the theory of democratic government, upon the abstract theory of all just government, agrees that any arbitrary distinction, any arbitrary test, even of intelligence, has no place in the foundation of the exercise of those rights which relate to the selection of the persons who are to administer the government for the benefit of all; because the man who is ignorant has precisely the same right to protection, he has precisely the same right to every species of protection that the law gives to his neighbor who is intelligent, he has the same right to choose among his intelligent neighbors as any other man which of them shall make laws for him. The absurdity of undertaking to set up these tests is the more manifest from the fact that so far as the world has at present progressed we cannot fail to see that if any special test of intelligence or of property or any other arbitrary rule were laid down, the larger part of mankind would have no voice in government. There are many communities in which intelligence has reached a very small point of advancement. Is it to be said that those communities must necessarily and theoretically be governed by some despot or king; and if so, how is he to be selected? By his superior strength or by his age or by his color? No, Mr. President; there is and there can be no just dispute, when we consider this subject in the light of the democratic equality which we all profess to believe in, that the right to select your rulers, the right to have a voice in choosing those who are to make your laws, must necessarily reside in every person in the community over whom those laws are to operate, so long as that person entitles himself by obedience to the law, by making no war upon his neighbor, by committing no crime, to have a voice in the administration of affairs.

I do not mean by this to undertake to make any argument against the propriety of learning. That is not the point. The more we have of it, the better we shall be off. But I do undertake to say that to make learning or color or property or race a test in a democratic country of the right to choose its rulers, is to sap the foundation of the very principle of the democracy upon which you act. In this body, by a very large majority, we have agreed to this proposition, and discarding every test save citizenship and loyalty we have declared that distinctions of race and color or of learning have no place in the democratic theory of this Government; and we expect to be obliged, gratefully obliged it may turn out, to carry this principle wherever the Constitution permits us to carry it, into more sections of this country than it has yet been carried by far.

Following upon that action of ours in this district, the people of this Territory, over which Congress has the same control, for which it has made laws and set up institutions, and from which it may take them to-day lawfully and constitutionally if it pleases, come to us with a constitution which has this inherent and radical distinction. Wherefore is it there?

Mr. WADE. If the Senator will allow me, I wish to ask him a question. If this amendment or any other amendment which may be made here should be ingrafted on the constitution which Nebraska has presented with her application for admission, cannot the State after her admission alter it at any time? Can we make such a permanent regulation with regard to suffrage here that will continue against the will of the State after her admission?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am very happy to answer the question of my honorable friend. Speaking for myself, I have not a particle of doubt that we can. If we cannot, in what condition do we find ourselves? If we cannot admit States upon a condition, what becomes of our condition on the subject of slavery? If we have the power to provide that Kansas or Nebraska shall never set up slavery, have we not the power to provide that she shall never set up any other arbitrary or unjust or unequal distinction among her citizens?

Mr. WADE. I never supposed we could prevent a State setting up slavery unless by an alteration of the Constitution. Now, of course she cannot do it, because the Constitution forbids it. Before that time I supposed that she could.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I did not. Why, sir, we have uniformly admitted States on conditions. Every State that has been admitted, I think has been admitted on some condition or other. We have usually provided, it is true, that that condition should be incorporated by an ordinance irrevocable in their constitution, but so far as it derives its validity from that constitution the people have a right to change it at any time. Therefore, when you go back to the root of the matter, the binding obligation upon these new States to adhere to the conditions which we impose and which they agree to, grows out of the paramount and supreme power of the will of their creator, the Congress of the United States, exercising its functions under the Constitution of the United States, which declares that its laws, independent of all State constitutions and State laws, shall be the paramount law of the land.

Now, Mr. President, to return to the point to which I was speaking: wherefore is this distinction set up in the fundamental law which the people of this Territory have brought here and laid upon our desk? My honorable friend from Ohio, imitating a distinguished citizen of Massachusetts who is now dead, in believing that the Declaration of Independence was only a sounding and glittering generality, tells us that this is only a mere technicality; it does not amount to anything; there are no colored men there, and we are really “sticking in the bark” when we are endeavoring to ingraft upon this constitution the perpetual and fundamental condition that equality among men shall be preserved there; that we are really impeding the progress of republicanism by being overnice about such little, immaterial trifles as the right of men of any particular race or color to exercise the full political privileges of citizenship to the exclusion of all others.

Mr. President, I do not regard it as an immaterial trifle. If it was of consequence enough to be matter of deliberate consideration in the territorial convention of the people of Nebraska, as I assume that it did, if it was of consequence enough to go into the fundamental law as one of the cardinal principles upon which that free government is to be instituted, then certainly it is no such mean thing as not to deserve consideration and debate from us; it is something more than a mere technicality, in the language of the Senator from Ohio; it is something more than the sounding and glittering generality that that eminent citizen of Massachusetts to whom I have alluded characterized as being the chief quality of the Declaration of Independence; and I am surprised indeed, sir, surprised beyond measure, and I feel regret that is even greater than my surprise, to see the honorable Senator from Ohio, whom we all love so well to follow, leading us through this District against all opposition for these same equal rights, and then turning to the westward and saying that after all it is nothing but a technicality, that men are standing in their own light and in the light of their party if they venture to lift their voices in favor of erasing this offensive, unjust, and inhuman distinction!

There is everything, Mr. President, in justice; and we shall learn when the empire of tradition which has been tottering has at last completely fallen, we shall learn in the new light that we are coming to, that we shall never have complete prosperity if we do not stick to our principles through thick and thin. There can be no temporary triumph, there can be no temporary necessity in the nature of things possible which will justify a true man in departing one hair from justice and truth.

There is something more, Mr. President. While we all love justice and equal rights, and we all love our party because we believe it represents the active operation of that justice and the essential propagation of those rights, we must still remember that even the party which we wish to carry forward and build up for this purpose is not great enough and strong enough to do wrong. We must remember that we must not stand upon one principle in the District of Columbia and upon exactly the opposite one in the Territory of Nebraska, because although we are strong now, the free people of this country will never believe in a party which is inconsistent with itself, and of whom it might be justly said if we put this bill through as it is: “Your pretense in the District of Columbia and in the southern States about the equality of men is merely because it suits your purpose to get in Republican Senators and Representatives; but when it suits your purpose to get in Republican Senators and Representatives from Nebraska, then you believe that there is no such thing as equal rights irrespective of race or color; it is only a technicality, then, or a glittering generality.”

Mr. President, as strong as we are, and justly strong; as proud as we are and as conscious as we are of our strength, we do not deserve to be strong or proud or successful if we do not adhere to a great principle of justice and equality which we practice upon here where we have the power; if we do not adhere to it in Nebraska because it happens at the moment that we are to gain a Representative or two or a Senator or two by denying the principle there. And as we have the power, in my judgment, the clear and unquestioned power, in the exercise of our discretion, in admitting this Territory to be a State, in creating it to impose such conditions cardinal and perpetual as seem fit to us, why not let us do it? Why not let us say to the people of this Territory, “We receive you upon the condition that within your borders, notwithstanding your constitution or your laws, you shall practically exercise equality and justice toward every citizen within your limits?” As I have said before, the power cannot logically under the Constitution be denied. There is no danger if it could in trying the experiment; the friends of this measure certainly, if they believe it to be merely a brutum fulmen, are not injured by it, and will thus concede the assertion of a principle upon the part of the Congress of the United States, which I trust within the next five years will be carried to the remotest corner of the land.

Mr. WADE. I had not intended, Mr. President, to say anything more on this subject; nor shall I now detain the Senate longer than will enable me to reply to some of the positions which the Senator from Vermont has assumed, placing me I think in a false position, or at least using arguments that I had employed in a sense in which I did not intend and which I hardly think could have been properly so understood.

The Senator rather insinuated that after having been for a great many years an advocate of free and liberal principles, I have somehow fallen from that position and become the advocate of other principles. I do not understand that to be my position. When slavery was the question before us, when the right of men to vote was presented to us, I have always been the advocate of principles of liberty; and where the proper opportunity was presented for my action in support of them I have been I believe as unwavering in that respect as any other Senator on this floor. I do not admit that I have now less zeal on that subject than I have always had. I have never, however, been one of those who would drag those principles to an extreme so as to lose a practical opportunity of advancing great public objects on account of what I considered an abstraction, a technicality. Sometimes a thing like that may be insisted upon so as to lose the opportunity of performing great good. Whenever such occasions have arisen there may have been an apparent inconsistency on my part, but I have been willing to stand the hazard of it before the people and before my own conscience and to risk a shadow to obtain the substance.

That has always been my course; I am never frightened at a red rag hung up; I do not bite at it. But show me that the principle which you say I am about to violate is really a principle and not the bare shadows of a principle, the ghost of a principle, as I think is the case here, and I am with you.

Now, how stand these Territories? The Senator from Massachusetts yesterday branded the proposition that I have been advocating here as shameful and disgraceful. He repeated that assertion in the face of this Senate, almost two thirds of whom at the last session voted for this very measure—not once, but more than once, for they repeated the vote in regard to both these Territories; and the same members, if we may judge by the votes they constantly gave yesterday, stand ready now to give the same vote, notwithstanding all the Senator's arguments, and although he has branded the proposition as shameful and disgraceful.

Do gentlemen think that four fifths of the Republican members of this body are advocates of absolute wrong and injustice, that they are willing to sacrifice those principles for which they have so long and so courageously contended under all circumstances, that they stand up here shamefully to trample them under foot to-day with no motive on earth to do so?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to ask my friend one question: whether in his own individual and conscientious judgment he believes this provision in the constitution which is offered to us, excluding all other than white men from political rights, to be a just and proper constitutional provision or not?

Mr. WADE. I am willing to answer that. I do not think that the right of voting is like the right that a man has to personal liberty. I think it is subordinate perhaps to that; but undoubtedly I think it is right and proper that all mankind, certainly without any distinction of color, and perhaps without regard to sex, ought to have the right of voting. I agree to that; but I know it has been the practice of all our governments to deny that right for certain political reasons that they believed justified them in doing so. It has been the habit of our Government from its foundation, and it has met the approbation of all the just men in it up to a very recent period.

Mr. EDMUNDS. So it has, but—

Mr. WADE. I will answer the Senator; I never dodge anything. I do not think it was right politically. I am an advocate for universal suffrage, and always have been; but when you ask me to stand by that principle where it will have no effect, and where, as I said before, to insist on it will defeat a great meed of good that is within our reach in order to assert the ghost of that principle, I do not think it is to act wisely. Therefore the Senator was wrong when he said I had argued this right of suffrage as a glittering generality, as a certain gentleman said of the Declaration of Independence. I never have treated the Declaration of Independence as a glittering generality, but as a reality; yea, sir, more important to mankind than any declaration that has been made since that which was made to Moses on Mount Sinai. Its effect on the world has been greater, and it has had no sterner advocate for its principles than myself, so far as I have been able to assert them always.

I have said nothing about this right in the abstract. It is a right, and I am the advocate for it; but I am not willing to sacrifice everything to it where it has no application. I was endeavoring to show the improbability of an abandonment of their principles by two thirds of this Republican Senate, yea, more than two thirds of the Republican Senate, more than four fifths of them, who are as tender upon the subject of human rights, and even upon this political right of voting, as the Senator from Vermont. And he must not attempt, nor must the Senator from Massachusetts attempt to brand the Senate with standing here ready, prompt, eager to do a shameful and disgraceful thing. A little modesty should assure a man that such a proposition as that would hardly go down in this Senate.

I have resisted the application of these amendments because I doubt now the constitutionality of them; but I am willing to tell the Senator from Vermont, and all other Senators, that if his proposition is constitutional I have no objection to it. I am in favor of it now if it can be done properly and within the verge of the Constitution of the United States. If I am wrong in the supposition that we cannot ingraft upon the constitution of a State seeking to come into the Union a condition that shall be binding upon her when she is in and a continual provision that she never can violate, convince me of it and I shall be willing to enforce in the present case this principle of absolute right, if you please to consider it so, so that it never shall be changed. I do not see, however, that we have that power; and I argued as well as I could, and I believe in accordance with all the great jurists of the United States heretofore, that we had no such right; that it would be in the power of this State the next day after you admitted her to turn around and change her constitution, and thrust out the provision that you had forced upon her.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If my friend will allow me, I wish to ask him how can he ever have it determined whether he can impose such a condition or not unless we first make a law which shall propose such a condition? We can never reach the point of finding it out if we do not do that.

Mr. WADE. We cannot foresee exactly what the courts will do, who are supposed to have the construction of the constitution in the last resort, and even their decisions are not like those of the Medes and Persians; they do not always stand. There is no such thing as absolute certainty. There is no test of the constitutionality of a law, perhaps, except it is the final decision of the court of last resort upon full deliberation.

Mr. SUMNER. Will my friend allow me to call his attention to the very enabling act under which the people of Nebraska have acted? I find by referring to that that it requires that the constitution shall provide by an article forever irrevocable without the consent of the Congress of the United States three different things: first, that slavery shall be prohibited; secondly, that there shall be perfect toleration of religious sentiment; and thirdly, that the people inhabiting the Territory shall disclaim all right and title to the unappropriated public lands.

Mr. WADE. I understand all those provisions.

Mr. SUMNER. The question is whether those conditions are not irrevocable.

Mr. WADE. I think they are.

Mr. SUMNER. Very well; let us add another to them.

Mr. WADE. They are in the nature of a compact between the people of the Territory when they apply and Congress who have made the proposition. They have agreed to frame their constitution upon that hypothesis; and although we could not bind them from here by ingrafting upon their constitution any such provision as this, I have no doubt that we may make stipulations with regard to the public lands, because they have been in every constitution that ever has been made and admitted here, of the western States at least. But they should have been put into the enabling act. If at the time when we told them that on complying with the propositions we made in that act they should be admitted, we had said to them, "It shall be an irrevocable condition of your entering into this Union that you shall make a provision for the elective franchise, so that no person shall be excluded on account of color," and they had complied with it and placed it in their constitution in accordance with the requisition we made, then it would have partaken of the nature of a compact between the General Government and the people of the Territory, in such sort that I am by no means ready to pronounce that it would not be binding forever, except by the mutual consent of the parties that agreed to it. But this proposition stands in no such position. I wish the Senator from Vermont would convince me that it does. I am perfectly willing that the proposition he has made, as I understood him, should be placed upon this constitution, provided it can be done constitutionally. He aims at a thing that I am not averse to; but I am averse to sacrificing the opportunity and doing a wrong to ourselves, to the people of the Territory, and to the gentlemen who are seeking seats upon this floor, upon what I foresee will never touch the rights of a man.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then I wish to suggest to my friend from Ohio that if my amendment, being incorporated into this bill, should turn out to be unconstitutional it will not do any harm; the State will be in. Why does he object to it?

Mr. WADE. So anxious am I that this State should be admitted and that Colorado should also be admitted that I am willing; if it will produce harmony here, so that we can carry both measures and all unite upon the same ground, which would be an excellent thing for ourselves, to agree to the proposed condition if we can do it constitutionally. I have grave scruples in regard to it; I think it would not be binding upon the State. That is my judgment, but as the Senator says, if it should be otherwise, the provision can do no harm, and every gentleman who believes it to be constitutional may vote for it. If it is an error at all, I admit it is in the right direction; and although as I have said, it is a bare abstraction, nevertheless if Senators believe it is constitutional, or if they believe that is so doubtful a point that it ought to receive the sanction of the courts to determine it, certainly I have no objection to their voting for the amendment. I want these States in. I have argued all the time that I do not care anything about this word "white" as applied to these States, because in my judgment it has no effect, not because the word "white" may not be a materiality and of great consequence in some connections, but in this connection where it stands it will harm a hair of no man's head.

The Senator from Vermont mistook me when he supposed I was going to argue in the abstract that it was wrong to admit colored persons to vote; I gave no such intimation. I wish it might be so that they could vote everywhere; and I wish the Senator would remember my argument, good or bad. My argument was, that the very result which he seeks to bring about, as all of us do, is so certain that it will be brought about sooner by admitting the State than by not admitting her. We have the pledge of the influential gentlemen here and of all the principal men of that Territory, who are all for it, that it will be brought about sooner, this abstraction will be rectified sooner by permitting the State to come in than by thrusting it out; and I do not like to do a vain thing. I argued before as I am compelled to argue now that it was a vain and idle thing to do it, because the State, the moment she was in the Union, if she saw fit, could call a convention, rectify her constitution, and exclude this provision. That is the way I looked at it. Some Senators seem to think that is not the case. If it is not the case and we have full and plenary jurisdiction over the subject, and can put into this constitution a provision that will admit its members and bind the people there to a principle that is right in itself, certainly I can have no objection to it—not the least in the world. Let them in. I know they never will thrust it out if you put it in; I am satisfied of that. I have argued to you that they themselves will put it in, and surely they will not thrust it out if you put it in. They are ready to take it. If we can do it, let us do it; and let us all combine, unite, and place in there a provision that will admit the members upon the floor and still leave it to the people, as I think they will have the power if they dislike it to put it out.

I have stated to you my belief, founded upon as large an inquiry on the subject as I could make, that the people there are as anxious to have it in their constitution as you are; and it was not a matter of deliberation with that people that this word "white" was placed in their constitution. It is a form that is copied in copying one constitution from another. They found it everywhere they went. They put a copyist to work, and when he took up the constitution of Nevada, of Iowa, of Oregon, of my own State, of Illinois, of Indiana, or any other western State as a precedent from which to write the principal articles of the constitution, he copied that in, just as a clerk copies technical phrases into a deed when he is following a precedent. That is the way it was inserted. It was not a matter of deliberation, as I understand, among those people. It is in there; it will have no effect; but if you can get rid of it by putting in a condition that there shall be no discrimination in the franchise on account of color, very well. There are some words that seem harsh in that amendment, and I would recommend that they be modified. They might be offensive to the people of Nebraska, and it would have a better effect without them. I would recommend if that amendment is to be adopted, instead of putting such strong penalties into their constitution, it be provided simply that it shall be a fundamental principle in their constitution that they shall make no discrimination on account of color or race in regard to the elective franchise, or something like that. I would rather it should be so. It would be more palatable to them, and just as effectual, in my judgment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If the Senator will allow me, the objection to that is, that the theory upon which my amendment goes is, that having full power over the creation of new States we may create them upon such conditions as we please. Those conditions have force, not because that State having accepted them becomes willing or unwilling afterward to fulfill them, but because it is the paramount law of the land which operates upon every citizen in the new State. Then, how are we to enforce the paramount law of the land other than as we enforce all other laws, by providing punishments and penalties for its infraction? In that case a colored citizen of Nebraska going and offering to vote, being refused, brings his action precisely as he would in Massachusetts or Vermont, against the polling officer, whatever his title may be, for denying to him a right, and goes to a jury of his country for damages. That is all the way men enforce their right to vote in our own States. Then in addition to that you proceed to punish the officer by fine and by imprisonment ordinarily, but not in this amendment, for violating the law. Therefore, this section of punishment is not offensive, or ought not to be offensive, to the people of Nebraska, because it being a part of the paramount law, the condition on which we create the State, we only punish the citizens of the United States who choose to violate the law.

Mr. WADE. I do not suppose that the Senator wishes to put any more stringent provision into the constitution than the people of Nebraska themselves would have put in it probably if their attention had been called to it. They would not have gone on with all the provisions of a law making penalties on that subject, but they would have declared probably that there never should be any discrimination on the subject of the franchise on account of color or race. You would be willing to trust that people with making their own penal laws to enforce a constitutional duty, I hope. Let us not be over jealous about these things. When you make it their duty, create it so in their constitution, you ought to have the charity to believe that that people will enact a law on the subject sufficient to enforce it; but when you undertake to specify severe penalties and force them on the people from the outset, it does seem to me they might think it was objectionable. I think the other would be just as well. I think we ought to trust the people with that. When you have made it their absolute duty to make a provision of law on that subject, who can doubt that they will do it?

Mr. MORRILL. I should like to ask the Senator from Ohio whether it is his understanding, if this State should be admitted upon the condition stated in this amendment and the constitution sent back for ratification, as that amendment provides, the Senators elect in the mean time would have their seats on the floor of the Senate?

Mr. WADE. There are two propositions now pending—an amendment to the constitution and an amendment to that amendment. One of them contemplates that it is to be sent back and the people there are to pass upon it. That is the amendment of the Senator from Missouri. The amendment to that and the one I have been speaking of, if I understand it, only provides that they are accepted upon the condition that they shall make no discrimination, &c. That admits them at once. If it is a constitutional provision it makes it absolutely certain that they must assert it by penal law, and they are admitted at once. There is nothing else for them to do only to come in and comply with the condition. The nature of the condition is one subsequent, if I may say so, instead of precedent. Then under that they would be admitted at once, but it would be the duty of the State to comply with the provision we have ingrafted upon the constitution as a condition. That is the way it stands. I have no objection myself to its being inserted, because if it should not be strictly constitutional, and I have my scruples about it, if it is ever brought up before the courts to determine in the last resort, and they should determine it to be null and void, then we should have done all we can do in that direction, and have harmed nobody at any rate. On the other hand, if they determine that it is our right to do such a thing, then I would be glad to do it. That is the way I view it; but of course my assenting to it in that way amounts to no more than the assent of any other Senator. I cannot commit any part of the committee to it. I would not resist it. If we can be harmonized on this subject so that all can act together we shall accomplish a very great point, even beyond the bearings of this constitution itself.

Mr. POMEROY. The Senator from Vermont, in reply to a remark I made last evening, in which I said I was embarrassed in voting on this amendment on account of some previous legislation of Congress, answers me by saying that he thinks I would be equally embarrassed if the State should present itself with a constitution permitting or inaugurating slavery, because in the organic act to which I referred not only did the Legislature have the right to prescribe the qualification for voting, but it also had the right to establish that institution; the people might vote it up or vote it down, but they had the right of voting on it. The inference was, that I would be embarrassed if I voted against the admission of Nebraska, if it came as a slave State; to which I reply in a word that I should not feel that embarrassment for this reason, and this is the very least of the reasons that I should offer, Congress has repealed it; Congress repealed it before the people of the Territory took any action on it and acquired any rights under it. That is a sufficient answer. In the legislation of 1854 they did establish it, but before any action was had by the people of that Territory, in 1864 they said, in so many words, "Slavery or involuntary servitude shall be forever prohibited." One part of this statute, therefore, has been repealed by the power that made it and which had the right to repeal it.

But how is it about voting and about the qualifications for voting? In 1854 Congress said that the people of this Territory in their legislative capacity should prescribe the qualifications for voting. Then in 1864, in the enabling act, Congress declared—and I voted for it with the other Senators—that the law of the Territory should be the law of suffrage in forming the State constitution. The reason why I would not be embarrassed in the one case and am embarrassed in the other is simply this: that in the one case the statute was repealed, and it was wrong, even if it had not been repealed; and in the other case, the statute has not only not been repealed, but it has been reenacted.

But the real difference between the Senator from Vermont and myself is this: I believe Congress can admit States; he believes Congress can create States. I do not believe Congress can create a State any more than they can create a world. The power never was given to Congress to make States, but only to admit them. Nebraska to-day is as much a State as any other State not represented in Congress. Nebraska to-day, without the action of Congress, is as much a State as South Carolina or Georgia or Alabama. It has got boundaries; it has got a government, not recognized to be sure; it has got officers; and so have Alabama and Georgia. They are all States. That provision of the Constitution which provides that Congress may admit new States means of course that they have got to be States when admitted. They are not made States by Congress. California was made a State before it was admitted here; Congress did not make it. It never had a territorial government. Other States have been made. Vermont remained a State for fourteen years before it was admitted. Kansas was a State for years before it was admitted. The people, under the legislation of Congress, make a State and then afterward, when Congress recognizes it, it becomes a State in the Union.

Mr. JOHNSON. With or without the legislation of Congress?

Mr. POMEROY. Yes, the people of a Territory can make a State with or without the legislation of Congress—not a State in the Union, but a State outside of it; and it is to be a State or else it cannot be admitted; Congress cannot make it.

The legislation contemplated by the Senator from Vermont is, he says, the right to legislate over the State by virtue of our eminent domain and because we have got supreme authority. That does not devolve in us the right to make a constitution for a people. This proposition proposes to amend their constitution in a way not pointed out by the instrument itself. I contend that the way to amend the constitution of Nebraska is according to its own provisions and not by an act of Congress. An act of Congress put into this act of admission and assented to by the Legislature cannot amend a constitution in violation of its own provisions. I do not believe it would be worth the paper that we consume in writing or printing it. If this amendment ever has any validity at all, it will be because it has been submitted to the people and the people have ratified and adopted it. Then it may become a part of the constitution. I do not believe that this constitution, when it was made by the territorial Legislature, had any virtue as a State constitution until it was adopted by the people. I do not think any Legislature can make a constitutional provision binding unless it has been made so by virtue of the instrument itself or in harmony with our common law on the subject, and that is submission to and adoption by the people. I do not see any way to amend this constitution except by sending it back to the people. I can see very well how this proposition can be made a part of the constitution in that way. It is on that account, not desiring to send this constitution back to the people, believing that there is no practical importance in the question that is now raised, that I shall vote for the admission of Nebraska exactly as the bill has been reported by the committee and without any amendment.

Mr. HOWARD. I did not intend to speak again on this bill, but I do not feel like suffering the final vote to be taken upon it without paying some attention to the ground which has been taken in the discussion by the Senator from Vermont. If I understood the argument and observations of the Senator rightly, his principle is this: that under that clause of the Constitution which declares that the Congress may admit new States into this Union, it is competent for Congress to annex as fundamental conditions any requirements that Congress may see fit, and on the consent of the people of the Territory to those conditions, if they are declared to be irrevocable, without the consent of Congress, they are to remain in force as law forever, or so long as Congress withholds its consent. I aim to state the proposition of the Senator fairly. If I fail to do so I wish he would correct me.

Mr. EDMUNDS. You have stated it exactly.

Mr. HOWARD. Now, sir, I cannot under any circumstances give my consent to that principle. I do not believe Congress possesses such a power. The power granted is simple and plain; it is "to admit new States into this Union." To admit new States into the Union is to invest those States, of course, and necessarily, with every power, every faculty, every constitutional provision which pertains to any of the States in the Union under the Constitution. It is to impart to the new States the same rights of legislation, the same sovereign power that belongs to the old States or to any other States, for in respect to political power it is impossible, in the very nature of things, that there should not be a perfect equality among the States.

If we may annex an irrevocable, fundamental condition which is to underlie the constitution of every new State that we admit, then I foresee consequences which will not be entirely agreeable to the people of the United States. For instance, if we may annex as a fundamental condition that the black man shall have an equal right to vote with the white man, we may with equal propriety and with equal assertion of law say that the whole population, male and female, black and white, shall possess this right, and we may incorporate it in the State constitution in the form of this so-called irrevocable condition, not to be repealed or altered without the consent of Congress.

We may go further; we may declare that in their constitution the people of the Territory shall enact that real estate shall descend unequally to the heirs-at-law of a decedent; that it shall descend entirely to the male heirs or entirely to the female heirs; we may declare that this constitution shall contain a clause prohibiting the resort to any legal proceedings for the collection of debt, leaving every debt as an obligation of honor, to be discharged according to the sense of honor that may happen to be entertained by the debtor. Indeed, we may go through all the details of State policy, State legislation, and individual rights, as regulated by the constitutions of the States. Even further than this, we may here in these Chambers draft and enact not only a constitution for the State which is contemplated to be admitted, but we may enact an entire code of laws for the State, and for all its citizens and all its inhabitants, organizing its courts of justice, and making provision for every exigency that arises in society under a State constitution; and we can go so far as to declare, according to the argument of the honorable Senator from Vermont, that the assent of the people of the Territory to this State constitution formed here, to this code of laws formed here, shall be irrevocable, without the consent of Congress. What, then, becomes of State rights? Why, sir, it is merely converting the Congress of the United States into a manufactory of new States and new State constitutions. It denies to the people of the States almost all, yes, all, substantially, of those original and immemorial rights which have been exercised by the people of the States ever since the dissolution of our connection with Great Britain.

Sir, I cannot vote for any such doctrine as this, and I do not believe that this sweeping principle, or rather claim, will ever meet the approbation of the people of the United States. I know it will never meet the sanction of that great, patriotic, and loyal party in the country whom we represent here. It is one of those extreme ideas which cannot be of any value if placed in the form of legislation, and if in that form, can produce nothing but mischief and that continually. I said yesterday, and I repeat it to-day, that under the general terms in which the power to admit new States is granted in the Constitution, Congress may, if it sees fit, annex conditions to the admission; that is, prescribe acts to be performed by the people of the Territory before they become a State; but after they have become a State they have the same power over their internal affairs which has ever been possessed by the people of any and all the other States of the Union. We cannot take away from them the right of reforming and amending their own fundamental law in any manner they may see fit, not inconsistent with the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am entirely willing that my honorable friend from Michigan should speak for his section of the great party to which we belong. I will speak for mine. My section of that great party has always believed in the power of Congress under the Constitution, making, under the Constitution, by its legislation, the supreme law of the land, which that same Constitution declares shall be higher and stronger than any State constitution or any State laws in all cases in which the general rights of the citizens of the United States, as such citizens, are concerned; and I undertake to say in reply to my honorable friend, speaking for an humble but a somewhat older section of that party than he represents, because I believe Vermont got on the Republican platform some considerable time before Michigan did—

Mr. HOWARD. If the Senator will excuse me. Michigan has the precedence by several weeks. You were next in succession. [Laughter.]

Mr. EDMUNDS. I beg to say that before that gallant and capital State of Michigan was born into this world the State of Vermont, by her legislative resolutions on these subjects, declared the very doctrines that I am contending for now.

Mr. HOWARD. The doctrines are old, but not the party.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Whig party of the State of Vermont traces a true and legitimate descent in the regular and hereditary way into the present Republican party. It is only a change of names with us, and not of principles. I do not know how it is in Michigan. I will not undertake to say.

Now, to return to the question: my honorable friend says that this power on our part to impose conditions when we create that corporation which is called a State; that is, when we endow a society of men with certain political privileges of local government, does not exist, for the reason that if it did it might be abused; that is to say, he says if we have this power we have the power to say that females shall vote; we have the power to say how real estate shall descend; and we have the power, in short, to regulate the whole internal concerns of the State. I have been taught by an eminent jurist of this country, a Virginian, too, whose name was Marshall, once, I believe, the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States—I have no doubt my honorable friend has heard of him—that the fact that a power might be abused was no argument whatever against the existence of such a power.

Mr. HOWARD. The Senator will excuse me for interrupting him. I deny the power. A thing which does not exist cannot be abused.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is exactly what I was saying. I stated the gentleman's position to be exactly that; and the only reason he gave us—he may have some better one, but the only one which he has honored us by stating—was the numerous instances of abuse which it might lead to; and thus, in reply to that, I have said that we have high authority, if we need authority on such a question, for saying that the fact that a power may be abused is no argument at all against its existence.

My friend asks what would become of State rights if Congress were to exercise powers of this description? Let me reply by inquiring what will become of State rights unless we create these States? They have not any State rights now. This constitution which is offered to us is nothing but waste paper until we breathe into it the breath of life by the power of our legislative authority. It is the supreme law of the land that we make under the Constitution, which creates this State at all; and I have been taught, in my little reading of law, to suppose that the power to create implied the power to affix qualifications and conditions in the act of that creation, which should follow its life until it should terminate as an inherent and inseparable part of its existence.

But my friend says, "What if these people do not accept it? What then? Where are they?" The same answer may be made when we create any corporation. We endow a body of men with corporate privileges. Suppose they do not exercise them; suppose they do not accept the boon which we offer to them; does that prove that we have not the power to create the corporation? Suppose they lapse; suppose they become disorganized as the southern States have; does that demonstrate that we have no power to revitalize them upon other conditions or to govern them in their disorganized condition under the paramount law of the land? My friend voted with me for the civil rights bill, which undertook to regulate private rights in every State of the country, old and new; and he voted for it, I suppose, as I did, under the Constitution of the country which authorized us, passing laws in accordance with that Constitution, to see that they were executed upon the citizens of every State. We are not passing laws here for the State of Nebraska in its political capacity. We have no relations, or very few indeed, with any State in its political capacity. Those relations are all pointed out explicitly and expressly in the Constitution itself. But the relations of this national Government with the people of the State are personal and direct; and it is upon the people in their individual and separate capacities as citizens that the law operates. Therefore, if a State fails to fulfill its functions, if the State of Vermont or the State of Michigan dislikes the conditions upon which it has been admitted, and chooses to elect no Senators or members of Congress or members of the Legislature, and chooses to become wholly disorganized, are the people of either of them any less citizens of the United States than they were before? Does not the paramount law of the land still operate upon their persons and upon their property? Or are they adrift and loose in the world, with no power on the part of the Government to regulate their conduct toward the rest of the country? I do not believe in any such doctrine.

This proposition which I advance is not a new proposition; the power which it seeks to exercise is not a new power. In some form or other it has been exercised from the beginning of the Government to this day; because, as I said before, those conditions which we have heretofore imposed to be incorporated into the constitutions of these States, the conditions which we imposed by the act of 1864 to be incorporated into this very Constitution, have their only force and vitality from our action; for, so far as it depends upon the will of that people, they may change that will to-morrow and reconsider it and set it aside, and then so far as their action was concerned, it would no longer exist; but the paramount law under which that Constitution was formed and which created its very existence remains intact and in vigorous force and exercise as it did before. That is my position, and standing upon that position I am quite ready to meet the Senator.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I have been from the commencement of this discussion very anxious for the admission of the State of Nebraska. I am so yet. I should have been glad if the people of this Territory had come here with a constitution not containing the word "white;" it would have been more nearly in accordance with my particular views of what a constitution ought to be; but they have not done so. Now, sir, there are three propositions before the Senate touching that question; one submitted by the Senator from Vermont, which proposes substantially that we shall here say that that word shall be stricken out. Now, I should be glad to know what would be the effect of doing that thing. There is an old saying "that it takes two to make a bargain." Suppose we pass this bill with the amendment of the Senator from Vermont; what then? Is Nebraska a State or not? Has she agreed to the Constitution as we expound it, as we lay it down? Has she agreed that she will have the constitution with the word "white" stricken out? If she has not agreed to it, can we impose it upon her without her consent? In other words, suppose the bill with that amendment be passed by both Houses and signed by the President, are the Senators from that State and the members from that State in the other House entitled to admission in the two Chambers at once? If Nebraska be a State they would be so entitled, and would have the same rights as any of us here. But suppose their people at home should not approve of this proceeding; suppose they should say they do not want this word "white" out of their constitution; then one of two things would follow: either they would have a constitution imposed upon them to which they had never given their consent, or else they would not be a State in the Union.

Following out the argument of the Senator from Michigan, how can we here make a constitution for the people of that State? I do not see how we can. If we can say that the word "white" shall be stricken out of their constitution in fact, can we not say that twenty other words shall be put in, and then if our action concludes them they are governed by a constitution they never made.

In regard to the amendment submitting this question to the action of the Legislature of that State, I would have no objection to that but for the fact that the General Assembly is already elected; it does not know the views and wishes and opinions of the people of Nebraska on that subject; and not knowing them, it cannot express them. If it were to be submitted to a General Assembly to be elected after our action, then we should know what the views of the people of Nebraska were on the question; but if it is submitted to a Legislature already elected, as I understand that of Nebraska to be, we cannot find out what are their views upon this question. If we adopt the amendment of the Senator from Missouri and submit the matter to the people of Nebraska, it must necessarily delay the admission of the State until the next session of Congress, and I do not think that the practical importance of the question involved is sufficient to justify us in producing that result.

For these reasons I shall vote against all the amendments for the admission of the State.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion to postpone the further consideration of this bill until the 7th day of January next and make it the special order at one o'clock on that day.

Mr. BUCKALEW obtained the floor.

Mr. GRIMES. I think it is quite evident that we shall not be able to get to a vote on this question to-day, and it is very important, as this is our last sitting during the present year, that there shall be an executive session, in order that some confirmations may be made. I do not want to interfere with the course that the Senator from Ohio has marked out for himself; but, if he will give his consent, I should like to move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business. I understand there are five or six gentlemen who propose to speak on this question.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I hope the Senator will not make that motion until I am through.

Mr. WADE. Mr. President—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania give way to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. WADE. If the gentleman has got the floor I have nothing to say.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Mr. President, I do not feel any great amount of interest in the pending motion for the postponement of this subject until next month, nor do I feel any considerable degree of interest in the amendment to the bill which has been the main matter of debate this morning; I mean the admission of this State upon a proposed fundamental condition relating to suffrage. As to the first question, the question of postponement, it is one of those which naturally and properly belong to the majority of the body to fix and determine for themselves. All that the gentlemen who do not constitute that majority, who are not responsible for the manner and time in which the business of the Senate is conducted, can claim is, that when measures are pending they shall be fully and fairly heard; that the judgment of the body shall only be pronounced after they have had a reasonable opportunity to submit their sentiments to it for its consideration. Therefore, last evening I submitted some remarks in the spirit in which I have just made this observation. I then stated that I desired to be heard upon this general question of the admission of new States into the Union, and that I was content to conform myself to the desire of the majority of the Senate, either to proceed last evening or to speak to-day or upon some other subsequent occasion which might be fixed.

As to the proposed amendment to the bill, to which I have alluded, I have to remark that in the first place I suppose it has been sufficiently discussed; it is unnecessary to add anything upon either side of the argument. In the second place, confessedly as regards the application of a provision of this kind to the Territory or proposed State of Nebraska, it would have no considerable effect, no practical operation, and therefore it is not necessary that we should debate it at length. I pass that topic, therefore, and embrace the occasion to speak upon the merits of the bill itself, following in this particular the example set me by other members who have discussed the bill itself when speaking in point of form upon different propositions of amendment submitted to it.

Mr. President, in 1864 the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. WADE,] who has charge of the present bill, as the chairman of the Committee on Territories, reported three enabling acts to the Senate. One was to enable the people of Nevada to form a constitution of State government for themselves; another was to enable the people of the Territory of Colorado to do the same thing; and the third bill was to enable the people of Nebraska to do the same thing. These three bills were reported by him and were passed by the Senate at his instance, he taking upon himself on several occasions the whole or nearly the whole of the debate in their favor. I propose to examine for a short time those bills presented by the same member who now desires us to pass this bill; and I make this examination because those bills, and the time and circumstances under which they were passed and the objects in view in their enactment, are all intimately connected with the question before us.

The enabling acts for the Territories of Nevada and Colorado were passed on the 21st of March, 1864, and that relating to the Territory of Nebraska upon the 19th day of April of the same year, about one month afterward. Now, sir, what were the leading and material provisions of those acts? I may state, in the first place, that those acts were all very much alike. They were, I believe, identical in all their provisions except the particular of the name of the Territory, and also in the particular designation of boundaries; otherwise the three acts were precisely alike, and the examination of one gives us complete knowledge of the provisions of the others. I will take the act relating to the Territory of Nebraska, which appears on the fifty-first page of the pamphlet of laws of the session of 1863-64. By the third section of that act the Governor of the Territory was authorized to issue a proclamation calling upon the people of the Territory to elect delegates to a constitutional convention. The words are:

"And the Governor of said Territory shall, by proclamation, on or before the first Monday of May next, order an election of the representatives as aforesaid to be held on the first Monday in June thereafter throughout the Territory, and such election shall be conducted in the same manner as is prescribed by the laws of said Territory regulating elections therein for members of the House of Representatives."

Then by the fourth section it was provided:

"That the members of the convention thus elected shall meet at the capital of said Territory on the first Monday in July next, and after organization shall declare, on behalf of the people of said Territory, that they adopt the Constitution of the United States; whereupon the said convention shall be, and it is hereby, authorized to form a constitution and State government for said Territory."

Then follows in the fifth section a provision with regard to the adoption of the constitution:

"That in case a constitution and State government shall be formed for the people of said Territory of Nebraska, in compliance with the provisions of this act, that said convention forming the same shall provide by ordinance for submitting said constitution to the people of said State for their ratification or rejection at an election to be held on the second Tuesday of October, 1864, at such places and under such regulations as may be prescribed therein."

There is only one other provision of these enabling acts to which I propose to call attention, and that is found in the concluding part of the fifth section. After providing for the returns of the election upon the question of adopting or rejecting the constitution—the returns are to be made to the acting Governor—it proceeds:

"The said acting Governor shall certify the same to the President of the United States, together with a copy of said constitution and ordinances; whereupon it shall be the duty of the President of the United States to issue his proclamation declaring the State admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States, without any further action whatever on the part of Congress."

The Senate will perceive that this enabling act with reference to the Territory of Nebraska was that the Governor should, by proclamation, call a convention to meet in the month of July following; that if the convention formed a constitution it should be voted upon and accepted or rejected in October following; and that in case of the acceptance of the constitution and a return of such acceptance made to the President of the United States, he should issue a proclamation declaring the State admitted into the Union. It will be seen that it was contemplated that these Territories, if they chose to assume to themselves the dignity and character of States, should be prepared for representation in Congress at the second session of the Thirty-Eighth Congress, to wit, when it assembled in the month of December, 1864. These bills contained provisions by which the people of each of these three Territories would be enabled to take their place in the confederacy of States and obtain full representation in both Houses of Congress upon the assembling of Congress in December, 1864. The remarkable provision that they should be declared admitted into the Union by presidential proclamation, "without any further action whatever on the part of Congress," was a departure from the previous practice of the Government in such cases, and exhibits the anxiety felt for their speedy entrance into the Union as States.

Now, sir, it will at once be seen that the pretense that the people of either of the Territories that have been spoken of in the debate—Colorado or Nebraska—have proceeded under the enabling acts in the formation of constitutions for themselves, and in applying for admission into the Union, is wholly groundless, is without the slightest foundation in fact or in law. Either one of the enabling acts expended itself within the year 1864. It was to be executed in that year by the officers and people of the Territory concerned if executed at all; if it had effect, if it had the result that was contemplated, the new State would appear by her representatives in the Congress of the United States in December of that year. Any proceedings which have taken place since that year in either Territory in connection with the formation of a constitution have been wholly unauthorized by the enabling acts. They have been voluntary on the part of the people and authorities of the Territory in question. They have not been authorized or instigated by the legislation of Congress in any way whatever. The result is inevitable that these Territories appear before us as petitioners; they apply to us as, perhaps, they can properly apply, for permission to enter the Union if we think under all the circumstances they should be admitted; but any questions of right under the enabling acts of 1864 are out of the case and wholly foreign to the debate.

Before I pass on, I will pause a moment to make the inquiry, what was intended or designed in 1864 in the enactment of these several enabling acts as they are called? It appears from the congressional proceedings, which are preserved to us, and which we can consult, that the people of neither of those Territories applied for admission formally. There was no agitation on their part. Individuals resident in one or the other of the several Territories may have verbally expressed such a desire, but I believe it will be found upon investigation that no application was made by any officer or citizen of those Territories in a formal manner to either House of Congress for the passage of an enabling act. Why, then, were those bills introduced and passed? We know, from subsequent inquiry and investigation, that the number of inhabitants in either one of these Territories was exceedingly small at that time. There was a paucity of population, a deficiency of population for any reasonable purpose of forming a new State or introducing a new State into the Union. Why, then, were those bills passed?

I was never able to give any other explanation than this: that they were passed for the purpose of heading off (if I may use the expression) Mr. Lincoln, who was then President of the United States, in his policy of reestablishing State governments in the South and obtaining their recognition and representation in this Government. In his annual message at the beginning of the session, he had communicated to Congress a plan for the reorganization of State governments, in which any greater number than one tenth of the people of any insurrectionary State were authorized to reorganize their government; and he pledged the faith of this Government that such State government should be recognized and upheld by it.

Not only that, but it was notorious to the whole country, and appeared in all forms in official documents, that Mr. Lincoln was not only announcing a plan but was executing one. He was carrying forward its execution in Tennessee under the present President of the United States, who was sent there by him. He was carrying it on in the State of Louisiana actively and energetically. He was carrying it on also in Arkansas in the communication to General Steele, who was for a time in command in that State, and in other ways he was engaged in its execution. He was also carrying it on in the State of Virginia, within sight of the Capitol, at our very doors.

A very grave question arose upon which men differed, and differed upon both sides in politics, differed among themselves. It was whether that policy of his of organizing States upon the minority principle and by military power or under military coercion was valid, and if valid, whether it was reasonable and proper that it should be done. Upon that whole question I agreed with the Senator from Ohio, the chairman of the Committee on Territories. I thought it was absurd, it was monstrous that those presidential States should be set up as members of this Union and should be represented in the Senate and in the House to the full extent to which their populations were represented before the war, that a mere fragment of the population of a State should wield the whole political power of that State in this Government, both in Congress and in the Electoral Colleges. I, for one, thought that to be a monstrous proposition and resisted it; in this agreeing with the Senator from Ohio.

But although I agreed with him in his views on that question of presidential reconstructed States as they were then presented in the midst of the war, I did not agree with him in the means by which his object should be reached. He desired to head off this presidential policy. He felt about as John Miner Botts did in the days of Tyler. He, too, was opposed to the President and his policy and desired to check him, to defeat his policy, to prevent the accomplishment of his designs. I united with that Senator in voting against recognizing those State governments, in resisting their being represented in Congress, in resisting the counting of their electoral votes for President and Vice President of the United States. I did all this upon clear grounds and upon full conviction. But there was one thing in which I could not agree with the Senator from Ohio, and that was, in calling into existence imperfect, weak, inadequate, premature States in the West for the purpose of checking the policy of the President; rushing in Nevada and Colorado and Nebraska for the purpose of outvoting Mr. Lincoln's new members from the South. I could not go that far with the Senator from Ohio, and therefore never gave my assent to these enabling acts of 1864.

But, sir, to pass on: under what circumstances were those bills enacted by Congress? I propose to show that to the Senate and to the country. I propose to show the statements upon which the assent of Congress was given to those measures, and I propose to show that those statements came from the Senator from Ohio himself. Upon the consideration of the Colorado enabling act, Mr. COLLAMER said:

"I wish to inquire of the chairman of the Committee on Territories whether he has any information as to the extent of the population of this Territory?"

"Mr. WADE. Nothing that I can rely upon with a very great deal of confidence. I have taken some pains to ascertain the facts from the Delegate in the other House, and from Mr. Edmunds, of the Land Office, who has some information on that subject. I understand there must be now about sixty thousand inhabitants in Colorado; some think a great deal more than that. That is the smallest number I find intimated by those who profess to know anything about it. It is a Territory which is filling up very rapidly. Judge Edmunds tells me that he has not the least doubt in the world that before they finish their arrangements and become a State, there will be sufficient population there for a Representative in Congress, according to the ratio of representation fixed by the last census. That is about the information I got."

When the enabling act for Nebraska was pending the Senator from Ohio said, in the conclusion of the debate, these important words—and recollect, he was speaking as the organ of the Committee on Territories, speaking upon a territorial question, in a case and at a time when his expression of opinion was entitled to the highest respect and confidence.

"I have no doubt that this Territory will have a population amply sufficient for a Representative by the time they get a State government formed and are ready to elect their officers."

Which, according to the provisions in the enabling act, would have been in October, 1864. Now, by the legislation of Congress, under the present census, the population required for a member of the House of Representatives is one hundred and twenty-seven thousand; and Congress was assured, when these enabling acts were passed in 1864, that by the time the people of these Territories appeared, respectively, and claimed admission under those enabling acts they would have, each of them, at least the ratio or number of one hundred and twenty-seven thousand.

Mr. WADE. I hope the Senator will allow me one moment in explanation of that. He thinks that my predictions as to the population of these Territories were not well founded; that I stated it very large. I certainly announced what the Commissioner of Public Lands, who was very well acquainted with the subject, stated. It was the opinion of everybody with whom I conversed, and it was the best light I could get at the time. But the amount of population that we expected then was interrupted and undoubtedly disappointed by the terrible Indian war that occurred about that time, driving a great many out of the Territory, and drawing a great many into that war. I have no doubt that that had the effect to prevent those expectations being fulfilled. That is all I have to say on that subject. I repeat, what I have frequently said, that the population of Nebraska now is larger than Territories have usually had when they have been admitted, though not so large as I expected it would be at the time that enabling act was passed.

Mr. BUCKALEW. But, Mr. President, the force and effect of this fact is not weakened or removed at all in respect to the point for which I cited it, and that was, to show that the Congress of 1864 was misled, if not intentionally, in effect, deceived with reference to the subject of population in both the Territories that are now before us for admission, and that if the truth had then been known, if the facts as they were subsequently ascertained had been fairly stated and fully understood, there is no reason to believe that these enabling acts would have been passed. Congress acted under a misconception of the amount of population in each of these Territories.

I say this is conclusive against any argument founded upon these enabling statutes—the argument which has been pressed upon us with such force from the commencement of the debate down to this time. At the very time when the Senator from Ohio, upon authority which misled him equally with the Senate, was fixing the minimum of the population of Colorado at sixty thousand, at the very moment when he was informing us that the Delegate from that Territory in the other branch claimed that it was much larger than that, the actual number of inhabitants in that Territory could not possibly have been over thirty thousand, one half the minimum fixed, and upon which I have a right to say the action of Congress was predicated.

And so in regard to the Territory of Nebraska. We were assured that it would have one hundred and twenty-seven thousand inhabitants by the time its constitution was formed and its officers elected. Instead of that being the fact in October, 1864, when we were told it would take place, here in 1866, and at the end of the year, we are acting upon the question of admitting Nebraska, with a probable population of not more than fifty thousand. It is true, strange and vague statements are made about there being some eighty thousand people in this Territory, with nothing to sustain them except an unofficial and unreliable letter, to which I shall hereafter allude. We have satisfactory proof, that the population must be in the neighborhood of fifty thousand only. But Congress was told more than two years ago, that in October 1864, it would be up to the ratio of one hundred and twenty-seven thousand.

I will now briefly state the facts as to numbers, having laid the foundation for the exhibit. First, in relation to Colorado; by the census of 1860 the population was 84,277. The vote in August 1861, was 10,580; in December 1861, 9,854; in October 1862, 8,224; in September 1864, following the date of the enabling act, 5,769; in September 1865, upon the adoption of the constitution, 5,895, upon which vote a majority of 155 in favor of the constitution was reported. In this connection I will give the figures from the census or enumeration taken in 1861 to show the division of the population as to sex and age.

Mr. JOHNSON. Under what authority was that census taken?

Mr. BUCKALEW. Under the authority of the territorial Legislature I suppose. The census of 1860 shows facts of the same character, but I take the figures of the enumeration of 1861 because it is a little later. In 1861 there were in Colorado, 18,228 adult males, 4,884 adult females, and 2,622 minors; making a total population of 25,329, showing a decrease of total population from the previous year of about 9,000.

Mr. President, as has been frequently stated in this debate, in the settled parts of the country the number of voters as compared with the whole population is about one fifth. In the Territories and in the new parts of the country from the fact that females and minors do not go into them as rapidly and as largely as adult males, it follows that the proportion of voters to the whole mass of population is much greater; and of inevitable necessity, therefore, in estimating the population of a Territory or a new State you must multiply the voters by a smaller number than five. That is inevitable, and the explanation is abundantly furnished by the enumeration in 1861 in Colorado, which shows the enormous preponderance of adult males over females and minors in the population of that Territory.

But, sir, there was a peculiar reason for such great preponderance applying to Colorado which does not apply to all our Territories. It was a mining region; it was the case of a shifting and changing population; and you cannot apply the same reasoning to the same extent in agricultural Territories. Now, sir, I pass to the case of Nebraska. By the census of 1860 its population was 28,841, of which there were white males—I take the white population alone, because the negroes are so few that they may be omitted from the calculation—16,689, and females 12,007; showing that one fourth of the whole male population of the Territory was in excess of the female. On the 2d of June, 1866, the present year, the vote on adopting the constitution amounted in the aggregate to 7,776, and for Representative to 8,084. In October last the total vote was 9,136 at a full election, at a time of excitement, and when it is likely that as full a vote was polled as could be polled at any time within its limits.

These figures in regard to Nebraska prove that the population of that Territory at the time of the October election, all those who made up the total mass of people from whom voters were taken, could not have exceeded forty-five thousand, and the probability is that the number did not exceed some thirty-six or thirty-seven thousand. The Senate is told that there has been a brisk immigration into that Territory during the past summer and fall, during the six months within which the provision as to residence of voters applies. They must be at least six months in the Territory before they can vote. Sir, if you should make a liberal estimate of an immigration into the Territory of some two thousand families, say of five members each, or a total immigration that would be equivalent to that, you would only get some ten thousand additional inhabitants, and the introduction of that large number of persons into a Territory containing only thirty-five to forty thousand people would be a matter of general observation and of universal remark; it would be stated and held by all to be a very large increase of population. If, therefore, you should assume that there was within six months the large immigration of some ten thousand into that Territory, you would not get the total number above fifty thousand.

But it seems that some one connected with the Bureau of Statistics has written a letter addressed to gentlemen of Nebraska who are here, in which he expresses a general opinion that the population of that Territory is some eighty-odd thousand. Now, what has he to go upon? In the first place this is not an official paper; it does not pretend to be. There is no authenticity about it so far as the Senate is concerned. It is not a paper addressed to it, nor verified to it, nor one made up under any responsibility whatever. And, sir, in what way can men of the Bureau of Statistics know anything about the population of this Territory? They cannot certainly know it from a census, because there has been none taken. They cannot know it from an enumeration of taxables in the Territory, because there has been no such enumeration. In what manner then can they acquire information about it? I do not know any statistics there can be in the Treasury Department unless it be the returns of incomes; and to attempt to estimate population upon returns of that kind would be so absurd that I should suppose no man inside or outside the bureau would attempt it. If there be any information in the Treasury Department accessible to this officer of the Bureau of Statistics, or accessible to any one else, it must consist of responses to letters sent to United States officers in the Territory. Letters may have been addressed to the assessors or collectors in the Territory and their opinions obtained. I presume that this extravagant and manifestly untrue estimate must be predicated upon something of that description. I can conceive no other manner in which it could have been obtained.

The United States assessors in that Territory, if they were called upon, would be very apt to make a liberal estimate, especially if they participated in the feeling in favor of a new State which is felt by other gentlemen who are here from the Territory, and opinions from them not predicated upon an actual enumeration would be utterly worthless, would be so unreliable that any man might be thought destitute of good sense who should think of forming an opinion upon them. We, however, have the population of the Territory sufficiently established for all practical purposes in the statistics which I have presented, as we have also in the case of Colorado.

I say, then, that it is proposed here to admit Colorado into the Union as a State with a population not exceeding thirty thousand, and Nebraska as a State with a population not exceeding fifty thousand, while the ratio or number requisite for a member of Congress in all the old States, the settled portions of the country, is one hundred and twenty-seven thousand; and as a representative of three million people, who constitute the political community known as Pennsylvania, I am asked to give to seventy-five or eighty thousand people double the representation in this branch of Congress that is possessed by those three million, and to give them also three times the representation to which their numbers would entitle them in the House of Representatives. Sir, I cannot do it; and no member of this Senate or of this Congress ought to ask my State or its people to assent to so unreasonable a proposition.

We agreed when the Constitution of the United States was formed that our numbers should go for nothing in this body.

That was a feature of the compact among the thirteen members which were to compose the Union; but there was to be representation according to population in the other branch of Congress; and that principle that States shall be represented according to numbers in the House of Representatives is the only compensation which the large States received for the surrender of the principle of numerical representation in the Senate.

That representation in the House is invaded by these bills. It is not merely disproportionate representation in the Senate, it is not merely the equality of thirty thousand men of the mountains in Colorado in this Senate with three millions in the East; it is not the equality of fifty thousand upon the plains of Nebraska in this Senate with three millions in the East; but it is the representation of these Territories with eighty thousand population, in the House of Representatives as if they had two hundred and fifty-four thousand, or enough for two Representatives, according to the ratio under the existing act of Congress. It is, then, not senatorial inequality alone against which we object; it is representative inequality, also.

And, sir, what are the reasons which are to reconcile us to this injustice? Is there any complaint in the Territory of Nebraska of bad government? Does the Executive, appointed by the President and confirmed by this Senate, oppress its people? Are the judges sent there by our advice and consent corrupt or incompetent men? Is not property secure? Is not life secure? Is not justice administered fairly? There are no complaints; there is no reason for complaint. We are told in this debate that the Governor of this Territory is acceptable to its people; that he is in full accord and sympathy with them; in short, that there is no foundation for complaints by the people of the Territory or any part of them in regard to the existing government which has been instituted by Congress.

The Senator from Ohio who sits nearest me [Mr. SHERMAN] spoke about the expense of a territorial government. He is a member of the Finance Committee; he is looking after money matters with great care, and he wants the Territory admitted as a State to save the expense of a territorial government. In that connection let me give some facts in regard to another Territory. General Sherman, in his recent report of the 5th of November, speaking of the Territory of New Mexico, says:

"The whole Territory seems a pastoral land, but not fit for cultivation. The mines undeveloped are supposed to be very valuable, but as yet remain mostly in a state of nature. We have held this Territory since 1846, twenty years, at a cost to the national Treasury of full one hundred millions, and I doubt if it will ever reimburse to the country a tithe of that sum."

By the census of 1860 the population of New Mexico was 93,516. At present General Sherman says: "The entire population may be estimated at 100,000," and from other information which I have examined I suppose it to be somewhat more than that. Here is a Territory with a population of 100,000, a Territory very expensive to us, and where, if you need relief from the burdens of a territorial government, you should apply an enabling act and organize a State government and get rid of some portion of the burden, at least the burden of the administration of civil affairs.

Mr. WADE. Will the Senator allow me to make a suggestion on that point?

Mr. BUCKALEW. Certainly.

Mr. WADE. I believe it is not usual for us to commence to bring Territories into the Union. As long as their people are content with their territorial condition and do not apply to be admitted, I do not think we take the initiative. But then the people of New Mexico are an unprogressive people; that Territory has been a great while inhabited, long before Nebraska was ever heard of as a Territory, and most of the people are Spanish. It does not fill up very rapidly. I do not suppose it has many more inhabitants now than it had thirty years ago. The simple answer to the suggestion, however, is that they have not applied to be admitted.

Mr. BUCKALEW. The Senator has forgotten that I alluded to the fact that there was no formal application by these Territories for which he reported enabling acts in 1864.

Mr. WADE. There were petitions; and their Delegates urged it upon us over and over again in regard to both these Territories.

Mr. BUCKALEW. If the Senator will look back to the Congressional Globe, to his own declaration, he will see that he is mistaken. The facts that he now alleges may have existed in the case of one of them, but did not in the case of the others. There were public reasons which in the opinion of the Senator justified that legislation, and therefore he introduced it. It was not the demand of the people; it was not the clamor of a border population that moved him; it was considerations of public policy in this Government.

Upon the debate on the Nebraska enabling act, April 12, 1864, the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. FOSTER] inquired whether the people of the Territory had asked to be admitted as a State, and argued that the Senate should be satisfied that a majority of the people desired it. To this the Senator from Ohio [Mr. WADE] answered, that the people of the Territory had a Delegate in the House of Representatives who, he supposed, fairly represented their will and their wishes. That the Delegate ought to know whether the people wanted it or not; that he had no doubt the Delegate "fairly represented the people there; but whether he did or not the bill only presented to the people the opportunity of taking upon themselves a State government, if they saw fit to do so. If they did not want a State government they were not obliged to have it." The conclusion then, is clear, from this debate in the Globe, that there was no formal application before the Senate by petition, memorial, or otherwise for the passage of the enabling act. The Senator from Ohio put the question entirely upon the advocacy of the measure by the Delegate from the Territory in the House.

Here, then, is the case of New Mexico with a population of 100,000. To be sure these people are Mexicans; but are they not citizens? Is there not to be equality among citizens in this country? Have we not heard that doctrine expounded and warmly insisted upon very recently even in this Chamber? We acquired these inhabitants, or most of them, by the treaty of peace at the conclusion of the Mexican war, the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, and these inhabitants thus acquired, and who became our fellow-citizens, are entitled to precisely the same right and the same favor as any other population in any Territory in the United States.

Then, sir, I insist that the argument is decisive against the passage of the present bill; that not only is this population inadequate, not only were all the statements made to Congress on the subject of population in 1864 unjustifiable, proved to have been unfounded, grossly erroneous, but you find that there are other Territories exceeding this in population as to whom no such measure as the present is proposed in Congress. Here is Utah; I do not know what the population of that Territory is; I am told by one of the Senators from Kansas that it is about 120,000. Certainly those people, or their territorial authorities in behalf of them, have applied to Congress for admission into the Union. I am not in favor of the admission of Utah as a member of the Union; I am not in favor of the admission of New Mexico with her 100,000 people as a member of the Union any more than I am in favor of the admission of a Territory with 50,000 or with 30,000 inhabitants; but for very shame's sake you must deal equally with the Territories. If you admit these with a population of limited numbers, low down in the scale, how can you justify your legislation before the people of the country as well as the people of the Territories upon the ground of equality and even-handed justice? You deny Utah membership in the Union: your denial perhaps is prudent and reasonable and just, but when you admit a Territory with 30,000, one third or one fourth her numbers, how can you say no to her?

Mr. President, I have concluded what I proposed to say on the subject of this bill. I have spoken because I felt charged upon me the duty of discussing it. I regard it as the pioneer of a series of bills which are likely to come up for consideration in the Senate during the present and future sessions, and upon which sound opinions must be formed and maintained if representation in this Government by the several States is to stand upon a just and satisfactory foundation.

Mr. SPRAGUE. Mr. President, I who in part represent one of the smallest States of the American Union look on with great complacency when I witness Territory after Territory formed into States, having the consent of a majority, and with the approbation of all the States here represented; and the Senators who are thus introduced into this body seldom represent one half of the population of the smallest State. My friend, the distinguished Senator from Indiana, [Mr. HENDRICKS,] seldom rises in his seat except to complain that the six New England States, with a population less than either New York or Pennsylvania, have a representation here of twelve members, while each of those States has but two. The exact words in the Constitution that compel obedience to this state of things are as follows:

"ARTICLE V.—No State without its own consent shall be deprived of its equal suffrage in the Senate."

You complain of this provision when you practice it daily. Would Indiana be a State to-day if the thirteen original States had been governed by the spirit that emanates from the Senator? Certainly not. The six New England States joined with the smallest middle State would have kept her a colony and a dependency. Would the great West have resisted? Taught dependence, they would have been less likely; but the power that could triumph over that of Great Britain might have been able to have sustained themselves against any adversary.

The liberality with which the men of the Northeast, and those of the smaller States, have ever treated this subject, fills all fair-minded men with profound admiration.

These men surrendered political power and prospective wealth to their people to advance the principles of free government, and thus became the founders of the present greatness of the country—honor sufficient to satisfy the most extended ambition. What do you gain by enlarging the representation here? No measure can prevail without having the consent of the representatives of the people in the other House. Do you want more than this? Do you ask greater influence? States or sections, as such, have influence here when advocating ideas. There are very few State interests, or the interests of a section, which have real merit, that do not prevail now. Under an enlarged representation would they more than prevail? Would you agree better? I have been here long enough to see that it is confidence in the integrity, in the fairness, in the justice of members that carry measures, not because those members represent small or large States, larger or smaller sections.

Would you build up your State upon principles hostile to the justice, to the honesty, to the fairness of your respective measures? Could you succeed better than you now do in advancing measures so based if you had increased representation? I think not. Numbers would rightfully confuse your councils. While great States combine to destroy small ones they may live upon terms of amity, but when the division has once been entered into, what next! Have we not witnessed but yesterday convulsion and redivision growing out of the very best system of robbery and plunder? Study the causes and effect of the recent conflict in Europe. Did the greater State obtain advantages from its past record of robbery and plunder? Suppose that you of the large States should resolve to violate the compacts of the Constitution, treat with profound illiberality the expansive ideas of the men of the Northeast, how long would you be content with the advantage you had gained? Having obtained influence you would absorb territory. Thus would be reenacted a coalition, established in injustice, that would be disastrous to those who formed it, equally so toward those who were the subjects of it. Exhausted and beaten by the conflicts you would, after having stayed the wheels of progress and shown your incompetency and your unfitness for the enjoyment of a government based upon justice and the rights of man, gladly resume the status quo of our own time. Such has been the history of the grasping ambition of large constituencies when dealing with smaller ones, when the smaller have been forced into giving up ancient privileges. How much more so when those privileges have been the safeguards of your prosperity and your progress.

Again, before this last step has been taken, before you have inaugurated this war and revolution—for it is only by war and through revolution you can ever arrive at the point at which you aim—you must have a contest with all the smaller States, with every new State with a small population, and with those of the American people who desire to develop our western wilderness into American States, and with all those who comprehend the greatness of their country and understand the simplest principles upon which that greatness has been established; formidable forces, it must be admitted. I therefore see additional guarantees for the perpetuity of State sovereignty and the peace of the country by increasing the number of States that are to constitute the American Union. I have no fear for the future, because that future has for its leading object the virtue, the independence, and the progress of the mass of the people. A branch of the Government that holds on to that which is gained for these objects, and does not lose hold of them in a too eager reach after greater progress before the people are educated to enjoy it, will not be inconsiderately treated in the future.

You would excite the fears of the smaller States! Why? The revolution has indeed renewed our ideas. We do believe something has come to pass besides a sacrifice of life and property, and that something else has been developed in the struggle for free principles over those that are slave. For this we are told that our natural interests will be warred against; that you will destroy our property through a policy that is destructive to our prosperity. Our prosperity is identical with that of the country, and when you strike at ours you injure your own, and you strike at country and all that has made that country glorious. If, however, to the contrary, why continue to believe our principles are to be found only in our pockets? Was that charge, so often made before the war, proven when the flag of our country, the emblem of freedom, justice, and prosperity, was dragged in the dust and when the blood of its defenders covered it? Did those States, now the subject of hostile wordy attack, falter? From whence came the first sinews of war? From whence came money and property? The lavishness of their gifts was equalled only by the willingness with which they shed their blood. The people of those States will continue to shed their blood, and they will sacrifice their property if the ignorance, the envy, or the ambition of men compel it; and also all the rights they have to a fair recognition of Government—ay, Government itself, if it must be so—to defend the principles for which our Government was established. We ask nothing for ourselves that may not be enjoyed by others. We demand only that every man under the Government shall have the rights enjoyed by us. Such is our crime. Banish then from these Halls those revolutionary harangues so near akin to those repeated here prior to the revolution. Do not encourage a spirit you do not believe; for while it may furnish food for reflection that is profitable to all, it does not find a response in the heart of any lover of his country, of liberty, or of justice.

In a comparative manner I have endeavored to treat the subject of representation in the Senate, and I point to the grand results that have come from that representation. I do not treat of the reasons that induced the actors from the first revolution to enact that compact. The advancing power of the nation and of the States sufficiently attest their wisdom, and those of our own time, whose coöperation is recorded, will in the future share in that wisdom. We are now approaching the second step contemplated in the previous remarks made by me upon the District suffrage bill. By an immortal act of the people the control of the person of one individual by another has ceased forever. No one, I think, is at a loss to understand as to who is an American citizen. And the question is: shall Congress recognize as a State of the Union the Territory of Nebraska, having a constitution that does not recognize a class of American citizens on account of their color.

Congress has exclusive control over the Territories and the individuals thereof. Congress is therefore bound to exercise jurisdiction over every citizen in a Territory. Congress can constitute every citizen an elector or withhold that privilege; but by the latter act Congress cannot free itself from the responsibility of exercising jurisdiction over him. By recognizing Nebraska as a State, with its present constitution, the Government of the United States surrenders, so far as it can, all control of the individual to the State. Thus those individuals that are not recognized by the State lose the protection and control of the Government of the United States and are not recognized by the government of the State. A class of people are thus deprived of all government. Have these people been guilty of any crime that they should not have that which they would have among Indians on your plains; ay, among the half-civilized and barbarous tribes in Africa? In all my reading and experience I have never heard of any one ever having been born over whom a Government did not have jurisdiction. The men whom it is proposed to exclude from government in Nebraska now have an all-powerful Government in the United States. Soon they will be far poorer in this regard than the native Indian or African. Our civilization, the sympathy or interest of the people of Nebraska may, it is true, protect him, and that which he is entitled to by right may be extended to him in charity. The Government of the United States, being bound to exert its whole power for his protection, surrenders him over to the charities of a people who refuse to recognize him. I doubt the ability or the right of any Government thus to free itself from its responsibilities.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, I wish to say something on the passage of this bill, but

I know that at this present hour, four o'clock, it is utterly impossible to attract the attention of the Senate to any remarks I may make. We have reached the usual hour of adjournment, and I presume the debate will not be further continued to-day. In this discussion most grave fundamental principles which underlie our whole system of government have been invoked. It was not my intention to say one word on the passage of this bill, but I have sat here and heard propositions advanced and opinions advocated in such utter contravention of the principles of the founders of our Government that I think I ought to claim the privilege of saying something on the final passage of this bill. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. GRIMES. I suggest that we have an executive session.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I withdraw my motion for that purpose.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I desire to submit an amendment which I shall hereafter propose to the amendment of the Senator from Missouri to the bill before the Senate. I ask leave to present it that it may be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The proposed amendment will be received informally and ordered to be printed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. GRIMES. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and after some time spent in executive session, the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned—the adjournment being under a resolution of the two Houses to Thursday, January 3, 1867.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, December 20, 1866.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. B. BOYNTON.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. SPALDING. I ask leave to make a personal explanation.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. SPALDING. Mr. Speaker, the acknowledged organ of the Republican party in Congress (the Daily Morning Chronicle) in its issue of December 19, has seen fit to distinguish me by placing my name at the head of one of its most significant editorials, which I send to the Clerk's table, and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

"MR. SPALDING'S RESOLUTION.—There are some Republican journals which desire still further efforts to induce the southern Legislatures to ratify the constitutional amendment, before resorting to the territorial plan of reconstruction. Among them is the Albany Evening Journal, which, in an article published on Saturday, has the following:

"Let Mr. SPALDING'S resolution be adopted, declaring that upon the adoption of the amendment by any State its loyal representatives will be considered, as in the case of Tennessee, entitled to immediate admission. Make this last tender of the olive branch to the South. Afford a reasonable time for the minds of people to act upon it; and if the rebel leaders still prove potent and powerful, if the refusal to indorse the amendment is persisted in, as if no doubt will be, then proceed to declare the existing governments illegal and unconstitutional, and organize others upon a loyal basis."

"The Journal appears wholly unconscious of the glaring inconsistency contained in this proposition. If Congress proceeds to declare the existing governments illegal and unconstitutional, it will do so on the supposition that they are so in fact. But if they are, they have no right to act upon the adoption of amendments to the Constitution. The very act of submitting the amendments to them, as above proposed, would be a direct admission of their legality. Would the Journal have Congress stultify itself by making this admission and then following it by a declaration that they are 'illegal and unconstitutional'? Heretofore their existence as States has not been distinctly recognized by any deliberate act. In directing the submission of the amendment to the States, there was nothing to show whether the term was designed to include the 'States lately in rebellion,' and the action of the Secretary of State in transmitting it to them, was merely an indication of his own opinion on the subject. The ratification of the amendment by Tennessee previous to her admission was considered more with reference to the evidence of a loyal disposition thereby afforded, than to its validity as a legislative act, and if the territorial theory be adopted, it cannot be counted among the States on whose ratification the adoption of the amendment will depend. It may be that some of the past legislation of Congress has inadvertently ignored the actual condition of the South; but if the true theory is to be fully accepted, our business now is rather to undo anything inconsistent therewith, which may have been already done, than to anticipate such acceptance by the deliberate stultification recommended by Mr. SPALDING and the Journal."

Mr. SPALDING. Sir, the honor of placing before this House the resolution ascribed to me in this article has not yet devolved upon me. The only resolution that I have offered upon the subject was one of inquiry, which was referred on the 10th instant to the joint committee on reconstruction, and reads as follows:

"Resolved, That the committee on reconstruction be requested to inquire into the expediency of passing a joint resolution declaratory of the purposes of Congress in the reception of Senators and Representatives from the rebellious States, respectively, upon the ratification by them of the constitutional amendment and the establishment of republican forms of government not inconsistent with the Constitution of the United States."

If by this measure I recommend to Congress "deliberate stultification," my perceptions are so obtuse that "I cannot see it."

While I am on this subject, however, I desire to state for the information of the editor, as well as others who may feel an interest in my opinions, that I adhere to the constitutional amendment in all its parts; and advise its adoption as a measure of conciliation and security by all the States, so-called, whether represented in Congress or otherwise.

If ratified by three fourths of the States represented in Congress it will, in my judgment, become a part of the Constitution. Of this I have no reasonable doubt. Yet I would have the late confederate States, by their supposed legislative bodies, ratify this amendment as evidence of their submission and loyalty, before I would vote to receive Representatives from one of them; and I should further require that their State governments should be submitted to the approval of Congress.

I do not believe that the approval or disapproval of the amendment by the ten outstanding communities, or any of them, will affect the constitutional ratification of the same in the least degree.

I will state a strong case to show the strength of my belief: if it were possible for the amendment to receive three fourths of the States, commonly called the loyal States, less one, and at the same time enough of the so-called disloyal States to make the gross amount three fourths of the whole number, loyal and disloyal, I should not regard the amendment as a part of the Constitution without some act of Congress recognizing the disloyal States, thus voting as in harmony with the loyal States under the Constitution.

It must not be understood that I concur with the astute editor, in reducing the State of Tennessee to a cipher in the foregoing computation, as she has satisfactorily passed the ordeal.

I hope, Mr. Speaker, that I have made myself understood. I want the constitutional amendment adopted; and so do the people whom I represent. I want the outstanding States restored to the Union, after they shall have given sufficient guarantees for their truth and fidelity hereafter; and so do the people whom I represent.

It may become necessary, ere long, to place those revolted States in the condition of Territories. If that necessity shall be made apparent I shall not flinch from the work, though I would fain save the country from so great a strain upon its institutions of government.

PRINTING OF BILLS, ETC.

On motion of Mr. HOLMES, the following bills before the Committee on Public Lands, were ordered to be printed, together with the amendments proposed by the committee:

A bill (H. R. No. 304) granting land to the Iowa and Missouri State Line railroad, and for other purposes; and

A bill (S. No. 336) granting lands to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph from the Columbia river to Salt Lake City.

On motion of Mr. McRUER, the same order was made in regard to the following bills:

A bill (S. No. 133) granting lands to aid in the construction of railroad and telegraph line from the waters of the bay of San Francisco to Humboldt bay, in the State of California; and

A bill (H. R. No. 878) to quiet titles in the town of Santa Clara, in the State of California.

On motion of Mr. HENDERSON, the same order was made with regard to House bill No. 908, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate the time and manner of holding elections for Senators in Congress," approved July 25, 1866.

PRIVILEGES OF A MEMBER.

Mr. WILLIAMS, from the Committee on the Judiciary, by unanimous consent, submitted the following report in relation to the imprisonment of Hon. CHARLES V. CULVER:

The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the following resolution, to wit:

Whereas it is alleged that CHARLES V. CULVER, of Pennsylvania, a member of this Congress, is detained from his seat in this House under arrest in violation of the provisions of the sixth section of the first article of the Constitution and of the privileges of this House: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary is hereby instructed with all practicable dispatch to inquire into the circumstances of the case and report the same to this House, and to report to this House whether any breach of its privileges has been committed, and what action should be had thereupon; that the said committee have power to send for persons and papers, to sit during the sessions of the House, and to report by bill or otherwise at any time.

Respectfully report—

That they have taken prompt measures, as directed by the House, to ascertain the facts of the case by bringing the sheriff and jailor of the proper county along with Hon. CHARLES V. CULVER himself, and the commitment and other records bearing on the question of his arrest and detention as a prisoner, before them:

That the result of their inquiries is that the said CULVER, a member of this House representing the twentieth congressional district of Pennsylvania, was arrested in the month of June last, and during the actual session of Congress, at his home in Venango county in that State, by virtue of a warrant issuing out of the court of common pleas of that county, under an act of the General Assembly of Pennsylvania, passed on the 12th day of July, 1842, upon an affidavit filed by a certain James S. Myers as the plaintiff in an action of assumpsit instituted against the said CULVER upon a contract for the return of certain bonds and notes alleged to have been lent to him, charging that the debt incurred thereby was fraudulently contracted by said CULVER; and that upon a hearing before the then acting judge of said county he was committed in default of the required security to the jail of said county, where he has been since that time imprisoned until the 18th instant, and under which commitment only, whereof a copy is hereto annexed, he still continues to be held.

The next point of inquiry under the order of the House was, whether upon this state of facts any breach has been committed of the privileges of this House in the arrest and detention of one of its members.

The sixth section of the first article of the Constitution of the United States provides, inter alia, that the Senators and Representatives "shall in all cases, except treason, felony, and breach of the peace, be privileged from arrest during their attendance at the session of their respective Houses, and in going to and returning from the same."

This privilege, which is borrowed from the law and custom of Parliament, is of such high antiquity in England as to be absolutely lost in the night of time, and to stand therefore rather upon prescription, as claimed by the Commons, in the 17th of Edward IV, than on any positive law, although recognized in statutes as old as the reign of Ethelbert, and Edward the Confessor, and Canute. Its importance to the freedom and usefulness of a Legislative Assembly are abundantly vindicated in its remote origin and its long and uninterrupted descent to the present time.

The exceptions, moreover, in cases of treason, felony, and breach of the peace, are identical in substance and almost identical in language with those which have been always recognized in England, and have accordingly been limited in practice to cases strictly criminal, for the reason stated by the Commons in a conference with the Lords on the 17th of August, 1641, that "privilege of Parliament is granted in regard of the service of the Commonwealth, and is not to be used to the danger of the Commonwealth." And it is accordingly said by Hatsell that there is not a single instance of a member's claiming the privilege of Parliament to withdraw himself from the criminal law of the land.—Page 206.

With these exceptions, however, it is not to be controverted that the privilege of Parliament may be successfully invoked to protect the person of the member in every case where he may be placed under arrest; and so important are these privileges said to be that they cannot be waived, and no man is allowed to plead ignorance of the persons of those who are entitled to them. (Cushing on Legislative Assemblies, 224.) In Wellesby's case (2 Russell and Mylne, 666) it was declared by the Lord Chancellor to be the plain, obvious, and intelligible rule "that with respect to everything which is in its nature criminal, privilege of Parliament is no protection; but with respect to everything in the nature of civil process, whatever may be the technical and outward form of that process, such privilege will inure to protect the party." And it is elsewhere laid down that "in regard to civil process—that is proceedings instituted for the enforcement of a civil right—no doubt privilege protects, whether the process be original, mesne, or final, and whether the proceeding be by action at the suit of an individual, or information or other process at the suit of the public."

Taking the rule, then, as stated here upon the highest authority, to be the correct one, it is very clear to your committee that the arrest made in the present case does not fall within any of the exceptions specified in the Constitution. The case out of which it arises is a civil suit for the recovery of damages in an action sounding in contract. The process issued is but a warrant, authorized by an act of Assembly abolishing imprisonment for debt in cases where fraud is charged as an ingredient in the contract, and its effect is only to require the defendant to pay or secure the debt, or give security not to remove or dispose of his property in fraud of his creditor, or that he will apply within thirty days for the benefit of the insolvent laws of the State. It is therefore in every view but mesne or interlocutory process, auxiliary to the main object, which is the collection of a debt, or, perhaps, more properly speaking, the recovery of damages for a breach of contract. It is indeed no more in substance than a substitute for the capias ad respondendum in cases where the old remedy was intended to be preserved. And this is precisely the construction which it has received from the supreme court of Pennsylvania in two several cases in which they have declared it to be "but simply an arrest for debt"—"a process to hold to bail"—in an action ex contractu—"collateral and in aid" of it without the features of a summary conviction—that the fraud imputed is but a private injury which modifies the ordinary private remedy, and that the act which authorizes it is nowise penal, nor the proceeding itself a criminal one. (Goshin vs. Place, 8 Casey, 320; Berger vs. Small, 3 Wright, 315.) Unless, therefore, there was something in the time and place of the arrest to take the case out of the protection of the Constitution the arrest and detention were manifestly irregular.

By the terms of that instrument the privilege of members is limited to the time of their attendance at the sessions of their respective Houses, and in going to and returning from the same; and it is conceded that Mr. CULVER was neither in actual attendance here, nor going to or returning from the seat of Government, at the time when he was arrested. But these words are entitled to, and have always received a liberal construction for the benefit of the people, who are the parties interested in the attendance of the member, and the unembarrassed performance of his duties. Indeed, the Parliament itself, which is the sole judge, as it is the jealous guardian, of its own laws and customs and privileges, has been always careful to avoid any precise definition of those privileges, lest it might result in an abridgment of them in the future. Thus, in regard to the time allowed for going and returning, although it has been generally considered to extend to forty days in either case, they have refused to determine any more than that it shall be a convenient one. There is no question here, however, as to the duration of the privilege. The arrest was made during the last session of Congress, and the detention continues during the present one. Whether he was actually here or not when arrested, or whether it was his intention to be in his seat at the present session, can make no difference. It is his duty to be here, as it is the right of Congress and his constituents that he should be, and his power to perform that duty is not to be abridged because he might choose to neglect it. Cushing remarks that the personal privileges of members continue in full force notwithstanding their absence either with or without leave of the Assembly, in the same manner and to the same extent as if they were present; for otherwise it would be in the power of a member by his own act or fault to oust the Assembly of its right to his attendance and services. (226.) And this is reason. It is no answer, therefore, to the charge of a violation of his immunities, that he was not in actual attendance at the session of the House at the time of his arrest.

But if it were even true that he was without a privilege, which it is settled that he could not waive without leave, (3 Gray, 140, 222,) and therefore lawfully arrested during the session of the House, because he happened to be at home, it would not authorize his detention now. It is unquestionable law that a member arrested and imprisoned on civil process during vacation, or at any other time, when not entitled to assert his privilege, is entitled to his discharge from such arrest and imprisonment on the assembling of the body to which he belongs, and the records of Parliament abound with cases where the privilege has been allowed although the member was in custody before he was returned.

It being, then, the conclusion of your committee that, upon the facts shown, and the law as applicable to them, the case referred involve a clear breach of the privileges of the House, the next and only remaining question is, what action is to be taken thereon, or in what manner and by what process are the rights and privileges of this body to be vindicated.

On this point there is no difficulty. In early times it was the practice of Parliament, in cases of arrest on mesne process, to direct the Speaker to issue his warrant for a writ of supersedeas or privilege, or a writ of habeas corpus, returnable before the Parliament itself. During the reign of James I the usage prevailed for the Speaker to write letters to the judges to stay proceedings, and sometimes to send his warrant to the parties themselves, who, with their attorneys who commenced the action, were brought by the Sergeant to the bar of the House, (May, 136,) but the Court of King's Bench in the time of Charles I declared that it was against the oaths of the judges to stay judgment in any case, and the practice was discontinued. In 1625, however, the Commons declared that "the House hath power whenever they see cause to send the Sergeant immediately to deliver a prisoner," and accordingly writs of privilege have ceased to be used, and the practice of releasing the prisoners directly by warrant or by sending the black rod or the Sergeant in the name of the House to demand them, has been continually adopted. (May, 115.) In 1707 the Sergeant was sent with the mace, as his symbol of authority, to the warden of the Fleet, who readily paid obedience to the orders of the House, and discharged Mr. Agill, a member then in execution; and Peers and Peeresses, as well as members of Parliament, are now discharged directly by order or warrant, and the parties who caused the arrest some times visited with censure and punishment. The general course, however, in modern times, is to make an order of discharge, and to signify the same, properly authenticated by the clerk, to the parties who have the custody of the prisoner, and who, upon their refusal to obey, may be proceeded against as for contempt; and this is suggested by an American author as perhaps the only appropriate remedy here. (Cushing, 227.) Your committee can see no reason, however, for the issue of an order to which no answer can be received but absolute obedience, where in case of contumacy an attachment for contempt would only result in the punishment of the delinquent, without effecting the object aimed at, which might at any rate eventually require a direct exertion of the powers of the House upon the person of the prisoner. They would therefore advise the more summary, simple, and complete, and less circuitous remedy of immediate deliverance by the hands of its own officer, and they accordingly recommend the passage of the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Speaker be directed to issue his warrant to the Sergeant-at-Arms, commanding him to deliver forthwith the Hon. CHARLES V. CULVER, a member of this House, detained, as it appears, under mesne process issuing out of the court of common pleas of Venango county, in the State of Pennsylvania, in a civil suit instituted therein, at the instance of a certain James S. Myers, from the custody of the sheriff and jailor of said county, or any other person or persons presuming to hold and detain the said CULVER by virtue of such process, wherever he may be found—a copy of the said warrant duly authenticated by the Clerk of this House being first delivered to the party or parties in whose custody he may be—and to make return to this House of the said warrant, along with the manner in which he may have executed the same.

VENANGO COUNTY, &c.

The Commonwealth of Pennsylvania to the Sheriff and Jailor of the county of Venango, greeting:

Whereas a suit has been brought by James S. Myers against C. V. CULVER, in the court of common pleas of said county, which is now pending therein; and whereas the said James S., on the 12th of June, 1866, made complaint under oath setting forth that the debt was fraudulently contracted by the said C. V. CULVER, whereupon a warrant was issued for the arrest of the said C. V. CULVER, who was brought before Hon. Isaac G. Gordon, president of the twentieth judicial district of Pennsylvania, by whom the said warrant was issued for a hearing on the 27th day of June instant, when the parties offered evidence in part, and the hearing was continued over until the 28th of June instant, when, after hearing the evidence and counsel for the defendant, it was, upon due consideration of the case by the said judge, considered and determined by him that the allegations of the complainant are substantiated, and that the said C. V. CULVER did fraudulently contract the debt for which the said suit is brought, therefore you are hereby commanded to take the said C. V. CULVER and commit him to the common jail of the said county of Venango, and there detain him until he shall be discharged by law.

Witness the hand and seal of the said judge of Franklin this 28th day of June, A. D. 1866.

ISAAC G. GORDON,

Presiding Judge.

A true copy of the original mittimus produced by Cyrus S. Mark, jailor of Venango county, Pennsylvania, and referred to in his examination before the Judiciary Committee.

Attest: E. G. BOWDOIN,

Clerk of the Judiciary Committee.

The resolution reported by the Judiciary Committee was unanimously agreed to.

PAYMENT OF CLAIMS.

Mr. DELANO. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to offer the following resolution, which I hope will give rise to no debate:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, &c., That until otherwise ordered, it shall be unlawful for any officer of the United States Government to pay any account, claim, or demand against the said Government which accrued or existed prior to the 13th day of April, 1861, in favor of any person who promoted, encouraged, or in any manner sustained the late rebellion; or in favor of any person who during the said rebellion was not known to be opposed thereto, and distinctly in favor of its suppression, and no pardon heretofore granted or hereafter to be granted shall authorize the payment of such account, claim, or demand, until this resolution is modified or repealed.

No objection was made to the introduction of the resolution.

Mr. STEVENS. Is that a joint resolution?

Mr. DELANO. It is, and I ask its passage now.

The joint resolution received its first and second readings, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. DELANO moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

FREE SCHOOLS IN DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. Speaker, had I got the floor at the time when the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SPALDING] sat down, I had intended, perhaps irregularly, to have said one word in regard to his position. I will only now say, however, that I think the argument of the editor is altogether the better of the two and perfectly conclusive; and that while I do not charge the gentleman to be the author of it, the doctrine implied in his resolution is the most pernicious which can possibly be brought to obstruct the final reconstruction of this Government. But I am not going into the argument as it might look out of place after the gentleman has left the floor. I have only thought it proper to say this much in favor of the argument of one who cannot appear here himself, and which I deem conclusive and entirely more satisfactory than that of the gentleman from Ohio. I now ask leave to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That a committee of seven be appointed to report a bill to establish a system of free common schools for the District of Columbia from which no child over the age of six years, residing in said District, shall be excluded except for improper conduct. The schools to be supported by taxes impartially levied on the assessable property of the District, together with such fixed annual appropriation as Congress shall grant.

No objection being made, the resolution was received and agreed to.

SURVEYS OF WESTERN RIVERS.

Mr. DONNELLY, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be requested to communicate to this House the report of Major General Warren of the surveys made during the past season under his supervision of the upper Mississippi river and its tributaries, including the Minnesota, Cannon, and Zumbro rivers with a view to the improvement of the navigation of the same.

WILLIAM P. WINGATE.

Mr. MORRILL. I ask leave to report back from the Committee of Ways and Means a joint resolution which passed the Senate last session in relation to the settlement of the accounts of William P. Wingate, collector of the port of Bangor, Maine.

The joint resolution was read. It provides that, whereas certain goods (molasses and salt) were imported by certain parties and held in bond in the custom-house at Bangor, Maine, on the 2d day of May, 1864, and were on that day released and withdrawn upon the payment of the duties imposed therein prior to the enactment of the joint resolution of April 29, 1864, the collector not then having received official notice of such enactment, and whereas the said collector is now charged with fifty per cent. additional to the amount already paid upon the said goods, the Secretary of the Treasury shall in the settlement of the accounts of said William P. Wingate, not exact from him payment of the additional duty of fifty per cent. imposed by the joint resolution of April 29, 1864, on the merchandise thus withdrawn from consumption by the parties named on the 2d day of May, 1864, and shall order the cancelling of the several bonds given by the importers.

Mr. STEVENS. I do not fully understand this joint resolution, and therefore I think we had better, according to the understanding, go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the President's annual message; and I make that motion.

Mr. MORRILL. I hope the gentleman will let me explain this joint resolution. It ought to pass.

Mr. STEVENS. I think we had better go into committee.

Mr. MORRILL. I hope the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] will withdraw his motion until this joint resolution shall have been disposed of. I think there can be no objection to it.

Mr. STEVENS. I will withdraw the motion for that purpose.

The joint resolution was then read the third time and passed.

MARINE HOSPITAL AT CHICAGO.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury in reply to a resolution of the House of the 17th instant, in regard to a site for a marine hospital at Chicago.

Mr. WENTWORTH. I move that the communication be printed and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

ESTIMATES OF POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a communication from the Postmaster General, submitting estimates of appropriations for the year ending June 30, 1868, in compliance with the act of July 2, 1836; which was referred to the Committee of Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

Mr. STEVENS moved that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union and proceed to the consideration of the President's annual message.

The motion was agreed to.

So the rules were suspended; and the House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. WELKER in the chair,) and proceeded to the consideration of the President's annual message, on which Mr. HISE was entitled to the floor.

Mr. HISE. Mr. Chairman, before I resume my argument, I beg leave to make a few suggestions for the benefit of the reporters. The report which has already been made of my remarks on Monday last, is incorrect in a few unimportant particulars. For instance, I used the name "Pinckney" in the plural, "Pinckneys;" for there were two Pinckneys in the Federal Convention from South Carolina, and in speaking of the representation in that convention from Georgia, I used the word "Few" instead of the word "Fee." I did not say as reported, that I did not desire to be elected, but that I did not seek or desire the nomination. In other places conjunctions have been inserted which were not used by me, and occasionally some few words have been omitted which I did use. However, I have no reason to complain of the report, for it is generally correct.

I would also remark for the benefit of the reporters, that the ripest scholar in belles-lettres and philology, in the heat and haste of extemporaneous debate, may and will commit errors and blunders, both in style and grammar. If I should do so, it would not be intentional, and I hope that such a report may be made of my remarks to-day as not to convict me of such blunders.

Mr. Chairman, when I closed my remarks on Monday last, I was discussing the theoretical views of the two political schools of this country, which had their origin, as I then remarked, at the time of the origin of the Government. I endeavored briefly to define the principles of the school to which I belong, in which I have been educated, and which all my subsequent reading and experience have confirmed in my mind, as the only true and correct theory of our Government. This Government I assumed to be a Government exclusively of States; that it can be only a Government of States, and that the Government provided by the Constitution for States cannot legitimately govern anything but States.

I deny the right of the Government of the United States, through all its departments and by all its governmental machinery, under the Constitution of the United States, legitimately to govern any people, to rule and control by laws or the execution of laws, any people living outside of the boundaries and territory of the States in the Union, or such as may thereafter be admitted into the Union. At the same time that I plant myself impregably as I have done upon that position, I admit that in progress of time, even very early in the history of our Government, the United States being the grantee of large bodies of lands and territory unsettled, except perhaps by hostile tribes of Indians, when those lands began to be occupied, settled upon, and owned and possessed by large bodies of people, the Congress of the United States did assume the power of instituting and providing territorial governments for the people inhabiting the public domain. The title to these lands had been acquired first by deeds of cession from the various States, and also by treaties with foreign Powers, as in the case of Florida and Louisiana. That power, thus originally usurped, according to my deliberate judgment and opinion, has been practiced upon, and there has been a continuous exercise of that power from the time the first territorial government was made, which I think was in what is now the State of Ohio.

It is not a matter material with reference to the argument which was the first. The power has been exercised repeatedly from that day to this, the Congress of the United States assuming and exercising first, the power of instituting absolute governments for those people. It provided fundamental laws for them, fixing and regulating therein the mode and manner of their government, usually, I believe, retaining in the hands of the executive government of the United States the power of appointment of their executive and judicial officers, and retaining in Congress the authority to revise and repeal their local territorial legislation.

The Government of the United States usually supported the territorial government, paying the Governor and the other executive officers, and also paying the judges, appeals being allowed from the decisions of the territorial courts to the United States Supreme Court; as the laws of the territorial Legislature were subjected to the revision of the Congress of the United States.

Now, I say that this exercise of power by the Government of the United States was originally, in my opinion, usurped without authority. This has been denied, however, by the latitudinarian school of politicians, who claim that this Government is a popular Government, who insist that its powers are only limited and controlled by the extent of its ability to carry its acts into effect by majorities. Where do they find the warrant for the exercise of this power? I have not known any public man of much character, any man having much respect for his reputation, to hazard an opinion that this power is derived from any other source than that provision of the Constitution which declares that Congress shall have power "to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory and other property belonging to the United States." I repeat, that I have no recollection of any public man of much repute in this country, any man who has occupied high public station, either in the judicial or legislative department of the Federal Government, that has contended that this power can be derived from any other source than the provision of the Constitution to which I have referred.

The interpretation thus given is, in my judgment, totally unauthorized. The fatal error of that interpretation is made manifest by the use of two phrases in the provision referred to: first, the phrase "dispose of," and second, the phrase "other property." The language, in my view, furnishes under all reasonable rules of interpretation the most convincing ground for the inference that the authority granted under that clause was intended to reach no further than to give to the Congress of the United States the authority to dispose of their property, real, personal, and mixed, and to make all the rules and regulations necessary for the purpose of bringing it into market, keeping it, owning it, and disposing of it. The word "territory" used in that clause of the Constitution is used in the sense of property held by the United States, real property, not personal; and immediately in connection with the term "territory" occurs the phrase "other property belonging to the United States."

Now, I elaborate this point, not for the purpose of combating or changing the uniform practice of the Government, if I had the power or influence to do so, in regard to the organization of governments for the Territories—I mean for the people inhabiting or occupying the public domain. Let that matter pass. Such legislation had its origin in usurpation, without constitutional authority. But it has grown into precedent by repeated practice, and let it stand. But this does not deprive me and the men of my political school of the right still to contend and show from the character of our Government and institutions that the Government of the United States is legitimately, under the Federal Constitution, a Commonwealth of States and States alone; that its governmental authority has but this extent and is thus necessarily limited.

Now, when I gain this point, I gain everything. If I make this point clear, then the acts of this Congress by which you have deprived, first eleven and now ten States of their right of representation upon the floor of Congress, are unauthorized; are in usurpation of the rights of the States and sanctioned neither by law, logic, nor sound principle. Even concede that you have the right to make territorial governments—using the word "territorial" because the government so made is for the people inhabiting territory belonging to the United States—suppose you have, does it follow you have the right to establish political institutions of government and rule people inhabiting territory that does not belong to you? Does it follow, either in law or reason, that you have the power or authority to make territorial governments, and to rule and control and govern, through the instrumentality of your President, Congress, and judges, a people who never were in any State of the Union; a people who were never upon the territory of the United States, but who are entirely beyond any State in the United States, and outside of the boundary and jurisdiction, therefore, both of the States and of the Federal Government?

Why, sir, if you have this authority to govern people without their being represented here, suppose you try your hands upon the West India Islands, Cuba, Jamaica, San Domingo, and Porto Rico. Suppose you try your hands upon Mexico and the States of British North America, and see whether or not you are willing to pledge yourself not only to sustain your power over a people not represented, but your ability to make territorial governments over the whole of North America, including the adjacent islands. Now, sir, you have as much authority to extend territorial governments over the people of Cuba, over the States of Mexico, Central America, and British North America, as you have of extending a territorial, arbitrary government over the people of the States not represented.

You do not admit that these States are out of the Union. If they are out of the Union then you have no right to govern them. If they are in the Union then they are in as States, and as States have a right to their proportion of representation in the Lower House of Congress and their right to equal representation upon the floor of the United States Senate. Otherwise, there is no constitutional power and authority to govern them; none whatever.

Now, the school of politicians to which I belong have usually been in a majority in the Congress of the United States from its origin up to the year 1860. It has seldom been the case until the last six years that there has been a majority in both branches of Congress of those politicians of the latitudinarian school, the school which favors the enlargement of the powers of the Government contrary to its plain import. That school has seldom ever been in a majority in both branches of Congress at the same time since the origin of the Government. You succeeded in setting up in the progress of time some two or three Administrations of the Government that held these views and represented the latitudinarian party, but either one or the other branch of the American Congress until within the last six years was against that party; so that the views I have expressed of the nature and character of the United States as being confederate instead of consolidated in form have been sustained by the American people from the adoption of the Government until when you commenced the inauguration of a military despotism over this country. The elder Adams, one of our first Presidents, and Alexander Hamilton, in the Convention were the founders of one school. Mr. Madison, of the Federal Convention, and Mr. Jefferson, the third President, were considered as the founders of the other.

Now I do not find from one distinguished man of our own political school an expression of opinion on a public theater, where the party could be held responsible for his views, a deliberate expression of his opinion, that this is a popular Government and its powers are coextensive with the will of existing majorities. You cannot find it; this is a Government of States; not only does the history of the times prove it by showing they were independent sovereign States before the Government was formed, but it is proved by the Constitution itself. It was made by the States. The States were to be represented equally in the Senate regardless of their geographical extent, of size, or amount of population. The principle was declared and the mode prescribed in the Constitution itself whereby the States should be represented in the lower branches of Congress, but they were still the representatives of States. The President of the United States was to be selected by the States. Each and all are required by the fundamental and irrevocable law, the Constitution of the United States, to select their representation in the Electoral College for the purpose of electing a President and Vice President; and if any candidate fail to receive a majority there then the election comes into this House, where it is to be decided by States, each State only having one vote, to be cast by the majority of its delegation, and a majority of all the States necessary to a choice.

Not only is it the fact that the machinery of the Federal Government has been provided by States; that its functionaries represent the States; that it gives to the States the power of electing the Chief Magistrate; but the Constitution itself proves most conclusively that the States were to continue to exist with all their retained powers in the Federal Union, and that the ends and purposes for which the Government of the United States was established could well be subserved without interference with the independent governmental character of the States. It was never intended to interfere with the authority and rights of the States as such. They were to rule themselves within their own borders to all intents and purposes, so that they assumed no granted power and exercised none prohibited to them. They had the right to adopt their own criminal and civil codes, to regulate by their own laws their own internal concerns in every particular in regard to crimes and punishments, civil rights, the transmission of real estate by purchase or descent, the mode of distribution of personal estates, the relation of husband and wife, parent and child, guardian and ward, and, if you please, master and slave; all the duties and obligations pertaining to the various civil offices, of executors, administrators, and trustees. All these powers are retained by the States, with the reserved power to each State for itself to control its own policy in regard to manufactures, agriculture, and commerce within its own borders.

Now, look at the character of the Federal Government. It may raise an army. The States have no right to create armies or raise troops in time of peace. The Federal Government may build and support a navy. The States are inhibited from doing it. The Federal Government may make treaties with foreign Powers. The States are prohibited from doing it, and even from making compacts with each other. But all authority over their internal concerns in regard to the rights of property and of person are retained by the States except so far as they may be expressly granted to the Federal Government. The whole object and purpose was that the Federal Government should have control of our foreign commerce, our foreign relations; should have the power to make war, in conducting which the States were to unite all their energies and powers; and should have the authority to coin money, to impose taxes, and to borrow money, &c. It is easy, were it not for the tendency of ambitious men when in power to magnify and extend that power beyond its legitimate limit, it is easy for this Congress and for the Government of the United States in all its departments to trace and pursue the plain line of demarkation or distinction between the powers and jurisdiction of the Federal Government and that retained by the States. An infallible clue to a just and true interpretation of the Constitution of the United States in regard to the powers thereby granted by the States is to understand the objects and purposes to be promoted and attained by the Government it creates. These objects were to make war and peace as a unit, to control and conduct our foreign affairs and relations, to regulate our commerce with foreign Powers, between the States and the Indian tribes, to keep perpetual free trade and peace between the States. Let the Government of the Union, in the exercise of its powers, then, confine itself to the accomplishment of these purposes, carefully avoiding any invasion of the retained powers of the States, and the Union may be indefinitely extended and forever maintained.

Now, there is no more devoted friend and advocate than I am of the maintenance and preservation of the present union of the States, and not only of the States already included therein, but of other States that may be hereafter legitimately annexed or admitted into this Union. I wish to see the Union enlarged until it shall comprise the whole continent of North America, distributed and divided into States, each one reserving to itself and maintaining the right of controlling its own affairs within its own limits and exercising its own reserved rights.

A most important result would be secured by this union of States. Free trade between them would be established over the whole continent, and however much the powers of the General Government might be prostituted to embarrass our commerce with the world, and thus promote sectional aggrandizement and antagonism, we should have the consolation at least of knowing that it was beyond the power of that Government, through its power of indirect taxation or otherwise, ever to disturb free commercial intercourse or trade between all the States of the Union.

But you deny that they are States. Well, sir, if a man will deny a solemn truth staring him right in the face; if a man will deny what the records of your own Congress prove; if a man will deny what is plainly stated in the Constitution of the United States; if a man will deny the fact that Virginia, Georgia, and the Carolinas were in part the framers of the Constitution, and that they are members of the Union created by that Constitution; if a man will deny these things, how can you demonstrate anything to him? These States, through their delegates to the Federal Convention, assisted in framing the Constitution, and they, by their several State conventions, adopted and ratified it. The other States now denied their due representation in Congress were each, by solemn compacts in the form of reciprocal and irrevocable legislation, passed and adopted by the legislative authorities of both the governments of the Union and of the said States, severally admitted into the Union, where they stand now and must forever remain unless severed by a successful revolution.

There are certain truths so palpable and self-evident that the mere statement of them is sufficient to prove them. There are certain mathematical and logical truths that no one will multiply words in attempting to prove. Who will attempt to prove that two parallel straight lines drawn out to an indefinite length will never meet? Who would attempt to prove by a demonstration of language that all the parts of the circumference of a circle are equidistant from the center, or that two straight lines drawn through the center of a circle at right angles to each other would divide it into four equal parts? There are self-evident truths in logic as in mathematics that need only to be stated to command assent. I say that these are States. They were States in the Union, and bound by the Constitution of the United States and its laws, under the Federal compact. It was because the people who inhabited these States attempted forcibly to prevent the Constitution and the laws made in pursuance of it from being enforced within their borders, that you made war upon them; you ravaged their country; you murdered many of their people; you burned and destroyed their property, and overrun them with armies that were permitted more latitude in their operations than, in my judgment, was ever permitted to armies in any war ever conducted by a civilized power.

This has been done, and it was done upon what pretext and for what purpose? It was to enforce the Constitution and laws upon these people. The States were attempting to secede and you said they should not secede. As States they could not secede. The Constitution of the United States declares that its provisions and all laws made in pursuance thereof shall be the supreme law of the land, anything in the constitution or laws of any State of the Union to the contrary notwithstanding; thus making it utterly impossible as a matter of law that any State could ever get out of the Union. No State can get out of the Union by law, whether in the form of legislative enactment or by any ordinance or decree of a convention. Then if they could not get out lawfully, have they got out in any other way? There is another way by which, perhaps, they might get out, and that would be by successful revolution, by their resisting successfully by force the enforcement of the Constitution and laws of the United States over them.

If they should succeed in resisting the power attempting to coerce them into the Union they might get out of the Union and from under the Constitution, and their getting out might be acquiesced in. But the revolution attempted has not succeeded. They have failed to get out, and being lawfully in all their ordinances and decrees, whether by conventions or through their Legislatures, were entire nullities; because that they are nullities is evident from the fact that the Constitution of the United States has made itself and the laws made in pursuance of it the supreme law of all the States. If, then, they are not out by law, how are they out? And if they are not out, then you cannot govern them without their being represented in Congress. If they are not out, then the Constitution provides that Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, and Georgia shall have certain representation in the First Congress; and not only that, but that they should thereafter be entitled to their proportion of representatives in subsequent Congresses of the United States. The Constitution provides for the ascertainment of the entire number of Representatives, and that number is to be apportioned among the States by a given ratio. That ratio is to be adopted by the Congress of the United States, and then the number of Representatives of each State being thus ascertained, they have a constitutional right to come in here and be represented, and you cannot deny that right unless you do so by a flagrant violation of the Constitution, which virtually ejects those States from the Union.

I have stated, sir, and I state again, that there is no warrant of law for the assumption and that no judicial mind can assume for a moment that any civil act, any act of legislation, any act in the shape of a decree or ordinance of any public body of the States by which they attempted to break their connection with the other States, was anything but a nullity. It is especially ordained that the Constitution and laws of the United States shall be supreme over every State in the Union. These States are not out of the Union by law; they are not out by force. There was an unsuccessful revolution. And if they are not out by force, then they are in the Union. The Constitution is the chart, it is the special power of attorney under which the States are united together. For, sir, I assimilate this Constitution very much to a special, as distinguished from a general, power of attorney. It is special because the powers of the agents and functionaries of the Government therein provided for are limited and defined; and being so limited and defined the power is special, not general. This power of attorney was signed by all the States then in the Union, and it has been signed by each State that has subsequently come in, and each agreed with the others that neither shall ever be deprived of its just representation in this House and its equal representation in the Senate of the United States.

How, then, is it that you can overthrow the Constitution and revolutionize this Government? You are here as the agents of your various States; you represent your various States in this Congress as States. And do you, gentlemen, representing the great, gigantic, powerful State of New York, admit that a majority can at any time or under any circumstances, while you are willing to remain in the Union, deprive you, by a resolution of this body or by an act of Congress, of your representation in the Senate and in the House of Representatives in Congress?

The great States of New York and Pennsylvania, with a ring in the nose of each and cord attached, led by New England, are giving in to the long-determined and settled policy of the North to prevent the extension to the South and West of representative power in Congress, and are being driven on by the party lash, wielded and brandished by a Boston junto, who move and inspire the dominant majority in both the Senate and House of Representatives. This deplorable state of things cannot last; it is impossible for such patent and barefaced violations of the Constitution and the laws, of the eternal principles of right and justice, to last. It must have an end, and a disastrous end speedily I apprehend, if this reckless career is not arrested. I feel a deep interest and an anxious solicitude upon this subject, because I want no more revolution, I want no more war; I not only want the States now in the Union to remain there, but I want all the balance of the continent that is worth annexing to come in and to have our Union to be coextensive with the continent of North America; not extended by violence and war, not by force upon the inhabitants of adjacent countries, but by the legitimate annexation of new States.

I hold, therefore, that we ought to look not only to the present but to the future. Yet you are here adopting a system of policy to deprive these States of their representation in Congress for no higher or nobler purpose than that of preserving your party predominance. Nothing else can be at the bottom of it. Humanity cannot prompt it; patriotism cannot inspire it; love of the Union and hope of its preservation cannot possibly justify it; because all these forbid it. Sound patriotism would say: "admit the representatives from those States;" common humanity and justice would say, "admit them;" the best policy and interest of the whole country would say, "admit them;" the Constitution and laws imperatively demand that we should admit them. They are in the Union and you cannot lawfully put their representation out of this House; it is their portion of the instrumentality and machinery by which they and other portions of the Union are to be governed.

Yet, for the mere sake of preserving your party predominance, and for no other or higher motive that I can conceive of, you are trying to do that which is contrary to the best interest of all sections. In my judgment, your course for exclusion and disunion is against sound policy, expediency, law, justice, and grossly violative of the Constitution. I can see no higher or better motive by which the men are influenced who do this monstrous wrong—always giving them credit for ordinary sagacity—than the mere preservation of their present party predominance; as though this Government was made for the mere preservation of party ascendancy and the promotion of party interests; as though this Government should be ruled through its legislative branch by men other than those of sound patriotism. The attempt to rule arbitrarily and by military power, the attempt to exclude States of this Union from their just share of representation in Congress, can only proceed from the brains of mere partisans and politicians, the spawn and filth produced by the boiling of the political caldron and which by a law of fermentation always arises to the surface. That caldron has been stirred up and boiling for the last six or seven years, by reason of which inferior men, unpatriotic men, men who are not sound statesmen, but mere politicians, have been foisted into power, and are now ruling through the dominant party, in such manner and with such purposes as must inevitably result, if not checked in time, in the destruction of the governments of the States, the overthrow of all the guarantees in our constitutions, State and Federal, for the preservation of the rights and liberties of the citizens, and the establishment of a despotic Government, upheld by a mercenary standing army, and taxing, governing, and controlling the whole country, regardless of constitutional restraints.

But why is it you do not want these people represented? Do you pretend to deny that those southern States have furnished in time past some of the most patriotic and illustrious men who have taken part in the councils of the Government. Before and during the Revolution and since, those States have sent to our public councils men of the highest patriotism and the soundest public spirit. Are you afraid of the influence that will be exerted by the men they will send here, if they be allowed their constitutional right of representation in these Halls. The talent, energy, and virtue of the men they would send here would be such as to command the respect of the nation and perhaps to influence materially and wisely the policy of the Government in the promotion of its best interests, both foreign and domestic, and for the conservation of the rights of their own States and the liberties of their own people.

Again, not only do you refuse to these States their constitutional share of representation for no higher reason that I can conceive of than the one I have stated, but you go still further. Not only do you attempt to control these people without representation, without warrant or authority of law, but you establish over them a military despotism. You refuse to allow them to participate in the Government, nor will you allow them to govern themselves in their own internal concerns. There has been introduced here a bill (which I have but cursorily examined) to overthrow and demolish these State governments altogether, taking away all the authority of the States to govern themselves, to control their own domestic interests, to regulate the franchise or suffrage—to foist upon those States a government to be enforced by congressional power; and the President is to be ordered to use the military and naval forces of the country to overthrow the existing State governments and to impose upon them other governments in their stead, and in which demolition and substitution they have no choice but submission. This would imply a deliberate purpose to surrender those State governments into the hands of the negroes, disfranchising the white population and enfranchising the slaves that formerly belonged to them. This is the policy indicated by measures already adopted and by measures which seem to be contemplated.

In addition to this, my northern friends are engaged in another work of mischief and destruction which, if it prevails, will actually subvert the character of the Government, which will sweep away all the guarantees for the maintenance of the rights and powers of the States, giving to a single department of the Government entire control, regardless of constitutional restraints. The predominance of the Republican party of the North in both branches of Congress is such that they seem to have become fiercely aggressive upon the executive department of the Government, and seem disposed to disregard altogether the division and distribution of power among the several departments of the Government, as laid down in the Constitution. We know that outside of these Halls they have threatened to depose the head of the executive department by impeachment, for no cause known to the Constitution or laws, for nothing except acts which, in my humble opinion, prove him to be an honest, patriotic, and devoted friend of constitutional liberty.

I do not deny, nay, I admit, that Andrew Johnson, both before and since he became President of the United States, has done and said things which are so entirely in conflict with what I regard as sound political doctrine, so opposed to the principles to which he himself adhered in the earlier part of his public career, that I cannot and never shall approve of them. I will not specify the things to which I now refer. But it will be observed that those opinions and acts of the President officially pronounced and performed by him within six years past which the judgment of his former political friends condemn are approved heartily, no doubt, by his present political enemies. Those acts of President Johnson for which, if for anything, he ought to have been impeached, according to the views of those who think with me, are the very things which are virtues in the estimation of the gentlemen on the other side. Now, when President Johnson has become alive to the necessity of preserving constitutional government, when he has become satisfied that usurpations of power have been practiced and unconstitutional laws been enacted by the present Congress, and now seeks to interpose with his veto power to protect the Constitution and save the liberties of the people, gentlemen on the other side propose to impeach him.

There are things in his presidential career for which I admire him, and which induce me to overlook many things he has said and done during the last six years.

Now, sir, your party predominance it seems will be endangered if you allow these States to remain in the Union; that if you allow them representation in Congress it will endanger your party predominance; that these $540,000,000 of public treasure in that state of the case would not be monopolized by you; that you want all of the patronage in all the departments of the Government, and that you are not in favor of any division of it whatever. You fear that patronage would be endangered unless you should in substance overthrow, prostrate, and destroy the executive department of the Government by impeachment of the President.

It appears by the various movements which have been made that the object is to deprive the Executive of his power. You propose to take away his power, his absolute, uncontrollable power of appointment, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. You propose to take away his power of removal of public officers except exercised with the consent of the Senate.

At present, as Congress is constituted, you have as large a majority in the United States Senate as here and can rely upon the Senate that no man shall receive an appointment unless he be a Radical, and that no officer being a Radical shall be removed. If the nomination be made of a man not a Radical in furtherance of the measures and purposes you have in contemplation, he would be rejected by the Senate. If a man thus rejected be appointed again it is to be a high crime and misdemeanor. If a man already in office is of your faith and politics he is not to be removed without the concurrence of the Senate.

So that in the matter of removals and appointments it seems to me to be the design and purpose to destroy in substance the power of the Executive over the subject of patronage; and also as you have two thirds majority to make the conservative principle contained in our Constitution utterly useless and powerless. It seems to be your design and purpose to carry all of your measures, constitutional or unconstitutional, so as to absorb all the powers of all the other departments of the Government in the hands of Congress, and thus remove all the checks and balances intended in the very frame-work and structure of the Government to prevent usurpations.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's hour has expired.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio, obtained the floor.

Mr. FINCK. I wish to ask my colleague whether he is desirous of going on to-day?

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. I am.

Mr. FINCK. The gentleman from Kentucky has not yet concluded his speech, and I hope by unanimous consent his time may be extended for half an hour.

Mr. McKEE. I hope the House will extend that courtesy to my colleague.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection the gentleman's time will be extended for thirty minutes.

Mr. McKEE. I hope my colleague will be allowed to go on without limitation until he finishes his speech. I think it is only fair and just that he should have as much time as he needs.

Mr. WENTWORTH. I rise to a point of order. The gentleman from Kentucky on my motion the other day had his time extended indefinitely, and I make the point that he has a right to go on until he concludes his speech.

The CHAIRMAN. It has been ruled again and again that such extensions are only for one hour. There is no objection, and the gentleman's time is extended for thirty minutes.

Mr. HISE. I will proceed, Mr. Chairman. In the very beginning of the Constitution you will find it is declared that the legislative power hereby granted shall be vested in the Senate and House of Representatives.

The qualification of a member of this House in regard to age is, I believe, that he shall be twenty-five years of age, and of a Senator of the United States thirty-five. The power was lodged in two Houses instead of one, with the hope that one branch of the Legislature might operate as a check upon the other in order to preserve a constitutional government and prevent unconstitutional usurpations. But as the present Congress is constituted, both branches unite and harmonize with an overwhelming majority. They have created a joint committee, of which it appears I am a member, a most agreeable circle, called a committee on reconstruction. That committee it seems devised the whole scheme of policy which is to be pursued by the party in power on this subject of representation. After being agreed upon in the committee the schemes are ratified in both Houses.

Now, this valuable check is overthrown. The Constitution is to be put into execution by the official machinery therein provided for. It has provided that the Legislature should constitute one branch of the Government, the executive another, and the judicial another. Why was it thus distributed? Because it was believed that there was no security that the Constitution itself would be respected, and that a Government outside of the Constitution inaugurated by a series of acts of usurpation might be instituted regardless of its limitations and guarantees, conservative of the powers of the States and the liberty of the citizen, therefore, in order that it should conserve itself, that there should be a principle of conservatism within its own provisions, the framers of the Constitution divided the powers therein granted between three separate and independent departments; and in regard to the legislative power provided that it should be placed in two Houses, with the hope, as I said, that one would check the other, and if not, here was the Executive with the veto power provided, so that it might be interposed to prevent congressional usurpation. Then, here was the judicial power, created in the hope that if there should be usurpation of power or an attempt to control the Government regardless of constitutional inhibitions, that power might check it. The Supreme Court was established with authority and power to pronounce all such acts null and void.

These checks and balances were indispensably necessary in order that the Constitution should be preserved inviolate. We know from former history, we know from present events and signs that the greatest possible danger to a republican government and to free institutions proceeds from its legislative branch. There lies the danger to the maintenance of the rights of the States and of those guarantees intended to protect personal liberty. If the Government is already free it remains free so far as the judicial and executive branches of the Government are concerned. The people should be lightly burdened, and not oppressed with a revolting system of taxation such as this country is laboring under now; but what department is it that imposes this grinding taxation upon them? It is the legislative branch. It is by and through the law-enacting department of the Government that nearly all the usurpations take place by which free governments are overturned. Therefore the party controlling the legislative department and seeking to overturn free government always strike down, if possible, judicial independence.

During the last six years we have seen a party striking at the judicial department of this Government, and we have seen the judicial power shrink and cower until it became the servile agent and mercenary tool of the Congress of the United States in sanctioning or refusing to interpose to prevent the enslavement of the American people, in permitting the unlawful suspension of the writ of habeas corpus and the institution of military domination throughout the whole land. We have seen the judiciary of the country tamely and servilely submitting and becoming the subservient instrument of these usurpations of power by the legislative and executive branches of Government, not choosing to interpose to check it and to protect the rights and liberties of the citizens.

Now, sir, I put this before the country. I want it to understand what you are doing, and I want to know if the country will continue to put a congressional majority in both branches of Congress which will sanction your headlong career toward the destruction of all constitutional Government. Look at the ruin that this Radical party have brought upon the country since they came into power. Look at the deplorable condition of the times now, and contrast them with what they were when through sectional agitation they succeeded in carrying the elections by which they became entitled to the possession and control of the Government. They found the authorities of the Government in the hands of men respecting the Constitution.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. When?

Mr. HISE. When this party became entitled to power.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I deny it. When Mr. Lincoln came into the presidential chair seven States were in rebellion.

Mr. HISE. Not a single State attempted to withdraw from the Union until it was known to the whole country that the North had consigned the Government to the political enemies of the South, and which the South firmly believed when they, the Radicals, obtained the actual possession of it would be wielded, as it has been, for the destruction of their constitutional rights. At all events, if the party now in power had never been put in its possession, the Union at this day would have been preserved, the States at this day would have been united, there never would have been any severance at all, because the Government would have continued to be conducted on those benign principles and under those constitutional restraints that would have reconciled all the States South and caused them to abandon any purpose of secession.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. Of course if the South could have ruled this country there would have been no rebellion. The late Senator Douglas made the declaration, however, after the war began, that the South would go out anyhow the moment they failed to rule the country.

Mr. HISE. We know very well that this thing of disunion had been brewing for a great number of years.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. Yes, it had.

Mr. HISE. One cause after another had been piled up until their aggregate became so great as to drive the Union asunder. Who is to blame most for the severance of the Union, for a portion of the States springing off from the balance? I think those who inserted the wedge and plied the hammer until they split it to pieces are the party most to blame.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HISE. I would rather not, as my time is limited; but I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. WILLIAMS. It is a very simple question. I desire to ask him whether he regards the causes of the rebellion, as stated by him, as adequate to justify it.

Mr. HISE. No, sir.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Very well.

Mr. HISE. No, sir. I am against dividing the Union under any circumstances. Where the forms of the Government are preserved; where the framework and system of the Government remains; where the functionaries of the Government continue to be selected in the manner prescribed in the Constitution, I am not for violently breaking off and resorting to disunion or secession and rebellion. No, sir, I would endure error, I would endure corruption, I would endure usurpation in the hope that as long as this framework of Government remains, and so long as freedom of the press and of discussion remain, with speech and reason still left free to combat error, a remedy for all these evils might be found by a change of rulers, effected peaceably and without revolution under the Constitution itself and according to the means of relief it may furnish.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Will the gentleman allow me another question in this connection?

Mr. HISE. Yes, sir.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I wish to know whether freedom of speech had been respected in the rebel States during the last ten years before the rebellion broke out.

Mr. HISE. Mr. Speaker, I did not intend to go into, and I hope I will now be excused from going into, the rights and wrongs of the late civil war. I do not want to go into the merits of the question as to whether the wrong was upon the one side or the other. I am for peace and Union, and I do not want to harrow up or rasp the feelings of the coercionists and war men of the North. I am not disposed to charge a design of usurpation and a purpose to establish an unconstitutional government on the men, the people, the voters of the North. You cannot convince people unless you first conciliate them. If you first provoke and make war upon them, it is in vain to reason with them when thus excited and provoked. I hope the northern people will yet learn the sad truth that the South cannot be oppressed and enslaved and they themselves escape.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I understood the gentleman to set down the rebellion to the account of the northern States.

Mr. HISE. I expressed the opinion that if a party had never got into power in this country on an unconstitutional platform, or if after they got into power on that unconstitutional platform had consented to yield to a joint compromise, there would have been no war.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. What did they refuse to yield?

Mr. HISE. They refused to yield anything of importance.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. Did not the Thirty-Sixth Congress submit a constitutional amendment making slavery perpetual in this country, so that there should be no power in Congress to change it?

Mr. HISE. Do you remember that the President in his inaugural address, or in his message to Congress, one or the other, said in substance, I cannot repeat the exact words, "That no Government could stand or would stand if the party in power should be required by the party out of power, as a condition of their obedience, to surrender the main plank of the platform of principles or policy upon which they obtained power?" Did not that sentiment come from the then President of the United States? He said that a Government could not long stand where the party in power, which had come into power upon a given set of principles, upon a certain line of policy, was required to abandon it, or any portion of it, in order to secure the obedience of the party out of power or of a certain section of the Union.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. Will the gentleman yield to me a moment?

Mr. HISE. I would prefer not to do so.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. For a moment only.

Mr. HISE. Very well; I will yield.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I would ask the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. Hise] if the dominant party that came into power in 1861 did not propose an amendment to the Constitution of the United States guarantying to the States in the Union the right to control the institution of slavery forever? And did not a majority of the Thirty-Seventh Congress in both the Senate and the House of Representatives belong to the party of which the gentleman is a member when the southern States went into rebellion?

Mr. HISE. My recollection is not very distinct concerning the precise facts which occurred about that time; but I remember the general impression upon my mind. That impression was that there was no hope of an adjustment or compromise by the requisite majority in Congress and the requisite majority of the northern States. I had no hope of it. Besides that, the President said in substance that he intended to use force, what force was necessary for the purpose of recapturing the United States forts, arsenals, mints, and public property, and enforcing the Constitution and laws of the United States. I refer to that now to show that war was determined upon and that any compromise was out of the question.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. Determined on by whom? Does the gentleman say that it was right for the South to take possession of the United States forts there, and thus inaugurate war?

Mr. HISE. I do not.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. Does the gentleman hold that when that was done this Government ought quietly to have acquiesced?

Mr. HISE. I hold, sir, that this Union could have been maintained and preserved by wise and moderate measures without a resort to the war by which so much injury has been unnecessarily brought upon the whole country.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. How?

Mr. HISE. It could have been maintained and preserved without all the ruin and bloodshed which ensued if the party coming into power would only have abandoned a plank in their platform and have given the requisite guarantees to the southern States, which they ought to have done, that they would agree to an adjustment, which would have inspired confidence that southern rights would not be invaded or their institutions destroyed. That platform was hostility to the institution of slavery, an avowed design to use the powers of Government to abolish it. To that extent the platform was unconstitutional, because the history of this country proves that slavery was a lawful institution, sanctioned and authorized by British law, by colonial law, by the laws of the States when they had achieved their independence, and by the Constitution and laws of the United States.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I would ask the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. Hise] if the platform upon which Mr. Lincoln was elected did not distinctly and positively disclaim any intention to interfere with the institution of slavery in any of the States? And I ask again if we did not submit to the South an amendment to the Constitution which provided that the southern States should control slavery forever.

Mr. HISE. This is leading me into a matter which I did not intend to investigate. But I will say that if they had consented in some legitimate manner, in some binding form upon which the southern States could have relied, that there would be no attack made upon their constitutional legal rights of property, no invasion upon the institution of slavery, the Union could have been preserved. That is my deliberate opinion.

Mr. KELLEY. With the permission of the gentleman, I would like to ask him a brief question right here. Will he yield for that purpose?

Mr. HISE. I will yield, though my time is running out.

Mr. KELLEY. I would ask the gentleman whether he remembers any single compromise made between the North and South with reference to which the South adhered to its bargain; any one?

Mr. HISE. Well, I cannot recollect; I cannot give facts, dates, or speeches, because they have passed somewhat out of my recollection. But my recollection is that the president of the southern confederacy, Jefferson Davis, while he remained in the Senate of the United States and until his State passed her ordinance of secession, made as patriotic and earnest efforts to have the difficulties of the country adjusted and prevent disunion as any man in the American Senate at the time. That is my impression. Do not ask me for dates, nor for what this man or the other man said, nor the precise purport of this, that, or the other proposition, because I did not expect to discuss that subject and have not the documents or facts before me. I can only state my impressions.

Now, sir, suppose that the southern people were wrong in the action which they took and that it was both inexpedient and unauthorized, yet this does not justify you in the past and the intended treatment of the excluded States. If they erred in the attempt to carry their States out of the Union, is that a sufficient reason why now the hostile spirit engendered by the war should be continued? Now, when peace is restored, why should we not endeavor by every possible means to restore harmony to the country. "Ah," say you, "if we do not keep these people muzzled, if we do not deny them any share or influence in the Government and refuse them their share of representation in the Halls of Congress, our party predominance will pass away." That is the fear. Now, is that a motive by which statesmen should be influenced? Our object should be peace—a peaceable reunion of the States—or rather a union of them, because I deny that the Union has ever been divided; I deny that any of the States have ever been destroyed. There can be no such thing as "reconstruction" unless there has been a structure demolished. The name of the committee who seem to have charge of this whole subject is therefore not appropriate. There is no reason or necessity for any committee on reconstruction, because there is nothing to reconstruct. The Union has been preserved. Certain States that attempted to get out of the Union by force failed in that attempt and are still in the Union. All the acts by which they attempted to get out are null and void, being in conflict with the Constitution of the United States, the "supreme law of the land."

Now, sir, how does this Congress propose to treat those States? It has treated them as States in the various particulars and modes pointed out in the President's message. Gentlemen clamor here because those States have not adopted the proposed constitutional amendment, by which their whole social system and fabric of society would be debauched, demoralized, and reversed. Yet they have no authority to act on that constitutional amendment unless they be States of the Union. In many other particulars, as stated in the President's message, Congress has treated them as States. Yet it is now insisted that they are not States, and not being States are not entitled to representation upon this floor. It is pretended that they have relinquished and forfeited their rights as States. Why, sir, such a thing is impossible. Where is the law or the reason for it? Why, sir, during the wars of the French Revolution there was one portion of France, on the coast of Brittany, called, I believe, La Vendee, whose people fought on the side of the monarchy and against the revolutionary party; yet I never learned, from my reading of French history, that when the revolutionary party had proved successful the people of the insurgent districts were disfranchised. How was it in the civil wars of England, the conflicts between the houses of York and Lancaster, and the intestine strife during the reign of Charles I? After the Government became established, first under Cromwell and afterward under Charles II, were the people who had taken part in those wars either on one side or the other disfranchised—denied the privilege of sending their representatives to the House of Commons, and deprived of their rights as subjects of Great Britain? I imagine not. There may have been here and there cases in which the ringleaders were punished; but there was no disfranchisement of the people inhabiting whole sections of country, counties, or municipalities that may have been involved in a rebellion or civil war.

Why not have peace and union? You say they are not States, because you know if they are States they must have representation. If they are not States I admit they have no right to representation. But they are States; now you propose unlawfully and unconstitutionally to destroy their character as States and convert them into dependent territories or conquered provinces. Upon what authority? Where is the law for it? You cannot punish a State. There is no constitutional authority for the indictment, trial, conviction, and punishment of a State as such. There is no punishment for States prescribed in the Constitution or in any law I have ever seen or heard of.

Why punish them? How can you try the State? You cannot do it. Do you want to punish the people? You cannot do it. It is impossible. The people of those States, many of them, would never have concurred in the movement of secession but for the enormities and atrocities practiced by this Government during the war, and the violation of what was declared to be the object of the war in a resolution passed by both Houses of Congress, to the effect that it was not intended to interfere with their domestic institutions or any of their rights and privileges under the Constitution. It was not, sir, until after the Government violated that solemn pledge, made in both branches of Congress, that the war was to be prosecuted, not for the purpose of subjugation or enslavement of those people, not for the purpose of overturning or interfering with their rights as States or their State institutions, not at all; but for the mere purpose of enforcing the Constitution and laws of the United States and preserving and maintaining the Union and the Government of the Union under the Constitution; and that when they succeeded in suppressing all armed opposition and resistance to the Government, then those States should be received again into the Union, or would be in the Union as before according to the declaration of Mr. Seward in his dispatch to our minister to France, that the States would come back again and remain in the Union with all their rights of property and representation. I repeat it was not until after these solemn pledges were violated by the subsequent development of the real objects and purposes, for the attainment of which the war continued to be prosecuted, that the southern people generally concurred in the necessity of persisting in armed resistance for defense.

Now, in violation of all these pledges you design in bad faith to convert these States into Territories. Where is the authority, where is the law for it? Some gentlemen contend the authority is to be found in that portion of the Constitution which says that the United States shall guaranty to every State in the Union a republican form of government, and shall protect each of them against invasion, and upon application of the Legislature or of the Executive (when the Legislature cannot be convened) against domestic violence. Sir, that provision of the Constitution, in my opinion, authorizes no such thing as the conversion of those States into provinces to be governed arbitrarily. This clause of the Constitution contains no such authority. It is a mere guarantee that the republican governments of the States shall be maintained. There was no authority given in that clause to convert States into Territories so as to deprive them of all representation in Congress. It is an obligation, in fact, imposed upon the Federal Government to see that neither by domestic violence, foreign invasion, or in any other way the republican governments of the States should be overthrown. Now, does that give to the Government of the United States the power to overthrow the State governments when they are republican in fact, and to institute territorial governments so as to deprive them of all representation in Congress? Was that the object? Can this Congress make them Territories at its discretion? Can it reduce them to the condition of conquered and dependent provinces when they choose and as they choose? Because the duty is imposed upon this Government by the clause of the Constitution above cited to protect the States as States in the enjoyment of their republican forms of government as existing, can it be contended with any show of reason that this power or duty of the United States is properly executed and performed by overturning instead of guarantying the republican governments of these States, by changing their condition as States into that of dependent provinces, and by denying to them their right of representation in Congress? Never! no, never!

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, the subject of the compensation of members of Congress engaged the attention of the framers of the Constitution, and that instrument provides that—

"The Senators and Representatives shall receive a compensation for their services, to be ascertained by law, and paid out of the Treasury of the United States."—Article 1, section 6.

Whether this compensation shall be authorized in the form of an annual salary, payable at stated times, or as per diem wages, in either case with or without mileage, the duty of prescribing by law its amount is one of the most difficult and embarrassing.

Any bill changing the compensation during an existing official term, or for the prospective sessions to which Senators and Representatives in office may be reelected, of course calls upon them to decide a question affecting their own personal interests.

This, I know, is the legitimate and indeed the necessary exercise of a power conferred by the Constitution, but in the performance of that duty I hope it may never be truly said that the Congress of the United States did not act with their accustomed dignity, or refused the consideration and hearing necessary to arrive at a just conclusion. (Annals of Fifteenth Congress, first session, January 7, 1818, page 588.) I am not insensible of the fact that any effort at reduction, either of compensation for Senators and Representatives or of salaries of officers in other Departments is liable to be met with the "hue and cry" that the sole motive therefor is popular favor or approbation. For one, I choose rather to incur the hazard of this injustice than to shrink from an effort in this direction, which duty and the public judgment demand, and which sound policy requires. I recognize it as a solemn duty to conform our legislation to the matured will of an enlightened people. In the conflict of interest between those who bear the burdens of taxation and those who receive the emoluments of office, the public judgment is quite as impartial and just in its motive as any tribunal to which we can appeal; yet it is sometimes less powerful in the halls of legislation, because of the ever-present, more zealous, and earnest efforts of official position. The atmosphere that surrounds us here is an official atmosphere, and while justice should be done to all who move in it, and to all who may be in office elsewhere, let us not be unmindful of the millions who are the source, not only of all political power, but whose labor applied to the development of our natural resources is the main element in the production of wealth.

When this Congress commenced its first session, on the 4th day of December, 1855, the compensation of its members as "ascertained by law" was fixed at $3,000 per year, and mileage at forty cents per mile. (Act of August 16, 1856; 11 United States Statutes at Large, 48.)

By the seventeenth section of the miscellaneous appropriation act, approved July 28, 1860, this annual salary was increased to $5,000 per year, but the mileage was reduced to—

"Twenty cents per mile, to be estimated by the nearest route usually traveled in going to and returning from each regular session."—Laws of 1865-66, page 323, Appendix to Congressional Globe, part five, first session, Thirty-Ninth Congress, page 417.

Upon this subject I have introduced two bills; one of them proposes to repeal so much of the act of July 28, 1860, as increases the annual salary to $5,000; the effect of which will be to revive and restore the annual salary of $3,000, but to leave the mileage at twenty cents per mile. The other bill proposes to reduce the mileage to ten cents per mile.

These have been introduced in the form of separate and distinct propositions, so that one might not embarrass the other, if there shall be opposition to the one which may not exist against the other, but in the hope that both be the best, but in that which I suppose most likely to succeed.

There are well-grounded objections to compensation in the form of a salary. The mode of compensation by a per diem allowance is more just, equitable, and in accordance with the analogies in the State Legislatures, where it has always been adopted. And this opinion has prevailed in Congress during the larger part of our history. (Annals of Congress, first session, Fourteenth Congress, 1815-16, page 190; Annals of Congress, second session, Fourteenth Congress, 1816-17, page 314.)

The act of Congress of September 22, 1789, fixed the compensation to March 4, 1795, by giving a per diem of six dollars, with mileage at twenty cents per mile. (1 United States Statutes-at-Large, 70)

The act of March 10, 1796, provided the same compensation. (1 United States Statutes, 448.)

The act of March 19, 1816, for the first time provided an annual salary of $1,500, leaving the mileage unchanged. (3 United States Statutes, 257; Annals of Congress, 1815-16, first session, Fourteenth Congress, page 458.) This act was so indignantly disapproved by the people, that of all those who voted for it only three were returned to the next Congress, and it was repealed by the act of February 6, 1817, to take effect from the close of that session of Congress, with a provision against reviving the repealed act, so that the next Congress was left to fix the salary. (3 United States Statutes, 345.)

The act of January 22, 1818, fixed the compensation from March 3, 1816, at eight dollars per day, and mileage at forty cents per mile. (8 United States Statutes, 404.)

This act remained in force until repealed by the act of August 16, 1866, which left the mileage unchanged, but provided an annual salary of $3,000. (11 United States Statutes, 48.)

The practice of the nation, except during a period of about twelve years, has been in favor of the per diem compensation rather than a salary. Rawle, in his work on the Constitution, declares that—

"The compensation ought to bear as exact a proportion as possible to the time employed. An act of Congress was passed a few years ago (March 19, 1816) in which a gross sum was allotted for an entire session. The dissatisfaction it occasioned produced an early repeal."

I know it has been urged that the tendency of a per diem compensation is to lengthen the sessions of Congress.

I cannot conceive it probable that such effect would follow; but if members could be influenced by such motive then with a salary the desire to avoid the personal expenses of a long session would be a motive to immaturity hasten or omit to act on at least some necessary business, and this is a vastly greater evil than long sessions or much speaking. Long sessions are not generally an evil. The presence of the Legislature is necessary to arrest executive usurpation, to correct abuses as they arise, and to prevent their occurrence. (Federalist, No. 53.)

The stupendous usurpation of Andrew Johnson in exercising unauthorized legislative power in the reorganization of illegal State governments in the rebel States would never have been attempted or tolerated if he had performed his duty by calling Congress together early in 1865 to settle the whole subject of reconstruction.

Even in the States where biennial legislative sessions have been authorized, the experiment has been found disastrous. In Ohio, where the constitution of 1851 authorized biennial sessions, the Legislature has held annual sessions by adjournment over during all the time except in one year, that of 1855.

If a per diem allowance should lengthen the sessions, public measures would be better matured; and if thereby Congress should to some extent become a logocracy, its much speaking would have the advantages which always flow from mature discussion. This mode of compensation is more just, too, because it pays for time employed, and not like a salary for time whether employed or not. The law cannot fix the length of all the sessions; the business to be performed alone can do so, yet a salary unjustly assumes that equal compensation should be made for all sessions long or short, with much or little business.

But the pending bills have not attempted a change so great as sound policy would sanction, for they only seek to restore the salary as it existed before the increase made by the act of July last. And now we are met with the question, is the salary of $3,000 per year adequate and just?

It was once said in debate that—

"The object of giving a per diem to members either of the State or national Legislatures was not by way of compensation for their services, still less to remunerate them for sacrifices of pecuniary or personal advantages of any kind. The real object was to enable individuals whose private means would not enable them to attend the sessions of the respective Legislatures, to meet the moderate and reasonable expenses to which they must necessarily be subjected by their attendance on them, and to the end that the country might not be altogether deprived of the services of men in narrow circumstances, from their inability to suffice to this extra expense. Hence, and in the same spirit a moderate and reasonable allowance was made for traveling expenses, not at such a rate, however, as would be required by the nabob of the South." * * * "who cannot get along without his carriage and two horses and two black servants and two dogs."—Huger's Speech, March 7, 1866, Annals first session Fourteenth Congress, page 1163; Harrison's Speech, January 6, 1813, Annals first session Fifteenth Congress, pages 273, 279, as to mileage.

If this were true that members should only be paid "the moderate and reasonable expenses to which they must necessarily be subjected by their attendance" on Congress, a decidedly sweeping reduction should be made in the salary. But it is palpable that such was not the design of the Constitution, for it declares that members "shall receive a compensation for their services." The spirit and purpose of this provision contemplate such reasonable and moderate compensation for services as the average talent employed would command in other occupations equally arduous and as nearly similar as may be. This would include not only "the moderate and reasonable expenses of attending Congress" but moderate and reasonable recompense besides, for all these are included in the idea of "compensation for services." It cannot include compensation "to remunerate for sacrifices of pecuniary or personal advantages," for these are not proximate consequences of or necessary incidents to the position of a Senator or Representative, and could never be "ascertained by law" because they would differ with the condition and circumstances of each member. I am perfectly aware that no uniform compensation can do exact justice, and all that can be secured is an approximation to it. The same salary may not with equal and exact justice compensate some of the Representatives from California and the mining regions or from large cities, as it would those from the agricultural districts, for there is a wide disparity in rents, taxes, expenses of living, and rates of wages generally.

I will not inquire whether it would be just to discriminate, but that is impracticable and the Constitution seems to contemplate a uniform rule, which should be made not for exceptional cases, but with a view to a general and just average.

And now, in the light of these principles, a comparison of congressional compensation with the salaries paid to the highest judges of the State courts, which it is fair to presume are reasonable and just, will support the measures for which I am contending.

In the National Almanac and Annual Record of 1864 I find the salaries of the highest judges and of the Governors stated for twenty-four States thus:

	Judges of Supreme Court.	Gov- ernor.
1. Pennsylvania.....	$3,400	$4,000
2. New York.....	3,500	4,000
3. Indiana.....	2,000	3,000
4. Ohio.....	3,000	1,800*

The Territories of the United States generally: Governor, $2,500 and $3,000; judges, $1,800 and $2,500.

* Judges since reduced to $2,500.
† For chief justice a fee of $2 in each case docketed in addition.

‡ Chancellor, $2,500; chief justice, $2,100.
§ Chief justice, $1,200.

The average annual salary of these judges is $2,433 each. Their expenses I know are less than would be incurred in attending the sessions of Congress, but the difference in salaries even before the act of July last leaves a margin for that.

I might cite additional salaries, both official and unofficial, but they are sufficiently familiar and with rare exceptions prove by way of comparison the justice of the measures I am urging.

The return of incomes under the internal revenue law affords additional evidence. The Commissioner of Internal Revenue under date of December 14, 1866, says:

"On the 8th ultimo I addressed a circular letter to the assessors directing them to forward to this office the number of persons on the May annual assessment list of 1866, in each of the three following classes:

1. The number who returned a net income of $1,000 or less.	209,231
2. The number whose net income was over $1,000 and not over $5,000.	179,627
3. The number whose net income was over $5,000.	33,612

"Six hundred dollars exempted by law was to be included in each case. Returns have been received from 207 of the 240 collection districts. The total number so far returned in each of the classes is as follows:

The bills on this subject have been introduced with the more confidence because the provision sought to be repealed was agreed to by a meager vote in the House, and in opposition to its matured opinion, twice solemnly and almost unanimously expressed.

It was agreed to on the report of a committee of conference in the hurry of the last morning of the session, under the previous question without an opportunity for discussion, by a vote of 51 for to 50 against, with 85 members absent. (Part V, Congressional Globe, Thirty-Ninth Congress, first session, 1865-6, page 4288.) That final vote cannot, therefore, be the deliberate judgment of a majority of the whole House.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Is not the gentleman from Ohio aware of the fact that the decision of the House was confirmed unanimously on the motion to lay the motion to reconsider on the table?

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. There was no recorded vote on that question.

Mr. WILLIAMS. There were no votes against it.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. There was no recorded vote, and it is fair to presume that the result would have been the same as on the passage of the bill.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. Does the gentleman know of a single member who did not take the extra pay?

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. I do not.

Mr. MAYNARD. I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] to restate his question.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I asked the gentleman from Ohio, whether he knew a single member of the House who had not taken his pay, and he said he did not know one.

Mr. MAYNARD. I deem it due to myself to say that I did not take it until after the matter had gone before the great body of the American people, in all but six States. When I found that the gentleman who had taken it were returned here with such unprecedented unanimity, I accepted that as the deliberate opinion of the great body of the American people, and having that indorsement I received it.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I am happy to find that the action of the gentleman from Tennessee and myself both accord with that of the American people in that regard.

Mr. GRINNELL. I would ask if the gentleman from Tennessee served in the last Congress as a member.

Mr. MAYNARD. Not in the last Congress. I did, however, during a portion of the last session, being admitted to the inside privileges just at the close of the session, whereby the increased pay became due to me and my colleagues, and could have been taken had we chosen to do it. I preferred, however, to wait till the American people had taken action.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. The gentleman from Tennessee assumes—

Mr. COBB. Will the gentleman from Ohio yield?

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. I prefer to go on.

Mr. COBB. For a question?

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. I would like to answer some of those that have been asked already, but I will yield.

Mr. COBB. The gentleman having yielded, I propose to compromise with him by making a brief statement.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. Proceed.

Mr. COBB. I have no disposition to interject a speech into that of my friend from Ohio, and it is with some degree of diffidence that I say anything personal as regards myself or any other gentleman; but the question having been asked by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] whether the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LAWRENCE] knew of any member who had not taken his extra compensation, lest silence should be construed into acquiescence on my part, especially while the question is being reiterated to another member, I beg leave to state that I, for one, having conscientiously voted against the increase of pay on the morning of the 28th of July, being of the opinion that it was wrong and that it would have been dishonest in me to have voted for it, have drawn no part of that extra compensation. And I will add that I will wait a little longer than the honorable gentleman from Tennessee has done before I take it; I will wait till this Congress shall by its action or non-action reiterate, in a more deliberate manner and by a larger majority than it gave for the proposition to increase its pay, that it will not reverse its judgment.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. Better say a majority.

Mr. COBB. Well, perhaps, I may compromise on that.

Mr. MAYNARD. The gentlemen, I suppose, appeals from the decision of the people to this body.

Mr. COBB. I cannot refrain from stating that I very well remember a remark made to me by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MAYNARD] when I gave my vote on that proposition. It was something to this effect: "I thought you had been a soldier, and yet you vote against giving them a bounty."

Sir, in what little effort I made in the canvass last fall I found much more difficulty and embarrassment from the false position that we were forced into by that action of Congress than any other. I believe it is not in order here to say anything about the Senate in fixing the responsibility of that act, but I felt more humility from the ease with which Copperheads and "bread-and-butter" men could call us to account before the people on this subject than from anything else. And I feel some little astonishment at the deliberate attempt to repeal that clause by a gentleman who admits that he accepted the extra compensation.

I am requested by several gentlemen around me, before I take my seat to ask the gentleman from Ohio whether he has or has not accepted the extra compensation, and if so, when? [Laughter.] The gentleman need not answer the question if it will occasion any embarrassment. [Laughter.] I only wanted to know for my own satisfaction and that of the gentlemen around me. [Laughter.]

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, this colloquy has interrupted, a little, the course of my remarks and the argument which I was endeavoring to make, but it affords me an opportunity to say some things in a little different form from what I should have said them if I had been permitted to proceed without interruption. I will reply somewhat to the remarks which have been made. And first, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MAYNARD] assumes that the people in the late elections have sanctioned the bill increasing the compensation of members of Congress.

If that had been the great leading question submitted to the people in the recent elections the result which he attempts to deduce from those elections might be legitimate and proper. But I undertake to say to the gentleman from Tennessee and to the members of this committee that if we had gone to the people upon this naked question and asked their verdict of approval upon this bill increasing compensation we would have been buried ten thousand fathoms deep, and no man who voted for it ever would have returned to this Hall. No, sir; the people in the recent elections gave no verdict upon this bill; but they avoided a verdict upon it because there was involved in those elections the great and overshadowing question whether the people should speak in tones of thunder their condemnation of that man who, at the head of the Government, had betrayed the party which placed him in power and betrayed the interests of the people. That was the question they determined in the recent elections, and not the question whether this increase of salaries was proper.

Mr. MAYNARD. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him whether the distinguished leader to whom he alludes did not especially make this issue upon Congress and submit it to the people and ask them to decide upon it. He certainly was so reported. Surely the gentleman was so engrossed in his own canvass as not to observe what was going on in other parts of the country or that could hardly have escaped his attention.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. The people paid but very little attention to the questions which that distinguished individual chose to submit for their decision. They had before them the questions which were submitted by this Congress, and they passed their verdict upon those questions. I can say further to the gentleman from Tennessee that there never has been a bill passed through any Congress increasing the compensation of its members which has not been disapproved by the people of this country, and this act of July last is not an exception to this general rule.

And now, Mr. Chairman, one word in reply to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL,] and the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. COBB,] both of whom by their questions seem to be anxious to know if I have received this additional compensation.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. That was not the way I put my question.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. No, I know it was not, but I will say that I have received it; I received a portion of it after I came here at this session, and a portion of it a few days prior to that time. I will say further, that no one member of this House can remedy the evil of the act of July last, by refusing to receive his compensation; that is no remedy for the evil. The evil, if it be one, can only be remedied by a repeal of the law.

Mr. DRIGGS. Did the gentleman feel bad when he received it? [Great laughter.]

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. I hope gentlemen will not interrupt me without having at least the courtesy to inquire through the Chair if I yield the floor, but I will pay my respects to the gentleman from Michigan in a moment.

Mr. DRIGGS. The gentleman will excuse me. I will not interrupt him again.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. I am glad to be interrupted; but I will pay my respects to the gentleman directly. I was proceeding, however, with another branch of this inquiry. I remarked that a refusal on the part of one member to receive the compensation could not and would not remedy the evil of increased salary. I say further, that every member of this House has taken an oath to support the Constitution of the United States. That Constitution declares that "Senators and Representatives shall receive a compensation for their services; to be ascertained by law." When members have taken an oath to obey that Constitution which so declares, I take it that it is the duty of a member to accept the provision which is made by law. And now for the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. HILL. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. I prefer to answer one at a time. I will answer all the members of the committee, if they will only give me an opportunity to answer them seriatim; or, if they prefer, I will take them in gross. The gentleman from Michigan desired to know if I felt bad when I received the pay. I do not entirely perceive the pertinency of the question. It has nothing to do with this other greater question which I am considering, whether the increase by the act of July last was proper. I have no doubt but that the gentleman felt very good when he received his.

Mr. DRIGGS. I did. [Laughter.]

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. And I can say further to the gentleman from Michigan, and to every other member of this committee, that if in the recent elections they had gone to the people upon this naked question, they never would have had an opportunity of feeling good by receiving any more of this compensation at any future session.

Mr. DRIGGS. Will the gentleman allow me one word?

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. Not now; I want to dispose of these other questions first.

Mr. MAYNARD. If the gentleman will allow me, we have been discussing this matter in a spirit of pleasantry, and I would like to say another word in regard to it. We were called upon to vote upon this proposition to increase the pay of members of Congress, and the associated proposition to equalize the bounties of soldiers. I will venture to say to the gentleman that if the result of that vote had been the other way, and the proposition giving bounty to the soldiers had been defeated, even the defeat of the other measure would not have saved from dire condemnation every man found upon the record voting against it. And I will say furthermore, that unless this Congress before it adjourns shall perfect that measure equalizing the bounties to the soldiers, and make it more just and righteous than it even now is, it will fare very badly with some of us who may have occasion hereafter to go before our military constituents.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. I agree entirely with the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. MAYNARD.] And I am glad to find that he will cooperate with me in an effort to increase the bounties for soldiers. But if the position which he assumes is correct, it only proves that the people demanded bounties for the soldiers of the Republic; it does not prove that they demanded increased compensation for members of Congress.

Mr. MAYNARD. I hope the gentleman will change one word, and say not "increased" bounties, but "equalized" bounties.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. Equalized and increased both; that is what I am for.

Mr. HILL. Will the gentleman now permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. I will; and I will take up this matter in detail. I am glad to see that my remarks are meeting with such general interest and having such an effect. We seem to be having a sort of class-meeting here, which I hope will be of benefit to some gentlemen.

Mr. HILL. I understood the gentleman to say—and I desire to learn if I understood him correctly—that the clause of the Constitution in relation to the compensation of members contains the word “shall;” that it says “Senators and Representatives shall receive a compensation for their services, to be ascertained by law,” &c.; and that he regards the receiving compensation as a part of the duty of a member, I so understood him; I want to know whether I understood him correctly.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. I read that part of the Constitution, and stated the fact that each member was sworn to support the Constitution. The gentleman can draw his own inference.

Mr. HILL. Now, I desire to ask the gentleman a question in reference to a case in point; the case of the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. COBB,] who declares that he has not drawn his pay, has not “received his compensation.” I wish to inquire whether his failure to perform that duty is such a failure in duty as to justify the expulsion of the member? [Great laughter.]

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. I am in favor of the impeachment of some officers of this Government, but I will reserve my opinion upon the question whether a member ought to be expelled for the reason assigned by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HILL] until that question shall arise in a case presented to the House.

I may say this, however, for the benefit of the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. COBB,] that he does not remedy the evil, even so far as he himself is concerned, by refusing to receive this pay, for it stands to his credit on the books of the Government and can be drawn by his administrator after his death. The only mode in which he can make his act effectual is to draw the money and then pay it back to the “conscience fund.” [Laughter.]

Mr. HILL. May I ask the gentleman if he has paid his increase of compensation back to the Government?

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. I have not, and I do not intend to, [laughter,] unless this Congress shall require by law that it shall be done. If any gentleman will introduce a separate bill for that purpose and it shall be found practicable and constitutional I will vote for it, and if it shall become a law I will comply with it. And I will say further, that I regard every proposition to encumber the bill or either of them which I have introduced by suggestions of this sort as having but one object; I will not say it is an improper object—yes, I will say it is an improper object—to defeat the bills which I have introduced.

Mr. DRIGGS. Will the gentleman allow me a word here?

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. I will yield, certainly.

Mr. DRIGGS. The gentleman said a few moments ago that if the compensation matter had been made a direct issue before the people I probably would not have “felt good” by being returned here. I say to the gentleman that it was made a direct issue in my district, and I told the people that I voted for it because I thought it was right. I told them that if $3,000 a year was right before the war, then $3,000 a year could not be right now, when it costs twice as much to live as it did before the war.

And when the gentleman says that the attention of the people was not drawn to this subject because other and more important issues were presented to them, and that the members who voted for this increased compensation were returned upon the other issues, I cannot see the force of his statement. Had the people believed that we were wrong in this respect and therefore desired to rebuke us, they could and doubtless would have selected other persons who were equally sound upon the important issues and sent them here as their Representatives. My people believed this increase of pay to be right, and gave me an increased vote where I met the question fairly and squarely.

Mr. COBB. I wish to avail myself of the courtesy of the gentleman from Ohio, to put a question to the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. DRIGGS.]

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. Certainly.

Mr. DRIGGS. I will answer the gentleman.

Mr. COBB. I desire to ask the gentleman from Michigan whether at the time the vote was being taken on this bill he did not state to some member—perhaps his colleague from the western district of his State, [Mr. FERRY,] whom I do not now see in his seat—that this money could with propriety be drawn and donated to the use of the soldiers; that members could vote for the extra pay, or ought to vote for it, and give the money to the soldiers?

Mr. DRIGGS. If I understand the gentleman's inquiry, he wishes to know whether at the time this bill was passed I did not intimate that if our pay was increased the additional amount could be given or ought to be given to the soldiers. I will state, in answer to the gentleman, that I never made any such declaration here or anywhere else. I voted steadily every time for the proposition to increase the pay. I hope this statement is definite enough.

Mr. COBB. It is definite enough. It differs, however, from my recollection. I have not referred to the record of the proceedings for some time.

Mr. DRIGGS. The gentleman's recollection is very faulty indeed if he recollects anything different from what I have stated.

Mr. COBB. I do not mean to impeach the gentleman's recollection, but my own.

Mr. DRIGGS. Well, I think the gentleman's recollection is very faulty. [Laughter.]

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, it may be, as the gentleman from Michigan has stated, that in his particular district this question was directly submitted to the people; and if so, he stands all right with his constituents. In that case I can only say that the opinion entertained by his constituents is not the opinion of a majority of the people of the loyal States.

After this long digression I will now resume the course of remark which I was pursuing when interrupted by the question of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL.]

The provision now sought to be repealed originated in the Senate by way of amendment to the miscellaneous appropriation bill, (Part V, Globe, pages 4074, 4076, 4143,) where it was agreed to by a vote of 23 to 13, with 14 Senators absent. (Globe, page 4145.) It was disagreed to in the House by a vote of 3 yeas to 114 nays, with 79 members absent. (Globe, 4258.) A committee of conference was appointed, (Globe, 4223, 4261,) who reported in favor of agreeing to it, (Globe, 4237, 4280,) which was rejected in the House by a vote of yeas 14 to nays 101, with 71 absent. (Globe, 4280.) Another committee of conference was appointed, (Globe, 4245,) who for a time disagreed, (Globe, 4246, 4247,) but finally reported in favor of it, (Globe, 4286, 4288,) which was agreed to in the House by a vote of 51 to 50, with 85 members absent, (Globe, 4288,) and in the Senate without any recorded vote, (Globe, 4247, 4248.) It was thus finally carried through, as every member knows, not upon or by virtue of its own merits, but because it was embraced in the report of the committee of conference, and coupled with a proposition to give bounties to the Union soldiers, for which in a more enlarged and liberal form every member of the Union party in the House had again and again voted, (Globe, 2827, 4193, 4259,) but which had been rejected as often by the Senate, (Globe, 3960, 4223, 4245.) Upon the report of the committee of conference we could not reject or vote against the increase of salary without also voting against the provision as to bounties, for the Speaker decided, and correctly, that a report of a committee of conference was not divisible. (Globe, 4287.)

Mr. HARDING, of Illinois. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him a moment just here in order to make a statement?

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. Yes, sir.

Mr. HARDING, of Illinois. I desire to say that when I voted against the report of the committee of conference at the time of its adoption in this House I did not believe in the view advocated then by other gentlemen, that it was the last opportunity we should have to obtain a bounty bill for the soldiers. I thought there was good reason to expect and believe that another report could be agreed upon which should give to the soldiers their bounty without increasing the pay of members. It was with this conviction that I voted against the bounty and against the increase of pay. I stated this position to my constituents, and I received from them an indorsement, as the gentleman from Michigan did from his constituents. My majority was quadrupled. So that the medicine works differently in different places. [Laughter.]

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. I agree with the gentleman. I think he is entirely correct. And, Mr. Chairman, I for one would have sat in this House until the expiration of the Congress, without any adjournment at all, in order to compel the Senate and this House to vote more liberal bounties to the soldiers, and to have kept that question entirely disconnected from the question of the increase of the pay of members of Congress.

In this condition of the question, as I was about to remark when interrupted, many, perhaps most of the votes in favor of the bill were so given solely to secure bounties to the soldiers.

The gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. FERRY,] when the vote was taken defined his position, equally applicable to others, by saying:

“Steadily and invariably I have voted against an increase of pay to members of Congress, because I am opposed to any increase in the present condition of our finances. Three times upon this very proposition has my vote been recorded against it. Now, it appears coupled with the increase of bounty to our gallant soldiers, which I heartily favor, but which I cannot vote for without also voting for the increase of congressional pay. The Senate insists upon this increase at the peril of bounty to our soldiers. There is no alternative but to vote for both or vote against both.”

For myself, I regarded the limited bounty provided by that bill as totally inadequate, and much less than justice to our brave soldiers. I preferred to vote against an increase of salaries in the hope that bounties alike liberal and just might thereafter be provided for all the soldiers of the Republic, the “hundred days’ men” of Ohio included.

To accomplish this I will cooperate with my colleague [Mr. SCHENCK] who has introduced a bill to secure that object. And I may add that because I desire to make the bounties liberal I will vote against all other bills which will add to the burdens or taxes of the people, except in those rare cases where justice or the public interests imperatively require it. I will do more than that; I will go with the committee on retrenchment and all others in every measure to reduce all useless expenditures and diminish extravagant salaries.

Our whole revenue system, with its cumbrous machinery of assessors, collectors, distillery inspectors, &c., is exhausting the energies of the people with salaries, some of which are too high in comparison with the wages of the laborers and producers of the country. The expenses of collecting the internal revenue for the last fiscal year, as we learn from the report of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, were as follows:

Assessors' compensation and expenses.....	$965,079 09
Assistant assessors' compensation.....	3,088,961 00
Collectors' compensation and expenses.....	2,161,710 14
Superintendents of exports and drawback.....	16,714 00
Revenue agents.....	35,453 79
Special agents assigned to this office.....	11,226 82
Revenue inspectors.....	121,073 70
Special revenue commission.....	22,086 60
Officers and clerks in this bureau.....	277,672 71
Stamps and cotton tags.....	177,089 55
Other incidental expenses of this office.....	40,093 02
Commission on sale of stamps.....	786,536 04
Total.....	$7,689,700 46

This is nearly two and one half per cent. of the total receipts, exclusive of drawback and sums refunded as erroneously collected.

I submit to the House statistical tables prepared at the internal revenue department, showing the amounts paid in Ohio for the principal assessors and collectors of internal revenue, which show also the necessity for speedy retrenchment:

REMARKS.—The amounts paid deputy collectors come out of the salary of the principal collector.

*This mark denotes the districts the reports for which are not on file in this office.

But let us begin the work of retrenchment in this Capitol. The recent increase of salary is not justified by the condition of the country or the judgment of those we represent. Prices are not now so high as during the war, when gold for a considerable period was at a much larger premium than now. No man then urged an increase of salary, though the necessity for it then was greater than now. If it be said the war was then upon us, requiring sacrifices alike of Congress and the people, I answer, the burdens of the war are yet upon us in the shape of a national debt of $2,700,000,000, with State liabilities besides, and obligations yet unperformed to the soldiers whose valor and perseverance saved the Republic in the hour of its greatest peril. Let us first be just before we are generous dispensers of the Treasury, of which we have been made the guardians if not the custodians.

If the policy of this Administration, as advanced in the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, should be speedily carried out, it would be impossible for the people to endure the taxation which they now so patiently bear, while they are permitted to share the benefits of a currency of "United States notes," or as they are generally called, "greenbacks," of $385,441,849, in addition to national bank notes, $292,671,758.

The report informs us that—

"The Secretary is of the opinion that the national banks should be sustained, and that the paper circulation of the country should be reduced, not by compelling them to retire their notes, but by the withdrawal of the United States notes" the "greenbacks," and the Secretary reminds us of—

"the discredit which attaches to the Government by failing to pay the notes according to their tenor."

If more than half of the best currency the people ever had, or can have, should be suddenly withdrawn, our national funded debt would necessarily be augmented to an equal amount, adding more than $20,000,000 to its interest, and consequently to our taxes, and what is of vastly more consequence, commercial revulsion and bankruptcy must inevitably follow. A general reduction in the prices of produce, the wages of the laborer and the mechanic would speedily follow, diminishing the means of liquidating taxes and the public debt, but at the same time increasing comparatively the load of the debt itself.

I cannot indorse that financial policy that would increase our burdens while diminishing the means of discharging them; yet the fact that this policy is urged, as the Secretary of the Treasury distinctly says, to secure lower prices generally, should admonish us that this is no time to enlarge salaries or expenses. It is not correct to charge upon the Government the "discredit" "of failing to pay its notes."

We learn from the report of the Secretary of the Treasury that the receipts and expenditures of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1866, were as follows:

RECEIPTS.

Balance in Treasury, agreeable to warrants, July 1, 1865.....	$853,309

Leaving a balance in the Treasury on the 1st day of July, 1866..... $132,887,548

The receipts for the quarter ending September 31, 1866, were $465,460,557, and the expenditures were $323,041,768, and the balance in the Treasury on the 1st day of October last was $142,418,789.

Here, then, in these receipts the Government redeemed in one year every dollar of the legal-tender "greenbacks," and again paid them out to a people willing to receive them. This currency is thus paid and again put in circulation, answering all the purposes of gold.

Unlike every other currency, it is a legal tender for debts and in payment of taxes, and thus has two values never imparted to any other paper money in our previous history. And now I have sufficiently shown that this increase of compensation was carried through, not on its own merits, but to secure limited bounties to meritorious soldiers deserving much more.

It is high time that this dangerous and vicious practice of coupling together different and distinct measures in one bill should be forever discarded. It secures legislation against the matured judgment of those who are unwillingly driven to give it "aid and comfort." It furnishes an excuse for evil legislation and a shelter from all responsibility. The evil is so apparent and so great that in several of the State constitutions, as in Ohio, it is expressly provided, that—

"No bill shall contain more than one subject, which shall be clearly expressed in its title."

And because this measure was thus passed we should now restore the law so as to conform to the judgment of the House. It is not to be presumed that the opinions twice solemnly expressed in July, before the elections, have since been changed, or that members could entertain one set of opinions before the elections and another after.

Mr. GRINNELL obtained the floor and said: I yield a portion of my time to the gentleman from Ohio, that he may conclude his remarks.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, we owe it to the great Union or Republican party of the country to restore the salary as it was before the act of July last. The Union party is not responsible for the increase. The proposition for that purpose originated in the Senate, on motion of the Senator from Delaware, Mr. RIDDLE, a Democrat, (Globe, page 4074,) and was adopted there by a vote as follows:

Union, (Republican,) ayes.....	14
Opposition, (Democratic,) ayes.....	9
Total.....	23
Union, (Republican,) nays.....	11
Opposition, (Democratic,) nays.....	2
Total.....	13

[Globe, 4145.]

In the House the vote stood finally as follows:

Union, (Republican,) ayes.....	35
Opposition, (Democratic,) ayes.....	16
Total.....	51
Union, (Republican,) nays.....	43
Opposition, (Democratic,) nays.....	7
Total.....	50

It is one of the merits of the act of July last that it reduces mileage one half. But a still further reduction is demanded alike by every consideration of justice and economy.

When the act of January 22, 1818, (3 United States Statutes, 401,) fixing mileage at forty cents per mile was under consideration in Congress, an effort was made to reduce it upon the ground that it was comparatively higher than the per diem of eight dollars.

But it was shown in the discussion that the mileage was then the least remunerative to members generally. In the discussion Mr. Harrison, of Ohio, (afterward President,) said:

"Gentlemen living on the stage line, whose votes had carried the reduction from nine to six [dollars for every twenty miles,] were perfectly unapprised, he believed, of the expenses and labors of those who were obliged to travel wretched roads with their own horses," &c.

Only a part of the members then enjoyed the luxury of stage-coaches; it was before the period of railways and canals. Now, staging is almost unknown, but railways and ocean, lake, and river steamers furnish speedy modes of travel, saving both time and money in comparison with the early modes of reaching the capital.

But even now, under the reduced mileage of the act of July last, the California and Oregon members will receive for a Congress of two sessions from $5,000 to $6,000, that is, from $2,500 to $3,000 for each session, while the actual expense of traveling from Portland, Oregon, to Washington, by way of Panama, and return, is less than $800, and requires about thirty days' time in coming and an equal time in returning.

Mr. BIDWELL. The gentleman will allow me to state the amount of my mileage—a little over $4,600.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. The gentleman from California [Mr. Bidwell] will observe that that is more than I have stated.

These are only examples of a class by no means small.

The act of July 13, 1866, allows to Army "officers traveling under orders where transportation is not furnished in kind," "ten cents per mile." (Laws of 1865-66, page 93.) This is an increase on prior rates, and is sufficient alike for Army officers and for members of Congress.

It is no part of my purpose to disparage the merits or undervalue the services of my associates here who so faithfully represent the interests of the people, of humanity, and justice in these Halls. I would make no appeal to prejudice or passion, but only invoke the deliberate judgment of this House on measures which it is a solemn duty to consider with the utmost candor.

The palpable fact that for almost every office under the national and State governments there are generally many applicants with proper qualifications, and with fortunes by no means ample, is conclusive evidence that the common pursuits of life are rarely ever more remunerative than the rewards of office.

Let us then restore the salary as it was, and retrace the public burdens in all practicable ways, and those we represent—the tax-payers of the land—the millions who by honest and patient toil are earning a support, and seeking a moderate competency, will greet us with the welcome salutation, "Well done, good and faithful servants."

Mr. GRINNELL resumed the floor, and made some remarks which he has withheld for revision. Before concluding his speech he yielded to,

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio, who moved that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. WELKER reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, having had under consideration the state of the Union generally and particularly the President's annual message, had come to no resolution thereon.

SALE OF PERSONS INTO SLAVERY.

Mr. SUMNER. I send to the Chair the following resolution, and ask for its present consideration:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be directed to consider if any action of Congress be needed, either in the way of legislation or of a supplementary amendment to the Constitution, to prevent the sale of persons into slavery for a specified term by virtue of a decree of court.

By unanimous consent the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. SUMNER. Before the vote is taken on the resolution, I desire to call the attention of the Senate to certain facts that have already become more or less familiar to the public. For instance, I hold in my hand an original notice sent to me from Maryland, which is as follows:

PUBLIC SALE.—The undersigned will sell at the court-house door, in the city of Annapolis, at twelve o'clock m., on Saturday, 8th December, 1866, a negro man named Richard Harris, for six months, convicted at the October term, 1866, of the Anne Arundel county circuit court for larceny, and sentenced by the court to be sold as a slave.

Terms of sale, cash.

WM. BRYAN,
Sheriff Anne Arundel county.

December 3, 1866.

But this case does not stand alone. Here is another case on a still larger scale to which my attention has been called by a correspondent, who states that the persons mentioned in the advertisement which I am about to read were sold in his presence, before his very eyes. This is as follows:

PUBLIC SALE.—The undersigned will offer for sale at the court-house door in the city of Annapolis, at eleven o'clock a. m., on Saturday, 22d December, 1866, a negro man named John Johnson, aged about forty years. The said negro was convicted at October term, 1866, of the circuit court for Anne Arundel for larceny, and sentenced by the court to be sold in the State for the term of one year from 12th of December, 1866.

Also a negro man, convicted as aforesaid, named Gassaway Price, aged about thirty years, to be sold for a term of two years in the State.

Also a negro woman, convicted as aforesaid, named Harriet Purdy, aged about twenty-five years, to be sold for a term of one year in the State.

Also a negro woman, convicted as aforesaid, named Dilby Harris, aged about thirty years, to be sold for a term of two years in the State.

Terms of sale, cash.

WM. BRYAN, Sheriff.

December 15, 1866.

It seems to me, sir, that these cases throw upon Congress the duty at least of inquiry; and I wish that the Committee on the Judiciary, that reported to this body the constitutional amendment abolishing slavery, would give us their opinion on the validity of these proceedings, and the necessity or expediency of any further action of Congress in order to prevent their repetition. I do not know that the civil rights bill, which was afterward passed, may not be adequate to meet these cases; but I am not clear on that point. At the time the constitutional amendment was under consideration I objected positively to the phraseology there introduced. I thought it was an unhappy deference, if I may so express myself, to an original legislative precedent at an earlier period of our history. I regretted infinitely at the moment that Congress was willing, even indirectly, to sanction any form of slavery. But I presume that the Senate, at the time they passed upon that amendment, supposed that the phrase "involuntary servitude, except for crime whereof the party has been legally convicted," was simply applicable to ordinary imprisonment. At the time I feared that it was not exclusively applicable to what we commonly understand by imprisonment, and that it might be extended so as to cover some form of slavery. It seems now that it has been so extended, and I wish the Committee on the Judiciary to consider whether the remedy can be applied by an act of Congress or whether we must not go farther and expurgate that phraseology from the text of the Constitution itself.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, the eastern States, especially Massachusetts—I wish to make no reflection upon the other States—have often furnished examples to the other States of the Union, and many of the other States of the Union have very willingly followed the examples thus set. The advertisements just read are very good copies of advertisements which in former years appeared in most of the eastern States, and especially in the State of Massachusetts, as any one will see who will take the trouble of reading the old files of newspapers or looking into Moore's "History of Slavery in Massachusetts." Now, sir, the Legislature of Maryland, I believe, has not been in session since the adoption of the civil rights bill, and the law authorizing these proceedings was on their statute-book. The Constitution of the United States provides that persons may be sold into slavery or involuntary servitude for crime, and I apprehend that there is nothing in the Constitution to prevent the proceedings in the State of Maryland, whether those proceedings be wise or unwise. We have a similar statute in our State; but since the passage of the civil rights bill, although there have been a number of negroes convicted for crime, they have not been sentenced, simply on account of the existence of that civil rights bill, and a number of them are now in jail. I have just received a copy of the message of the Governor of my State, in which he recommends an amendment of the State laws so as to obviate any difficulty in the administration of the criminal code growing out of the fact that the culprits may be negroes.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I have no objection to the reference of the resolution proposed by the honorable member from Massachusetts; but, except by a constitutional change, and that made in more comprehensive terms than has ever yet been adopted or even suggested, I doubt whether the evil, if it be an evil, can be corrected. Maryland has abolished slavery by constitutional enactment; the people of the United States have also abolished it in the same way; but the question whether the abolition of slavery deprives a State of the power of punishing, by a sale of his services, a criminal is quite another inquiry. The constitutional amendment of the United States seems to suppose that there may be slavery or involuntary servitude for crime. The term "slavery" is not used, I believe, but involuntary servitude is abolished, except as a punishment for crime.

If "involuntary servitude" means slavery, it is difficult to see why the exception does not authorize the existence of slavery in an individual if he has committed a crime and the Legislature of the State where the crime is committed makes that a mode of punishment.

There is no immediate necessity, I think, as the honorable member will see, if he does not already know what I am about to mention, for taking any decisive steps in the cases to which he has adverted so far as Maryland is concerned. The parties who have been advertised, as stated by the honorable member from Massachusetts, were tried for the offenses alleged against them in the proper court at Annapolis, the circuit court for Anne Arundel county, convicted by a jury, and the punishment of sale was inflicted under the provisions of a statute which has been upon the statute-book there from the beginning of the State government. It has been supposed, however, that the judge violated the Constitution of the United States, or in some way violated the civil rights bill. That is a question of law. He has been proceeded against under the civil rights bill. He has been, or is about to be, indicted in the circuit court of the United States for that imputed offense, and his case will there be tried—and tried, I suppose, at a very early period—and will afterward be brought to the Supreme Court of the United States. When that decision is pronounced we shall know whether this species of punishment can be inflicted now; and if the court decide that it may be inflicted now, then we shall be able to decide whether it is advisable by constitutional modification or provision to prohibit such punishment in the future. I do not see, therefore, that my friend from Massachusetts will accomplish his purpose more speedily by the measure he proposes than by waiting for the action of the judiciary. The judge of that circuit in Maryland has also been called before the Commissioner of the United States under the civil rights bill, and has given bail for his appearance there. There is a certainty, therefore, that the question will be tried, and speedily tried. There will be no difficulty in getting the Supreme Court of the United States to act upon it, for whatever may be the state of legislation which renders it difficult or impossible to have some classes of cases there tried, that difficulty will not exist so far as relates to an appeal from the circuit court of the United States in Maryland, or from the superior court of that State if the case should go from there, under the twenty-fifth section of the judiciary act, to the Supreme Court of the United States.

I say in conclusion, Mr. President, and the member from Massachusetts I am sure will not be displeased to know that, that perhaps there is no State in the Union in which there is a more fixed determination that slavery, in the common acceptance of the term, slavery of the innocent, slavery on account of color, slavery on any account except for crime, shall not exist than there is in Maryland; but it is possible that the people of Maryland may think there is very little difference between consigning a man to a short term of slavery for an offense and locking him up in the penitentiary for twenty or thirty years or hanging him. I think it very probable that if the party offending was given the choice he might prefer the first instead of the second, and certainly instead of the last; that is, he would prefer serving another for a short time, when he would again become a freeman, to being hung, when of course nobody could tell what would become of him in the future. [Laughter.]

Mr. FESSENDEN. Allow me to ask the Senator if the punishment of which he speaks extends to white persons.

Mr. JOHNSON. I think it does; I am not sure.

Mr. CRESWELL. No, sir; it does not.

Mr. JOHNSON. The whipping did, I know, at one time. They do not whip now. If there is a difference, if that is the state of the law now, the Legislature of Maryland is in session, and I have no doubt they will change it. I am not for whipping. I have seen it administered upon white men as well as black men, and it is a horrible exhibition, in my opinion. So far as the party charged is concerned, perhaps he would prefer it to the amount of punishment which exists in other States. If there be a distinction between black and white with reference to this kind of punishment, I have no doubt the Legislature will promptly correct it—I am sure they ought to do so—or if they do not, then the question will arise whether it does not fall within the inhibition of the civil rights bill, and whether the courts will enforce that measure.

Mr. CRESWELL. With regard to the evil complained of by the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, I have a very decided opinion, and that is, that it has already been provided against by the constitutional amendment. I cannot imagine that any reasonable interpretation given to the phraseology used in the constitutional amendment could justify any such practice as has been attempted and acted out in Maryland. Those words have received an interpretation for the last eighty years by reason of their application to the northwest territory, and, so far as I am informed, a case has never been presented where a human being was placed upon the block and sold publicly to an individual to oblige him to perform involuntary service to that individual by way of punishment for crime. I ask my honorable friend from Ohio if that has ever been the case in his State.

Mr. SHERMAN. No, sir.

Mr. CRESWELL. I apprehend and have always understood that a fair interpretation of those words—

Mr. SHERMAN. I have not seen the case, but I understand a case arose either in Indiana or Illinois, and the court there decided that the "involuntary servitude" referred to must be performed under the direction of the State authorities, in the way of punishment, and must be rendered to the State.

Mr. CRESWELL. That is precisely the point I intended to make, that the words "unless for crime" applied to the phrase "involuntary servitude," and signified only that sort of involuntary servitude which a culprit may be obliged to render to the State, and never intended to authorize any individual, by reason of a decree of court or a public sale, to hold any other human being in bondage. That is my acceptance of those words, and I think it is the proper one. Therefore, under my interpretation of them, when the constitutional amendment is enforced by "appropriate legislation," which perhaps the civil rights bill may effect, there will be no difficulty with regard to any of this class of cases. If the civil rights bill is not sufficient to effect that purpose, then certainly it is incumbent on us to provide, under the accompanying clause to the amendment of the Constitution, for all this class of cases. I sincerely trust, therefore, that this resolution will be adopted, and that the committee may report at an early day.

While I am up I desire to say one word in regard to a remark which fell from my honorable colleague. He stated that in Maryland perhaps equally with any other State in the Union, [Mr. CONNESS. More.] more than in any other State in the Union, there was a disposition to dispense with all the ramifications and all the evil influences resulting from the old system of slavery. I trust in God that that is the case; nevertheless, I much doubt it. We shall see very soon what action will be taken by the Legislature, which convened yesterday, in regard to the remains of the black code now standing upon the statute-book of Maryland. We have in some measure reformed it; but the law under which these decrees have been passed, and under which these sales have been made is a relic of that code in its very worst aspect; and I apprehend that the spirit that prompted the selection of that mode of punishment, when there is an option given to the court, is the lingering spirit that the institution of slavery has begotten and cherished during the long years of the early history of the Government. It has been selected, I say, under this statute, which applies only to the negro race, with a view, as I believe, to test the question as to how far they may go under the constitutional amendment. I hope that that question may be tested to the utmost, and if any further legislation is necessary on the part of Congress, either by bill or by constitutional amendment, that we shall not hesitate a moment to adopt it, in order to eradicate every vestige of this old spirit.

Mr. SUMNER. The remarks of the Senator from Maryland [Mr. JOHNSON] seem to me to justify entirely the proposition which I have made. I have simply called the attention of the committee to what was already notorious, but with a view to action on their part. I am not sure myself that under the constitutional amendment this abuse may not be justified. I do not pronounce any positive opinion, but I desire to have the opinion of the committee after ample consideration.

This, sir, is not the first time, however, in which incidents like this have occurred. I remember that many years ago, when I first came into this Chamber, the people that I represent were shocked very much by reading that four colored sailors of Massachusetts had been sold into slavery in the State of Texas. I did what I could to obtain their liberation, but I did not succeed. I applied directly to the Senator from Texas at that time, who will be remembered by many as a very able gentleman, General Rusk, by whose side I sat on the other side of the Chamber, and he openly vindicated the power of the court to make such a sale, and I have never heard anything of those poor victims from that time to this hour. Under the operation of the constitutional amendment I trust they are now emancipated, but I am not sure of that, since they are in Texas.

The resolution was agreed to.

PRINTING OF BANKRUPT BILL.

Mr. POLAND submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That five hundred additional copies of House bill No. 538, and the amendments thereto, proposed by the Committee on the Judiciary, be printed for the use of the Senate.

LAND GRANTS FOR RAILROADS.

Mr. HOWARD submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Lands inquire into the sufficiency of existing laws to protect the interests of the United States in lands granted for the benefit of railroad companies before patents have issued, and also in lands occupied for homesteads before the title has passed to the claimant, and that they report by bill or otherwise.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a report of the Secretary of War, communicating, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of December 17, 1866, reports of the assistant commissioners of freedmen and a synopsis of laws respecting persons of color in the late slave States; which, on motion of Mr. WILSON, was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore also laid before the Senate a report of the Secretary of War, communicating, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of July 24, 1866, information touching the probable cost of constructing a railroad on the route mentioned in the charter of the Northern Pacific Railroad Company; which, on motion of Mr. TRUMBULL, was referred to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad.

PEONAGE IN NEW MEXICO.

Mr. SUMNER. Mr. President, I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be directed to consider if any further legislation is needed to prevent the enslavement of Indians in New Mexico or any system of peonage there, and especially to prohibit the employment of the Army of the United States in the surrender of persons claimed as peons.

I ask for the present consideration of the resolution.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to its consideration.

Mr. SUMNER. Mr. President, I desire to call the attention of the Senate to important facts under that resolution. I think you will be astonished when you know that the evidence is complete that at this moment in a Territory of the United States there is a system of slavery which a proclamation of the President has down to this day been unable to root out. During the life of Mr. Lincoln I more than once appealed to him to exercise his power as the head of the executive, to root this evil out of the Territory of New Mexico. The result was a proclamation and also definite orders from the Department of War; but in the face of that proclamation and of those definite orders this abuse has continued, and according to the official evidence it seems to have increased. I have in my hand the report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, from which I will read a short passage. I read from page 83:

"On the subject of peonage, the qualified slavery still prevalent in New Mexico, authorized by its laws and encouraged and practiced by its people, officials of Government, and natives of the United States as well as those who have been 'to the manor born,' Mr. Graves's statements, with the evidence presented therewith, are such as to leave no doubt of the duty of Congress to take the matter in hand and deal with it effectually. This office has done all that lay in its power by promulgating the order of the President forbidding the practice, and all the other Departments of the Government issued like directions to the officers responsible to them; but in spite of all this it is clear that the practice still continues to a greater or less extent."

Mr. CONNESS. Will the Senator state the date of the report he reads from?

Mr. SUMNER. It is the report of this year just made—the report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs submitted to Congress at the opening of this session.

Then there is the report of the special agent, J. K. Graves, which is made to the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, in which he expresses himself as follows:

"Upon the subject of peonage I have given considerable thought; and inasmuch as this pernicious system of slavery still exists to an alarming extent in all parts of the Territory of New Mexico Government should at once adopt vigorous measures tending to its immediate abolition."

"The citizens here, although strictly enjoined to give recompense for all service, will nevertheless cling tenaciously to their old customs, and unless the Government, in adopting a definite policy relative to this remaining blot upon the otherwise fair scroll of freedom, sends a special power to the Territory to direct and superintend the practical details of the work of improvement the system will continue for years to come, and be marked with all its present degrading tendencies."

"A practice, sanctioned by territorial law, has obtained by which the whites are encouraged to make volunteer expeditions or campaigns against the Indians. Theoretically those participating in these raids are rewarded with the plunder obtained, but should report at the territorial offices all the captives; while practically, in most cases, the captives are either sold at an average of seventy-five to four hundred dollars, or held in possession in practical slavery. This state of things of course keeps up a state of hostility among the Indians. The intervention of Congress is asked to put a stop to this practice."

Again, in another place he says:

"This system, either in the ordinary Mexican form, that of a state of continual imprisonment or service for debt, or in that of practical enslavement of captive Indians, is the universally recognized mode of securing labor and assistance." No less than four hundred Indians are thus held in Santa Fé alone. Their treatment varies with the whims and feelings of their holders. Sometimes they are doubtless better off than when free. The arguments to sustain the system are the same as those formerly used in behalf of slavery. In spite of the stringent orders of the Government the system continues, and nearly every Federal officer held peons in service. The superintendent of Indian affairs had half a dozen. The practice of Federal officers sustained it."

It is to that that I desire to call particular attention. In the resolution which is now on your table, sir, I specially ask the action of the committee with reference to the employment of the Army of the United States in the surrender of fugitive peons. A correspondence is given in the report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs which illustrates this. Here, for instance, is a letter from N. H. Davis, assistant inspector general United States Army:

LAS CRUCES, August 22, 1865.

The commanding officer of Fort Selden will allow, and assist if necessary, the bearer, Don Pedro Garcia, and retain and take in his charge his peon, Antonio Rodriguez, if at said post.

By command of General Carleton:

N. H. DAVIS,

Assistant Inspector General United States Army.

To that we have the following reply:

HEADQUARTERS FORT SELDEN,
NEW MEXICO, August 22, 1865.

COLONEL: Yours of to-day requiring me to assist in my official capacity in taking or delivering to a citizen a peon is received. I desire to be informed explicitly whether I am to take this as a precedent and to deliver to any person claiming the person of another.

This is directly contrary to civil law. The laws of the Territory, according to my recollection, have made it a penal offense to return a man to another claiming him as his own. The President of the United States has abolished involuntary servitude; it is certainly contrary to the established rules and regulations of the Government under which we live.

I should like some instructions on this point, if you require me to return those who have escaped from involuntary servitude. It is directly contrary to my opinion of law and justice, and I will only do it on positive and unmistakable orders.

I am, colonel, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

J. H. WHITLOCK,

Captain First Veteran Infantry, California Volunteers, Commanding.

Colonel N. H. DAVIS,

Assistant Inspector General, Las Cruces, New Mexico.

Then to that we have the reply of this assistant inspector general of the United States, in which he undertakes to lay down the law and the Constitution; and I am sorry to understand that he is a Massachusetts man:

INSPECTOR GENERAL'S DEPARTMENT,
DEPARTMENT OF NEW MEXICO,
CONCORDIA, TEXAS, September 1, 1865.

Your letter of the 22d ultimo has been received, in which your premises taken are wrong and your reasoning fallacious. Peonage is voluntary and not involuntary servitude. The Constitution of the United States or the proclamation of the President does not prohibit it. The statute law of the land expressly recognizes this servitude. It is an apprenticeship, or an agreement between the master and servant, and not only can the master arrest and take his servant peon, but the civil authorities are commanded to arrest and deliver the peon to his master when deserting him. (See Laws of New Mexico, chapter twelve: contracts between master and servant, passed by the Legislative Assembly, 1853 and 1859.)

Mr. CONNESS. Those statutes have been repealed, have they not?

Mr. SUMNER. The Senator from California reminds me that they have been repealed.

Mr. CONNESS. I think so.

Mr. SUMNER. But this learned officer who lays down the law treats them as still existing.

Mr. CONNESS. I will state to the Senator that, if repealed—and it is my impression they have been—it has been only very recently.

Mr. SUMNER. This learned officer then proceeds:

You now hold a civil prisoner arrested by military authority. The question is not whether peonage is a good or bad kind of servitude; it is whether it is recognized by law, and whether when a peon had swindled his master out of a large sum of money and deserted him, taking shelter at a military post, the commander thereof would, by extending the courtesy of aiding or acting for the civil authorities in surrendering the culprit, violate any obligation of law or duty. It seems that in the case in question he would not.

You ask for explicit instructions, and make use of disrespectful and threatening language. The first will be granted, and the latter this time overlooked.

You are hereby directed so far to aid in the rendition of peons when claimed by their masters, or there is a reasonable cause to believe they have deserted them, as not to allow them to remain on the military reservation. These instructions will be faithfully executed, in spirit as well as letter, without evasion.

By command of General Carleton, commanding Department of New Mexico.

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

N. H. DAVIS,

Assistant Inspector General United States Army.

Captain J. H. WHITLOCK,
Commanding Fort Selden, New Mexico.

The special Indian agent who reports this correspondence very aptly adds:

"The aid of Congress is invoked to stop the practice."

I hope the Department of War will communicate directly with General Carleton, under whose sanction this order has been made, and I hope that our Committee on the Judiciary will consider carefully if any further legislation is needed in order to meet this case. A presidential proclamation has failed; orders of the War Department thus far have failed; the abuse still continues, and we have a very learned officer in the Army of the United States undertaking to vindicate it.

Mr. CONNESS. I wish to say a single word (as the morning hour is nearly closed and we cannot go to other business) in connection with the pending resolution offered by the Senator from Massachusetts. The officer spoken of and mentioned, Captain Whitlock, is personally known to me, and his communication, which has been read, is but additional evidence to me of his great personal and official rectitude as a public servant. It is also known to me, as it has been for perhaps four years past, that the administration of military affairs in the Territory of New Mexico has been a standing disgrace to this Government. I have made efforts in the direction of a change—all the efforts that I was capable of making; but in all the applications and in all the presentations I have made, both to the President and to the War Department, I have found that at every point the case was, to use a common term, blocked. There was no such thing as even inquiring into the administration of General Carleton in New Mexico. While the war went on I had supposed there was some excuse for this, but now when it is over there is no longer excuse, and this record presented here this morning is but one single additional fact in the whole line of maladministration in that Territory. I think it is a fact. I think I have evidence in my position that this officer, high in command in the United States Army and in the administration of its military affairs, is personally interested at this time, and has been, in leasing and letting to the Government of the United States the houses they use and the posts they occupy upon their own land.

But, sir, I did not intend to more than call attention to the matter. I have failed utterly in all the attempts I have been able to make in getting such attention to the subject as would lead to a correction. I hope that this inquiry will go in that direction and finally be effective.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Mr. President, I have no disposition to resist the investigation the Senator from Massachusetts desires, but it seems to me that, as this is a complaint against the Army and the manner in which its officers are discharging their duties, it more appropriately belongs to the Military Committee, and I suggest to him that he had better send it there. I do not see what the Judiciary Committee can do with it. Military commanders certainly have some authority to meet the case. General Grant or the President can supersede the officer there at any time; the Secretary of War has the means of having his orders enforced. I understand the Senator to state that the Secretary of War has issued orders and that they are not obeyed. I presume that the military laws provide the means of enforcing the orders of the War Department, and I am quite sure that if they do not, his colleague, who is at the head of the Military Committee of the Senate, can very soon provide a law that will give the Secretary the power to enforce his orders.

Really, it is not a matter of which the committee to which the Senator proposes to refer it has any peculiar knowledge. It would be groping in the dark. It is not a subject familiar to the members of the committee; and if it has connection with Indian or military affairs it seems to me it had better go to one of those committees, who are familiar with the manner in which Indian affairs are conducted and are familiar with the conduct of our officers belonging to the Army who are in the Indian country. I suggest that it had better take one of those directions.

Mr. SUMNER. I was not entirely clear as to the committee to which this reference should be made. I at first indeed thought of the Committee on Indian Affairs, and I then thought of the Committee on Military Affairs; but I finally selected the Committee on the Judiciary on this ground: the constitutional amendment proceeded from that committee, and such legislation as we have since had by virtue of that amendment has proceeded from that committee; and it seemed to me, therefore, that perhaps that was the proper committee to consider whether the constitutional amendment had full application to this case, and whether any further legislation was necessary in order to carry it practically into this Territory.

That was the consideration that governed me when I selected the Committee on the Judiciary. I still think that logically and according to the course of business in the Senate it properly belongs to that committee; but if the Senator from Illinois is not disposed to consider it, if he objects to having it referred to the Judiciary Committee, I am perfectly willing that it should go to either of the other committees. My special object is to bring it before the Senate, and I have occupied the time that I have today very reluctantly; but still from a sense of duty, feeling that it was important that these documents and facts which I have laid before you should be presented. Having presented them, I thought that the committee would have before it the materials on which to begin its inquiry, and that the inquiry would be to a certain extent of a judicial character. It would be whether under the Constitution and existing laws of the United States this abuse was prohibited and whether any further legislation was needed in aid of that which we already had. If the committee on inquiry should consider that the abuse under the Constitution and existing laws is prohibited, such a report would then throw a responsibility upon the executive branch of the Government. However, if the Senator perseveres in his desire that the reference be changed I shall consent.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The Senator does not understand me as objecting to the inquiry at all; but I desire to ask him whether he has any doubt that the law sufficiently provides against this abuse. On his own statement of the case, a subordinate officer disobeys a proclamation of the President and orders of the War Department. Does the Senator from Massachusetts mean to imply a doubt as to whether that subordinate officer has a right to do that by sending it to the Committee on the Judiciary to inquire into it? Is there any doubt about it?

Mr. SUMNER. I have no doubt about it. Mr. TRUMBULL. Then it seems to me that we ought not to let that officer suppose there is any doubt about it by referring the matter to a committee to inquire whether any legislation is necessary. If there is no doubt about it let the Committee on Military Affairs inquire why this officer does not obey the orders of his superior and the laws of the land as they exist. It seems to me that is the proper direction for it.

I make no objection to the inquiry; the Senator must not understand me as objecting; but it does seem to me that it implies a question whether he is not justified in the course he has pursued. I do not understand that a subordinate officer in New Mexico is justified under any circumstances in disobeying a proclamation of the President and orders of the War Department. I understand the case to be, according to the Senator's statement, that an officer in New Mexico has done so.

I merely make the suggestion to the Senator from Massachusetts that the proper committee to make any inquiry in the case would be the Military Committee, for it seems that it is a case of disobedience of orders. The Senator himself has no doubt that the law already sufficiently provides, if it be enforced, for the case.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour having expired, it becomes the duty of the Chair to call up the unfinished business of the last day's session which is Senate bill No. 456.

Mr. SUMNER. I hope we shall have a vote upon this resolution. I will let it go to the Committee on Military Affairs. ["Agreed."]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs by common consent, no objection being interposed.

ADMISSION OF NEBRASKA.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The unfinished business of the last day's session is Senate bill No. 456, for the admission of the State of Nebraska into the Union, which is now before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, the pending question being on the motion of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HENDRICKS] to postpone its further consideration until Monday, the 7th of January, and make it the special order for that day at one o'clock.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I do not care about insisting on that motion. If it is the pleasure of the Senator from Ohio to go on with the consideration of the bill I have no objection to its consideration. I merely suggested that day as being a day after the adjournment.

Mr. SUMNER and others. Let it go over.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I suppose the Senate is so thin that the Senator from Ohio would scarcely desire to go on to-day.

Mr. WADE. The Senate is very thin to-day, and I do not know that it would be right to press the bill in a thin Senate; but I shall insist whenever it is taken up again that both it and the Colorado bill be disposed of, if I am able to do it. I shall have no objection to its going over to Monday with that understanding. I will not resist the motion to postpone until Monday, the 7th, and make it the special order for that day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is the motion as it now stands.

The motion was agreed to.

SELECTION OF JURORS IN UTAH.

Mr. WADE. I now move to take up Senate bill No. 404, for the purpose of having an amendment offered by the Senator from Michigan, [Mr. HOWARD.]

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 404) to regulate the selection of grand and petit jurors in the Territory of Utah, and for other purposes.

Mr. HOWARD. I offer an amendment to the bill which has just been taken up, and I desire that it may be printed. The amendment consists of several additional sections. This is an amendment to be offered when the bill is taken up for consideration. I desire to have it printed.

The motion to print was agreed to.

Mr. WADE. I did not have the bill taken up with a desire to go on with it now, but simply that the amendment might be printed so that we may all see it. I shall ask, however, that it be taken up at an early day and pressed to a final decision whenever the Senate will agree to do so. I move now that the bill lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

TENURE OF OFFICE.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish to give notice that I shall to-morrow morning ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 453, to regulate the tenure of office. I think it quite important that the bill should be considered, and I hope Senators will be ready to begin to-morrow its consideration.

LAND OFFICE REPORT FOR DISTRIBUTION.

Mr. RAMSEY. There is a resolution on the table offered on the last day of the sitting of the Senate providing for printing an extra number of the report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office. I hope it will be taken up now.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution, reported by Mr. STEWART on the 20th of December, 1866, from the Committee on Public Lands:

Resolved, That there be printed of the report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, with the accompanying large connected map, five thousand copies in the German language, five thousand copies in the French language, five thousand copies in the Swedish language, and five thousand copies in the English language, for distribution in foreign countries; and five thousand copies for the use of the Senate; and the Secretary of State is requested to cause the distribution of the aforesaid twenty thousand copies through the commissioner of the Paris Exposition, or such other persons as in his discretion he may deem proper.

Mr. SUMNER. Since that resolution was before the Senate my attention has been particularly called to its character by a gentleman who is very much interested in it, who is himself a foreigner by birth and very familiar with the ways in which foreign population should be approached. He thought that the publication of all the Land Report, with which he was very familiar—he had read it and thought it a very fine report—but he thought that its publication and translation into foreign languages would be entirely unnecessary; indeed, that it would be useless, that there was but one part of it that would be of any essential service in promoting emigration; that was the part relating specially to the homestead law and the sale of public lands; that all the rest would be regarded as irrelevant and out of place, and that it would be a useless expense. He thought that our purpose would be better accomplished if we should provide for the publication of only the part to which I have referred. That would of course be less expensive, and it would be more sure of being read and of attracting attention. I unite with my friend from Minnesota in a desire to put before the people of foreign countries the knowledge to which he refers; but I wish that it should be done in the way the most economical and the most practical, and he knows as well as I that very important facts and information may be lost as it were in an immense mass of published matter, which people will not read. If you wish to produce an effect and to reach people, make your reports short, direct, practical, and print only that which bears directly on the points which you have in hand.

I throw out these remarks now for the consideration of my friend from Minnesota. I do not wish to interfere with the resolution at all. I am in favor of its adoption in such form as after consideration shall be deemed best; but I do submit to him that the resolution in the present form will carry us into a needless expense, and will not in the end accomplish so much good as the publication of a small part of the report.

Mr. STEWART. I have taken some pains to ascertain the cost of the publication proposed by this resolution, and have before me the letter of the Superintendent of Public Printing on that point. The estimate which he makes of the cost is $27,297 25 for the publication of twenty-five thousand copies, as provided in the resolution. I have read this report of the Land Office, I will say, with great interest, and it is a matter of pride to the American people that there should be there collected together so much valuable information with regard to our agricultural and mineral resources, and the facilities for settlement which our country presents to those who wish to come among us. I have no doubt this publication will bring back many times its expense in inducing that kind of immigration which we need for the development of our country, and I doubt very much whether any condensation of it can be made which will present it in a more readable form. I think the whole report is exceedingly interesting; it is clear in statement and easily understood, and the information which it is desirable to circulate can be found not only in detail, but in condensed form in the report, and I believe it is in as good form for publication as we can possibly get it. I regard it as a matter of great importance that this publication should be made. The Committee on Public Lands were unanimously of the opinion that the whole report ought to be published, and I hope the resolution will pass.

Mr. GRIMES. I desire to inquire of the Senator from Minnesota, who has this resolution in charge, in what language the five thousand copies that are to be published for the use of the Senate are to be printed.

Mr. RAMSEY. The language usually recognized by the Senate—the English language, the language of the Government. The provision is for printing five thousand copies in German, five thousand copies in French, and five thousand in one of the Scandinavian languages, and then five thousand copies for the use of the Senate. But the honorable Senator from Iowa is mistaken; I have not charge of the resolution. It was offered by the Senator from Nevada. I have a great desire to see this publication made. I think it will be of great use in inducing immigration to our Territories in the West. The whole book is of immense importance, and I think it should not be mutilated and scraps published. I say this in reply to the honorable Senator from Massachusetts. Every part of this report is, I think, of direct interest to the people in Europe who propose emigrating to this country.

Mr. GRIMES. I suppose that the people whom I have the honor in part to represent are as much interested in foreign immigration as the people of any other State, and I imagine that I have been about as familiar for the last twenty-five or thirty years with that subject as almost anybody here; and I agree fully with the friend of the Senator from Massachusetts, whoever he may be, that the scheme suggested by him, in order to reach the people who are likely to be emigrants, is the only feasible one that has been proposed. Why, sir, if this book be published in the Scandinavian, German, and French languages, how many people do you suppose it is going to reach who have any idea of ever emigrating to this country? If you want to secure emigration by it, if that is the purpose to be accomplished, you must have a compilation that can be put into the hands of the man who desires to emigrate—not a great book; a statistical volume.

Then I doubt exceedingly whether you have devised here the proper method of distribution. It is proposed that these books, when they shall be printed, with the accompanying maps, shall be sent to this great glorification institution at Paris, and thence be distributed, without any specific method devised as to the manner in which the distribution shall be made. If you had a little compilation of the volume which you could send to your consuls at Bremen, Basle, and other shipping points and interior points whence the emigration comes, for those consuls to put into the hands of those persons who are likely to be emigrants, and if you placed with them money for the purpose of providing for the publication of information in the local newspaper, you would accomplish some good; but you will never accomplish anything by sending out five thousand copies in these different languages to somebody at the Paris Exposition, to be distributed among the sight-seers who may go to the Paris Exposition next summer.

Mr. STEWART. The resolution contemplates other modes of distribution besides that. It is left with the Secretary of State to distribute it otherwise. The reading of the resolution, I think, will relieve the Senator of that difficulty.

Mr. GRIMES. Why not leave the whole subject to the Secretary of State? Why not allow him, through the gentlemen in his Department, who it is supposed are to make the translation of this book, to publish just such parts of it as he believes will be of advantage to the Government? Why do we choose to burden the Government with the expense of publishing this large volume for distribution in Europe? It seems to me we ought to be satisfied that it is not going to be of any benefit in the hands of the emigrant. It may be of some advantage to be placed in some local libraries in Europe, but not for the purpose of securing that which we profess that we desire to secure by the passage of the resolution.

Mr. CONNESS. Mr. President, in circulating intelligence among any people, the modes and channels through which it is to pass are essentially local in their character and can never be fully understood or known by other peoples. Our duty in this case, as it appears to me, if we propose to send out information of the character proposed in this resolution, is to send out the information through the best instrumentalities that are at our disposal for giving it circulation in the countries to which we desire to send it, and then depend upon those local modes for its distribution. It is in vain that we can expect to put the facts most interesting, no matter what shape we give it, into the hands of each person who desires to emigrate to the United States from any foreign country. We cannot expect that. It is proposed now in this case that we limit the publication to certain parts of this report; and it was stated by the Senator from Massachusetts, who informs me that he has not read the report, that he was told there was but a certain small portion of it which was useful for the purposes in view. I differ very much with the source of the Senator's information. I have read and examined this report, and it is, as I think, one of those complete presentations of the whole subject from which you can take no part without doing it injury. The expense will be as nothing compared to the benefits that must necessarily result. I do not believe that we can make any investment of public money so profitable as the one proposed. I hope the publication will be authorized.

The resolution was adopted.

MILWAUKEE AND ROCK RIVER CANAL.

Mr. HOWE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate joint resolution No. 102, construing and giving effect to the joint resolution entitled "A resolution for the relief of the State of Wisconsin," approved July 1, 1864.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate resumed the consideration of the joint resolution, the pending question being on the motion of Mr. TRUMBULL to reconsider the vote by which the Senate passed the joint resolution.

Mr. TRUMBULL. When this matter was up the other day I commenced to make a statement about it. I have called at the Clerk's desk this morning for the papers. In order to arrive at an understanding of the matter it is necessary to state the facts, but the papers do not seem to be with the resolution. It is a matter about which there was a difference of opinion in the Committee on the Judiciary; and in my judgment the claim is not one which the United States ought to pay at all. It is a question whether $25,000 shall be paid out of the Treasury of the United States to a company formed in Wisconsin to construct a canal. The Senator from Maryland [Mr. JOHNSON] will probably recollect it. We had it before our committee. I think he was in favor of paying it; I am not so sure as to that. There was a difference of opinion in the committee, and a majority were in favor of paying it; but in order to make a statement of the case, as it occurred some time ago, it is necessary that we should have the papers, and I suggest to my friend from Wisconsin to lay it aside until the papers can be found.

Mr. JOHNSON. Permit me to ask if the resolution did not pass.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Yes; it passed without any discussion in the Senate. I was not present when it passed. There being a difference of opinion in the committee, I thought it due to the Senate that the facts should be stated on the question of reconsideration. When that is done, I shall be satisfied if the Senate vote for the payment of the money. In the meantime, however, as the papers are not here and I cannot state as clearly as I would like to do the facts in regard to it without the papers, I suggest that it be laid aside until the Clerk finds them. He will probably get them in a few minutes. In the meantime, if my friend from Wisconsin will consent, I will move that we proceed with the consideration of House bill No. 828, to repeal the thirteenth section of the confiscation act.

Mr. HOWE. This motion rather crowds me. I do not wish to urge the Senator from Illinois forward in the consideration of this particular resolution unless he can put his hands upon the papers which he needs to comment upon the resolution; but this resolution passed at the last session of this Congress, and my friend from Illinois interposed a motion to reconsider the vote by which it passed. It was one of the last days of the session, and I was not enabled to get a vote upon that motion to reconsider during the session. It has gone over until this time, and it is now the second of the three months of the session. I think the Senator, instead of moving to postpone the further consideration of this resolution, if he wants these papers, ought to consent to let it lay aside informally until he ascertains whether he can find the papers and not take up another matter that will lead to debate.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I do not wish to delay action on this joint resolution. It had entirely escaped my recollection, until it was called up the other day, that it stood on my motion to reconsider it. I have no earthly interest in it and will not delay it one moment. These papers that I speak of are not papers in my possession. The Senator from Wisconsin will want them quite as much as I do, or the Senate will. The Senate certainly will not vote $25,000 out of the Treasury of the United States without knowing what it is about, and the resolution itself does not show anything at all about it. We want the papers. Senators certainly will not just simply vote because somebody brings in a resolution to pay $25,000. The Senator from Wisconsin will not ask it.

Mr. HOWE. Let it be laid aside informally.

Mr. TRUMBULL. These are papers that are on the files of the Senate and that ought to be here when we consider the resolution. I will say to the Senator from Wisconsin that I will not delay the matter. I have no such intention. I regret that it should have gone over the former session. It was probably inadvertently that it went over; I do not know; the Senator from Wisconsin may have had it upon his mind, but I had not. The only reason why I made the motion to reconsider was that the resolution had passed without consideration in the Senate and had passed when I was not present, and the views of the minority of the committee who disagreed to reporting in its favor were not presented to the Senate. I am willing that it should be laid aside in any way; I do not wish to delay it at all.

Mr. HOWE. Very well; I consent to that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is suggested that the joint resolution before the Senate be laid aside informally. It requires common consent. The Chair hears no objection to that course, and the resolution is laid aside informally. The question now is on the motion of the Senator from Illinois; to proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 828.

The motion was agreed to, and the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 828) to repeal section thirteen of "An act to suppress insurrection, to punish treason and rebellion, to seize and confiscate the property of rebels, and for other purposes," approved July 17, 1862, was resumed by the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, the pending question being on the amendment of Mr. SAULSBURY, to strike out all of the bill after the enacting clause and to insert in lieu thereof the following:

That the act entitled "An act to suppress insurrection, to punish treason and rebellion, to seize and confiscate the property of rebels, and for other purposes," approved July 17, 1862, be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

Mr. HENDRICKS. If I recollect correctly, that amendment was proposed by the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. SAULSBURY.] He is not in his seat now. He was a few minutes since. I think he intended to discuss the amendment briefly. The Senator from Illinois may know the fact. I submit to him whether he desires to press the bill now. The Senator from Delaware was complaining of not having been well during the recess, and perhaps he has gone out on that account; I do not know.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The Senator from Maryland [Mr. JOHNSON] I think had the floor on this bill. The Senator from Delaware was in his seat this morning.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I know he was, and he was complaining of having been unwell, though I did not understand that he was unwell to-day; he may be; I do not know. He offered amendment, I believe.

Mr. TRUMBULL. We must proceed with some business. There are a great many Senators absent. I do not wish to take advantage of the absence of Senators.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is advised that the Senator from Maryland [Mr. JOHNSON] was discussing the bill at the expiration of the morning hour, when the bill was last under discussion.

Mr. HOWE. I propose that the Senate resume the consideration of Senate joint resolution No. 102. I find on inquiry at the desk that there are no papers in the custody of the Senate. If there were any papers before the committee they were those used upon the hearing there. I am informed at the desk that this resolution was offered by myself and referred by the Senate to the Committee on the Judiciary and by the committee reported back; and the resolution itself is the only paper in the possession of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That joint resolution having been laid aside informally by common consent, the Chair thinks it is in the power of any Senator to demand its consideration again and to bring the subject before the Senate. The joint resolution (S. R. No. 102) construing and giving effect to the joint resolution entitled "A joint resolution for the relief of the State of Wisconsin," approved July 1, 1864, will be therefore considered as before the Senate, the question being on the motion to reconsider the vote by which this joint resolution was passed.

Mr. TRUMBULL. If the Senator from Wisconsin insists upon going on with this resolution I shall not object, though I think it would be better to wait till we have the papers here. I know the fact that there were papers before the Committee on the Judiciary. I was opposed to this report, and I know the fact that those papers were sent with the resolution. I do not know what has become of them.

The question is a somewhat complicated one; but I will try and make such of the Senators as will listen to me for perhaps ten minutes understand the reason why I think this money ought not to be paid. It is a proposition to take $25,000 out of the Treasury and give it, I think, to the canal company. I am not quite sure that it gives it to the canal company. I will read the resolution:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the resolution entitled "A resolution for the relief of the State of Wisconsin" dated July 1, 1864, be so construed as to entitle the Milwaukee and Rock River Canal Company to reimbursement, out of the canal land fund therein mentioned, for the amounts which are proved to have been paid out by it for interest in carrying on the work mentioned in said former resolution in the same manner as for other sums by it expended. Also for the amount which is proved to have been expended by it in necessary repairs and management of the canal after the date of said resolution, but before the date of the settlement made thereunder: Provided only, That said company shall not receive more than the amount of the residue of the trust fund arising from the sale of the canal lands charged against said State in said settlement and not heretofore paid over to said company; and the Secretary of the Department of the Interior shall complete the settlement by making said further allowances to said company up to the amount of said residue of said canal lands fund, and the same shall be paid to said company out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

I was under the impression that the resolution limited it to $25,000, but it seems it does not. It would perhaps appear to do so by construction if we had all the papers here to show how much this trust fund amounted to; but as the Senator from Wisconsin insists upon going on without them, I cannot state the amount at this time. I am not sure whether it is $25,000.

The case, Mr. President, is about this: some years ago, when Wisconsin was a Territory, this canal company was chartered by the territorial Legislature, and a grant of lands was made by Congress to the Territory of Wisconsin for the purpose of making this improvement on condition that the improvement should be made. It so turned out that the improvement was not made; the proceeds of the lands were squandered. In process of time a dispute arose between the canal company and the State of Wisconsin, the State of Wisconsin being responsible to the United States for the value of the lands in case they were not used to make this improvement, and the improvement failed. The State of Wisconsin and the canal company got into a controversy, and they came to Congress and asked Congress to settle the difficulty between them; and singularly enough, Congress entered in to make the settlement between the canal company and the State of Wisconsin and authorized an officer of the Government—perhaps the Commissioner of the General Land Office, but I cannot state positively, having none of the papers here—to make a settlement between the State of Wisconsin and this canal company. Congress directed that in making the settlement the State should be charged what she had received for these lands, but not less, at any rate, than $1 25 an acre, which was the minimum price at which the Government sold lands. The Commissioner charged the State with these lands at $1 25 an acre. In this settlement the State was to have a credit for all the money that the company had expended in undertaking to make their improvement. The Commissioner went on and made the settlement, and allowed a credit for every dollar that the company ever expended, and they have got it.

Now what more is wanted? The Commissioner said they were not entitled to interest on the money they borrowed to make the improvement with, but this canal company say they were. They say, "we were a poor company; we could not make the improvement; it is true we had these lands, but we had to go and borrow money, and we paid extravagant rates of interest—ten per cent.—in order to get money to make the improvement that has never been completed, and now we insist that we shall be paid back the interest that we paid out." The Commissioner decided that the law—there was a resolution passed on this subject—did not authorize him to allow interest to this company. The amount they now claim, my recollection is, is $25,000. Am I not right about it?

Mr. HOWE. Twenty-four or twenty-five thousand dollars.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Under the law his decision was that they were not entitled to interest. I think his decision was right. I think if any member of this body were to agree to purchase a house in this city and to pay for it what it cost he would not suppose that he had not only to pay the actual amount of money which was paid out for the construction of the building, but also any rate of interest which the constructor had paid for the use of the money which he used in the putting up of the building. I do not think the resolution of Congress intended to refund any interest of this kind.

This statement presents about, as I now recollect it, what the question in controversy is. I think, in the first place, the Government of the United States should have had nothing to do with this settlement between this canal company and the State of Wisconsin; but I am not going back now to complain of the legislation of Congress. Congress thought proper to undertake to settle these accounts and appointed an officer of the Government to do it. That officer has made the settlement. It is not satisfactory to this company because they have not got, as they say, the interest which they paid on the money which they borrowed to make the improvement, and that amount claimed is about twenty-five thousand dollars. I think that the officer of the Government—the Commissioner of the General Land Office I believe it was, but I am not sure—who decided it, decided it correctly, and that nothing more is justly due this company.

The CHIEF CLERK. Here are the papers.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The papers have come to light, I understand.

Mr. HOWE. The recollection of the Senator from Illinois is not entirely accurate in reference to the history of this claim. He is quite correct in saying that many years ago Congress made a grant of land to the Territory of Wisconsin for the purpose of constructing a canal in Wisconsin. He is entirely incorrect in supposing that the State of Wisconsin was charged with any responsibility about that growing out of the failure to construct the canal. The State of Wisconsin was not in existence; the grant was made to the Territory; and the Territory was expressly directed by the terms of the grant to dispose of the land and to pay the money over to a particular agent named in the act, to wit, the Milwaukee and Rock River Canal Company. The only thing possible for the Territory to do in compliance with the act was to sell the land and pay the money over to the company. What the company did with the money was a matter over which the Territory had no control. But it was required that the canal should be built; if not built the Government was entitled to receive the lands back, and the State might make herself liable to pay for the lands if, when the Territory became a State, she by an act of her Legislature accepted the terms of the grant.

The State never did accept the terms of the grant. Long before the State came into existence the work was proved to be a failure. And the State had no controversy with the canal company, none whatever; and we never applied to Congress to settle any difficulty with the canal company. The State claimed that the United States owed her five per cent. of the net proceeds of the public lands disposed of within her limits, and we asked the United States to pay that simple claim which you paid to everybody else. They had an account in the Interior Department showing precisely what it was, but they would not pay it. Why? Because they said the United States had made this grant of lands to the Territory to build the canal; the canal had not been built, and the lands had not been paid for. The State answered that she was not responsible for building the canal, and was only responsible for the right use of the money received from the grant. A portion of the lands granted had been sold by the Territory, and part of the money had been paid over to the company, as the act making the grant directed; another portion had not been paid over; and the State said, "We are undoubtedly responsible for this money which we have received from the lands and which we have not paid over to the company; that money is in our hands; it does not belong to us." The canal company said, "It belongs to us." We rather thought it belonged to the United States. At all events, and inasmuch as we received the lands from the United States, we thought we ought to account to the United States for the lands. The question was a question between the canal company and the Government of the United States, which owned the money in our hands that we had not paid over. That was the question which Congress was called upon to settle and did settle by the resolution of July 1, 1864. That resolution I have. There you decided that that money, to the extent of the expenditures made by the canal company, belonged to the company; that it was a fund put in the hands of the Territory for the express use of that company in the execution of that work; and if they put their own money in lieu of the money derived from those lands they ought to have the money derived from the lands to that extent; you decided that; here is your resolution; you said then this:

"That the Secretary of the Department of the Interior shall, in adjusting the amount due the State of Wisconsin under existing laws as five per cent. of the net proceeds of sales of the public lands within her limits, estimate and charge against her the value of the one hundred and twenty-five thousand four hundred and thirty-one and eighty-two one hundredths acres of land granted to the Territory of Wisconsin to aid in the construction of the Milwaukee and Rock River canal, which have been sold by said Territory or said State at $1 25 per acre, and as much more as the Territory and State received upon the same upon sales of any part thereof at a higher price."—

He was to charge us with this quantity of land at $1 25 an acre, and if we sold any of it for more than $1 25, to charge us that extra sum—

"and shall credit said State with the amount that has been legally and properly applied by said State or Territory toward the cost of selling said land and toward the construction of said canal."

That is the way the Secretary was to settle with us; give us credit for the five per cent., charge us with the lands at what we got for them less the amount which it cost to make sale of the lands and the amount which we had paid over to the company. Well, then, about the company:

"And the said Secretary shall also settle and allow to the Milwaukee and Rock River Canal Company such sums of money as have been properly expended by said company in the survey and location of said canal, in the construction thereof as far as the same has been constructed, together with dams, locks, and slack-water navigation, and in the management and keeping the same in repair; and the same shall be paid to the said canal company out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, not exceeding in amount, however, the balance charged against the State of Wisconsin upon the sales of said canal lands, as above required, after deducting the sum allowed said State for money paid by her out of the same fund."

That is the way you proposed to treat the canal company. When you had set off against what you owed us on the five per cent. fund the amount of money in our hands derived from the canal grant, that money was then in your hands; it was then in the Treasury of the United States, and you directed here that out of that fund, to the extent of it, should be paid this claim of the canal company; for what?

"Such sums of money as have been properly expended by said company in the survey and location of said canal, in the construction thereof as far as the same has been constructed, together with dams, locks, and slack-water navigation, and in the management and keeping the same in repair."

Under that resolution the Secretary of the Interior undertook to adjust this account.

Mr. HENDRICKS. The Commissioner of the General Land Office.

Mr. HOWE. The Commissioner of the General Land Office acting under the instructions of the Secretary of the Interior. The Secretary of the Interior is the officer mentioned in the act. The company said that some of the money they expended they had borrowed under the charter which created the company, for it was chartered by the Legislature of Wisconsin; but that charter was sanctioned by the Congress of the United States. In that charter they had authority to borrow money; they did borrow money, and of course when they borrowed money they had to pay the money and had to pay interest on it. The Senator from Illinois says they paid extravagant rates of interest. I never heard that asserted before. The other day I believe the Senator made the same remark when undertaking to open this question; but upon inquiry I am instructed that only seven per cent. was ever paid by the company, except in one instance for a small sum of money, I forget whether $150 or $1,500. Lawful interest is all they expect to recover, however. They expect to recover that simply because they paid it. Being authorized to borrow money, they did borrow money; and having borrowed money they had to pay it back, and they had to pay interest on the sum they borrowed. Now to the extent that this fund is unexpended they say they have just as good a right to the interest they paid as they have to the money they put into the work; and the question before the Senate is whether they have that right under the terms of this resolution which I have just read to you, for the only purpose of the present resolution is to explain the resolution that I have just read.

It is not to grant any new right; it grants no dollar of money to anybody; its purpose is to declare what was the meaning of the act you passed in 1864. That did not make a grant. That prescribed what was the right of this canal company under previous laws of the United States. If this company have the same right to recover the interest they have paid out that they have to recover any other money they paid out in the prosecution of this work, then you ought to vote for the resolution before the Senate, because that is what this resolution declares. If they have not, if there is a distinction to be made between the money they put into a dam directly and interest paid on money that they borrowed and put into a dam, then this resolution ought not to receive the assent of the Senate.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mr. President, two or three years ago this subject was before the Committee on Claims, and as a member of that committee I investigated it, it having been referred to me for that purpose. I thought that the adjustment between the State and the company ought to be made and ought to be made upon equitable principles. I thought there were principles which were administered in courts of equity peculiarly applicable to the relations between the company and the State in regard to the lands that had been granted by Congress in 1838, and I concur with the Senator from Wisconsin in the opinion that both as a question of law and a question of equity the resolution now before the Senate ought to pass, or rather that the motion to reconsider ought not to prevail.

In 1838 Congress made a grant of land to the Territory of Wisconsin to aid in the construction of this canal. It was held by the Department to be the plain meaning of the law that the Territory was but a trustee for the canal company because of this fact: in the early part of that year the Territory of Wisconsin organized or created the company known as the Milwaukee and Rock River Canal Company, and authorized it to construct a canal so as to connect the waters of the lake with Rock river; in that act of incorporation the territorial Legislature authorized the company to borrow money on interest; and also expressly authorized the company to apply to Congress for a grant of land in aid of the enterprise; and in pursuance of that authority in the act of incorporation the company as a company memorialized Congress for lands, and upon the memorial of the company the lands were granted to the Territory to construct that particular canal. So that it was always held, and very properly, that the Territory became a trustee for the company in the management and disposal of those lands. Some time afterward the territorial Legislature refused further to carry out the trust; having sold part of the lands, refused by a resolution to pay the proceeds over to the canal company, and directed the officers of the Territory not to pay over any money upon future sales. Here, then, was money in the hands of the Territory and afterward in the hands of the State arising out of a trust fund. Because the territorial Legislature and the State of Wisconsin refused to pay over this trust money the canal company found itself out of means and under the power given in the act of incorporation borrowed money. If the money in the hands of the Territory and of the State arising from the sale of these lands had been handed over to the company it would not have needed to borrow money; but it had to borrow money because of the refusal of the State and of the Territory to recognize the trust which the act of incorporation and the act of Congress both recognized. This was a thing that Congress thought ought to be corrected; Congress thought this was wrong; and the Senator from Michigan [Mr. HOWARD] in a report made to the House of Representatives, as far back I think as 1842, clearly laid down the obligation of the State of Wisconsin and of the Territory in regard to this trust fund; and I incorporated that report in the report which I made to the Senate two years ago upon this claim.

When the State of Wisconsin asked to be admitted into the Union she asked that certain lands granted for internal improvement purposes might be made, at the pleasure of the State, a school fund instead of an internal improvement fund. Congress agreed to that, but upon the express condition that the State should settle this claim with the canal company in regard to this trust fund. That is found in the act admitting the State of Wisconsin into the Union, and made her right to the five per cent. fund depend upon her settlement of this trust fund, so that Congress became in fact a court of chancery in regard to the trust fund by the very act admitting the State of Wisconsin. It was for that reason I thought Congress had to settle this question. For that reason I differed with the Senator from Illinois, who thought that Congress ought not to settle a question between the State and the company. I thought Congress had undertaken to settle it in the act admitting the State of Wisconsin, making it a condition of her right to her five per cent. fund from the sales of public lands that she should settle this equitable claim of the canal company.

Upon this whole case the joint resolution of July 1, 1864, was passed, and it provides how the adjustment shall be made: that the State of Wisconsin shall have her five per cent. fund, but there shall be taken out of it this trust fund; the State shall first be charged with all the lands she has sold, one hundred and twenty-five thousand acres; she shall then be credited with the money she paid over to build the canal; then the company shall have the money it expended in building the canal, in keeping it in repair, building locks, feeders, &c. When it came to be settled the Commissioner of the General Land Office said he would not credit the canal company with the interest which it paid upon money which it borrowed, and which it was compelled to borrow because the trustee refused to pay over the trust money in her hands; and how any Commissioner of the Land Office could decide that I was not able to see.

Mr. JOHNSON. Who was the Commissioner?

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mr. Edmunds. That is just the question here, whether the canal company under this act was entitled to the interest which it paid upon money which was borrowed under an express authority given by the territorial Legislature of Wisconsin to borrow money, and which it borrowed because the State and the Territory refused to pay over the trust fund. It seemed to me too plain to admit of discussion.

The question that the honorable Senator from Illinois suggests cannot come before the Senate now, because this whole subject is under the control of Congress. It comes under its control by the resolution passed two years ago, and by the act admitting the State into the Union. It is a matter that we must control, and we alone. Here is a sum of $24,000, as I understand, money that was realized by the State from the sale of these trust lands. That money is in the Treasury. It has not been paid over to the State, nor has it been paid over to this company. The company claims that it should be paid over to it under the resolution of two years ago, for interest which it paid upon money which it borrowed to carry on the work. The company was to be indemnified for all moneys expended by it in the construction of the work; and it is a simple question for a lawyer to decide whether a cestui que trust who borrows money because the trustee will not pay over money in his hands shall lose the interest, or whether the trustee shall be charged with interest upon that borrowed money. What lawyer could question that? The State of Wisconsin had the money in her hands. By an act of her Legislature she refused to pay it over for the purpose of building this canal and the company had to borrow money. Under an authority in the act of incorporation the company borrowed the money. The Commissioner of the General Land Office says that in a settlement between the trustee and the beneficiary interest thus paid is not to be accounted for. That is the simple asked question.

Mr. TRUMBULL. If one will look over this Senate I think he will be satisfied that this is a very improper manner to consider claims of this kind. This claim, whatever it may be, ought to go to our Court of Claims or to some place where it would be judicially investigated. There are perhaps a dozen Senators here present, not a quorum certainly; and of those here present, not half a dozen pay any attention to the consideration of this question.

Of course there is little encouragement to attempt to explain it, or to get the views of those who disagree with the Senator from Indiana, or for him to get his views before the Senate, so that the body can vote understandingly.

I have looked into the papers in this case since I was up before. The circumstances had passed out of my mind somewhat when the resolution was called up, and I was then unable to state all the facts about it. I have since looked at the papers carefully; and sitting as a judge on the bench I should no more think of allowing this claim to a party than I could think of handing $25,000 to any man on Pennsylvania avenue who might come here and ask for it. That would be my view. The Senator from Indiana is equally clear that the claim ought to be paid equitably and legally. It seems otherwise to me, and because it seemed so to me I made this motion to reconsider, in order that the Senate might, if it would listen to it, see what the case was. I think it is very simple. If we leave out these five per cent. funds that have really nothing to do with the case we could get at it.

The Senator from Wisconsin said that the State of Wisconsin had not anything to do with this matter; that it was a matter which affected the Territory of Wisconsin, and that in a part of the statement I had made I was correct and in a part of it I was not correct, and that was one of the respects in which he corrected me. I have referred to the statutes since and I have been enabled to go through the papers, and I think I can now make a statement that will be accurate and succinct and may be understood by those who listen to me.

In 1838, on the 18th of June, Congress passed a law granting to the then Territory of Wisconsin one hundred and odd thousand acres of land for the purpose of making this improvement. The land was not granted to any canal company; it was granted to the Territory of Wisconsin for the purpose of making an improvement. It was provided in that law:

"That whenever the Territory of Wisconsin shall be admitted into the Union as a State the lands hereby granted for the construction of the said canal, or such part thereof as may not have been already sold and applied to that object under the direction of the territorial government, shall vest in the State of Wisconsin, to be disposed of under such regulations as the Legislature thereof may provide."

Then the grant of land was to the State of Wisconsin as well as the Territory.

Mr. HOWE. No, Mr. President, I am even yet more familiar with the history of the case than my friend is.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Undoubtedly.

Mr. HOWE. And I have given it more careful examination. I will say to him here that none of it was vested under that act in the State of Wisconsin. What had not been sold by the Territory and vested in private hands at the time the State of Wisconsin was created was set off to the State as a part of the university lands—a part of the five hundred thousand acres which go to every new State for university purposes.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The State, then, got it. The State was the successor of the Territory.

Mr. HOWE. No, sir.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Yes, sir; the State was the successor of the Territory in all its rights.

Mr. HOWE. No. The fact which I want my friend to comprehend is, not that the State succeeded to the rights of the Territory under this grant, but that the State got this balance of land as an express grant and the United States got the benefit of it because we took it as a part of the five hundred thousand acres. If we had not taken these lands we should have taken just as many acres of other lands.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I do not wish to complicate this matter with the five per cent. fund, with which it has nothing to do. The land was granted by the act of 1838 to the then Territory of Wisconsin to make this improvement, and it was provided in the act that that land should go to the State when the State should be admitted into the Union, and it was provided further:

"That the State of Wisconsin shall be held responsible to the United States, and for the payment into the Treasury thereof, of the amount of all moneys received upon the sale of the whole or any part of said land, at the price at which the same shall be sold, not less than $2 50 per acre, if the said main canal shall not be commenced within three years and completed within ten years, pursuant to the provisions of the act creating said canal corporation."

What was that? That the State of Wisconsin should be held responsible for these lands provided the canal was not commenced and completed within a certain period. The canal was not commenced and completed within that period, it is admitted. The State of Wisconsin is held responsible for the lands. What then? She does not want to pay for them.

Mr. HOWE. I will just ask my friend to read the following section of the act of 1838 and he will see why we maintain that the State was not liable. Read the sixth section.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The sixth section is the one I have just read. Do you want me to read the seventh section?

Mr. HOWE. Yes, read the seventh.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The seventh section is: "That in order to render effectual the provisions of this act the Legislature of the State to be erected or admitted out of the territory now comprised in Wisconsin Territory, east of the Mississippi, shall give their assent to the same by act to be duly passed."

I do not know what that has to do with it; perhaps the Senator will show. They accepted the lands; they did not complete the work. What then? They are responsible to the Government for this money. They do not want to pay it. They get into a difficulty with their canal company and they come to Congress and ask Congress to settle it, and the Senator from Indiana here gravely rises and says, "Congress is the proper body to enter into a judicial investigation, to resolve itself into a court of chancery to inquire how this canal company expended their money and settle it upon equitable principles." We grant a tract of land to a State to make an improvement on condition that the State shall pay us for the land if the improvement is not made. The improvement fails, and the State modestly comes here and says, "The company we contracted with did not do it, and now we want you to settle between us and them and resolve yourselves into a court and hear the testimony and make a decree." Do you not think we are a competent body to do that? "We understand all about it." Well, but the Senator says we have committed ourselves to do that. It is true that two years ago we passed a resolution that we would undertake to make this settlement; that is, we authorized the Commissioner of the General Land Office to do it. Now I will refer to that law. It is entitled, "A resolution for the relief of the State of Wisconsin;" and what is it?

"That the Secretary of the Department of the Interior shall, in adjusting the amount due the State of Wisconsin under existing laws, as five per cent. of the net proceeds of sales of the public lands within her limits, estimate and charge against her the value of the one hundred and twenty-five thousand four hundred and thirty-one and eighty-two one-hundredths acres of land granted to the Territory of Wisconsin to aid in the construction of the Milwaukee and Rock River canal, which have been sold by said Territory or said State at $1 25 per acre, and as much more as the Territory and State received upon the same upon the sales of any part thereof at a higher price, and shall credit said State with the amount that has been legally and properly applied by said State or Territory toward the cost of selling said land and toward the construction of said canal. And the said Secretary shall also settle and allow to the Milwaukee and Rock River Canal Company"

Now, the Government of the United States undertakes to settle with that company. What have we got to do with that company? We undertook to settle it and we have got into this difficulty about it; a matter that I do not think Congress was ever competent to settle, but we undertook to settle it.

"And the said Secretary shall also settle and allow to the Milwaukee and Rock River Canal Company such sums of money as have been properly expended by said company"

We are to decide that here to-day what has been "properly expended." We are the chancellors to determine that question. Have you the evidence before you, Senators, to know whether this money was properly expended, whether it was judicious? I will read in a moment some of the disputed items that you may see—

"properly expended by said company in the survey and location of said canal, in the construction thereof, as far as the same has been constructed, together with dams, locks, and slack-water navigation, and in the management and keeping the same in repair; and the same shall be paid to the said canal company out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated."

Now we are going to pay money to the canal company out of the Treasury of the United States under this resolution—

"not exceeding in amount, however, the balance charged against the State of Wisconsin."

The second section provides:

"That the Commissioner of the General Land Office be, and he is hereby, appointed Commissioner to adjust the accounts herein provided for, under the supervision of the Secretary of the Interior, and to determine what sum shall be charged to said State of Wisconsin for the lands granted for the construction of said canal, and what sums shall be credited respectively to said State and to said company for the moneys expended by them in the construction of said locks and canal, as herein provided."

There is your court. The Commissioner of the Land Office, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, is constituted a court to determine what sums should be allowed. The Commissioner of the General Land Office, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, has carefully examined and determined what sums shall be allowed, and they appeal from the decision of the tribunal erected at their own instance for the relief of the State of Wisconsin and come here now to this Senate and ask you to overturn the judgment of the tribunal that was created to settle the claim at their own instance. Are you prepared to do it? I ask you, Senators, if you are prepared to do it. Are you prepared to say that the Commissioner of the General Land Office decided wrong? that the Secretary of the Interior decided wrong? What evidence have you got to predicate it upon? There is no report accompanying this resolution. Tell me now upon what you are going to vote $25,000 out of the Treasury, as it is said; but I will show you in a moment the claim is $77,133 09, when we come to get the papers. That is the claim. On what ground are you going to vote that the Commissioner has decided wrong and that the Secretary of the Interior has decided wrong? You must do it on the ground that you, as a court of appeals, have looked into the testimony, have seen what was properly expended, and have become satisfied that the tribunal created at the instance of Wisconsin has done injustice. As I said before, I think we are a very poor tribunal to do that.

But if we must decide it, let us see now what the points of difference are. Here is the report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, approved by the Secretary of the Interior, in which he states that he has examined and adjusted an account between the United States and the Milwaukee and Rock River Canal Company under the resolution which I have just read for the relief of the State of Wisconsin. He goes on to charge them with the lands, and credits the canal company with the moneys they expended, and then he makes up this statement of the difference. I wish every Senator would take this paper and read it. What is the first item? He has allowed $76,492 77; the company claims $153,625 86, leaving a difference of seventy-seven thousand and odd dollars; and this difference consists in these items:

"The amounts charged on account of expenditure for repairs, &c., subsequent to the date of the resolution, and consequently in no way can be held to fall within its scope—twenty-nine hundred and odd dollars.”

It was right certainly to disallow that. I will not read all these items, but I will read another:

“Account charged January 11, 1855, as due and payable to D. H. Richards, special agent of the company, for general management of the company business. Disallowed, because for the same period Mr. Richards was paid periodically a stipulated salary as president and superintendent for a large portion of the time, was also allowed and paid for extraservices from time to time, traveling and other expense incurred, all of which were no doubt intended to complete his full compensation. This is not, then, a proper expenditure under the terms of the resolution, having been wholly unknown to Congress when the matter was under consideration, it not having appeared in the accounts of the company until after the resolution of July 1.”

Are you prepared, Senators, to vote to have that paid? There is a claim of $11,174 for extra pay for managing this business by a man who has been paid a stipulated salary all the time, and also extra compensation for mileage and traveling. Your Commissioner disallowed it.

Mr. HOWE. We do not ask for it.

Mr. TRUMBULL. You do not ask for it? You did ask for it.

Mr. HOWE. We never asked for it.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It is in your account.

Mr. HOWE. Not our account.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The account presented to the tribunal created at your instance and sent finally here.

Mr. HOWE. Not at our instance.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I should like to know who presented the account if you did not.

Mr. HOWE. The canal company.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Well, it is the canal company that wants this money; it is the canal company that is after it.

Mr. HOWE. Not the State.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I am sorry that the State of Wisconsin is being dragged into it. Now, if the State of Wisconsin wants to pay the canal company $11,000 or any other sum for the services of this Mr. Richards, about whom I know nothing—he may be entitled to it for aught I know—let the State of Wisconsin do it. Then comes this interest item; let me read it.

“The fifth item in this account is the amount charged on account of sums paid out from time to time by the company for interest. Disallowed, because interest forms no part of the cost of the survey.”

Do you think it does?

“Disallowed because interest forms no part of the cost of the survey, location, construction, or management of any such public work, and is never charged in these accounts, the same being a liability of the company and not an expenditure on the work. Its payment is not provided for in the resolution, and is against the policy of the Government and Congress, unless expressly provided for in the statute.”

That item amounts to $21,000, and it was very properly disallowed in my judgment.

There is this case. I do not think we ought to open it; but if it is to be opened anywhere let it be opened in the Court of Claims. If this is a just claim let it be referred there; I should have no objection to that course. Let it go to the Court of Claims and if, under the resolution we have already passed, whereby Congress undertook to settle this matter, this company or the State of Wisconsin is entitled to this money, let them have it. The amount of the claim here, as I have stated, is some $77,000. The resolution does not state the amount that is to be allowed, but it provides that it shall not exceed the value of the lands, and by a computation I understand that will reduce it to about twenty-four or twenty-five thousand dollars. I have not made the computation, but the Senator from Wisconsin says that the extent of the claim will not exceed $25,000. I think that it ought to be stated in the resolution.

Mr. HOWE. Twenty-four thousand eight hundred dollars.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I think it should be stated in the resolution, if it is to pass, that the amount shall not exceed that; but I trust we shall either refer it to the Court of Claims or refuse to pass it. I shall take up no more time with it.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I am always unwilling to differ with my friend, the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, and it was with deep regret that I was compelled to differ with him when this subject was before the committee and the resolution which he proposes to have reconsidered was recommended. The amount which he mentions as calculated to awaken the attention of the Senate, $77,000, is not now the question before us. The balance of the proceeds of the lands (which alone is to be used for the purpose of meeting this claim of the canal company) in the Treasury is only some twenty-four or twenty-five thousand dollars. The limitation in the original resolution was that the allowance should not exceed that amount. The same limitation is to be found in the resolution which we passed at the last session. If, therefore, the resolution should not be reconsidered, all that could be paid to the canal company would be the balance in the Treasury, which as I have said does not exceed twenty-four or twenty-five thousand dollars.

Mr. TRUMBULL. They will come for the rest afterward, I suppose.

Mr. JOHNSON. My friend now proposes to remit it to the Court of Claims. The result of that might be, and would be, if the claim be a just one, that instead of having to pay $25,000 we should have to pay $77,000, provided the Court of Claims thought the claim was a just one. But I wonder that the honorable member did not see that the argument against interfering with the claim now founded upon the fact that it had been passed upon by a tribunal constituted by Congress for the very purpose of acting finally is equally powerful against the suggestion to refer it to the Court of Claims; but there is nothing, as I think, with due deference to the member, in his suggestion. We are just as competent as the Court of Claims to pass upon a legal question, that legal question simply being the construction of a resolution which we have antecedently passed.

Whether that resolution does or does not entitle these claimants to this fund depends upon the meaning of that resolution. That meaning is in no manner to be affected by any fact about which there is any dispute. It has not been denied, and is not now denied, that it was the duty of the Territory in the first instance, and of the State in the second, to contribute out of the fund in question toward the construction of the canal. That they declined to do. It was not denied then, and cannot be denied now, that it was the duty of the company to construct the canal, and it being their duty to construct it it was of course a part of their duty to get the means with which to construct it. The means supplied by Congress were the proceeds of these lands. Those means were placed in the hands, first of the Territory, and then of the State, and each of them in their order was directed to pay over as much as might be necessary to the canal company to enable the company to complete the canal. That they refused to do. Now, as between individuals, I should suppose there would be no doubt that this would be the law when they came to adjust the transaction as between themselves: A has placed in his hands by his principal a sum of money to be held in trust for B to enable B to transact a certain business; A keeps the money; B being obliged to do the business for which the trust is created, uses his own money, or he goes into the market and borrows, and in either case he is, as between himself and A, entitled to be paid interest; if he uses his own money, because he allows the use of that money which is interest and compensated for only in the way of interest; if he borrows, he is to be paid the interest because he has been compelled himself to pay the amount of interest; and I suppose no judicial or other tribunal of any description would hesitate to say that when the account came to be settled between A and B it would be right to charge as against A the interest which B had been compelled to pay because of A's default, and that it would be the right of the principal from whom the fund came, by whom it was placed in the hands of A for the specific purpose, to call on this trustee of his to perform his trust, to pay over the money, if it was in his hands, if he had not paid anything, or to indemnify the cestui que trust if the cestui que trust had sustained loss because of A's default.

That is just this case, exactly this case. There was conveyed to the State of Wisconsin a large number of acres of public land out of which Wisconsin was allowed a five per cent. fund. Afterward, at her own instance, it was agreed that that should be disposed of either for the use of schools or for the construction of internal improvements. The lands were sold and the money came, according to the trust, into the possession of the Treasury, and there it was in 1864. The United States refused to pay over the whole amount because as she said she had a right to charge as against Wisconsin certain disbursements which Wisconsin herself should have met when the necessity for making them occurred. We therefore directed, with the consent of Wisconsin, that the Interior Department should settle the account, and provided that it should charge the State with the whole amount of the sales of these lands and credit the State with whatever sum she might be entitled to in the way of credit as against that fund; but that was not all. There was as against the fund another claim which, in the judgment of Congress, it was but just should be taken into consideration in making the adjustment as between the State and the United States. That other claim was the amount the canal company had been compelled to expend, in consequence of being forced to borrow money, in the payment of interest upon the loans; and we directed therefore, not that any extra compensation paid to officers of the company, which the honorable member mentioned just now and got from the claim as it stood before the Land Office, but that the amount of interest which the company had been compelled to pay should be first paid out of the fund in the hands of the Treasury before anything was paid to the State of Wisconsin.

It seems to me that we are just as competent to decide the question which the resolution presents as any other tribunal, and that it is clearly just and right that the amount of this claim should be allowed as it is allowed by the resolution we have already passed.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. President, in relation to the claim I will briefly state according to my recollection how the case has stood from time to time. This land was granted to the Territory of Wisconsin, it is true, to aid this company in the construction of this canal. After a little time the canal project was abandoned by the Territory as a chimera, a thing that was impossible to be done, and the whole project failed. But the company claimed to hold against the Territory of Wisconsin a claim for the amount of money which it had expended in the prosecution of the work as far as it had progressed. That claim was pending before I became a citizen of Wisconsin, and has been pending probably for more than twenty years.

On my entering the Senate I found that the United States Treasury, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, refused to pay over to the State of Wisconsin the five per cent. to which it was entitled of the proceeds of the sales of public lands within the State. There was a large sum of money retained in the Treasury of the United States which belonged to the State of Wisconsin which the State of Wisconsin steadily struggled during a course of years to obtain, but struggled in vain. The reason was that this canal company claimed to be one of three parties to an arrangement which involved not only the State of Wisconsin but the United States, the United States having made the grant, and made the Territory in the first instance the trustee of the grant, and, upon the admission of the State of Wisconsin into the Union, made the State take the place of the Territory as trustee in disposing of this grant for the benefit of the company. One of the resolutions passed at the time of the admission of the State of Wisconsin required the State of Wisconsin to assume and pay all obligations which were imposed upon the Territory in consequence of this land-grant. We found this company preferring its claim to the State of Wisconsin, the State of Wisconsin refusing to pay, and the State asserted that the claim was not a just one. Whenever Wisconsin applied to the United States for the money in its Treasury belonging to the State of Wisconsin we met this company insisting that the money should not be paid to the State until they were settled with, and the struggle went on for a course of years. Whenever on the part of the State of Wisconsin the Senators representing that State presented the claim of the State and endeavored to have a resolution passed by Congress which would direct the payment of this money by the Secretary of the Interior, we were met by this company.

The question was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary and the Committee on the Judiciary reported in favor of the resolution which was passed some two years ago. That resolution assumed that it was the duty of the United States, before coming to a settlement with the State of Wisconsin, to see that the rights or equitable rights of this company were in some way or other disposed of. We who represented the State of Wisconsin were compelled from necessity to yield to the view which was taken by the committee; and although we did not urge that view, for we urged that the money should be paid over to the State of Wisconsin and that the State of Wisconsin should be allowed to settle with this corporation, the Judiciary Committee and the Senate thought it wise to pass the resolution in its present shape. They referred it to the Commissioner of the General Land Office to settle the whole matter; and now, as it seems to me, the only question is, whether the Commissioner in settling it has given the true construction to the resolution which was passed by Congress. It is a simple question of law on the construction of the resolution itself, whether interest ought or ought not to be allowed to the company. That is the whole question.

Although I struggled against the resolution of 1864 as it passed in its present shape, although I struggled to have a resolution passed which would give the money over to the State of Wisconsin and allow Wisconsin to deal with the company and Congress have nothing to do with it, although I used very much the same argument which my honorable friend from Illinois has used to-day, that this matter of settlement was not a thing for Congress to look into at all, still Congress did decide that they would do equity among all the parties, and appointed the Commissioner of the General Land Office as the tribunal to settle the equities. Now if he has given a wrong construction to this instrument when he has decided that the company is not entitled to interest, I think that is a question upon which the Senate can properly pass. If it were upon a question of fact and we were asked to go through the account and see whether he allowed a proper amount for services rendered or for salaries or any of those questions of fact that might involve the calling of witnesses, I would say at once with my honorable friend from Illinois that is a thing we should not look into; but is it a mere construction of the resolution of 1864 we are asked to make, whether they are entitled to interest or not. We are asked to pass on that and give our judgment as to a question of law, not a question of fact. This is all I desire to say, Mr. President, on the subject. The motion to reconsider was rejected.

POWER OF AMNESTY AND PARDON.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I move to take up the bill (H. R. No. 828) to repeal section thirteen of "An act to suppress insurrection, to punish treason and rebellion, to seize and confiscate the property of rebels, and for other purposes," approved July 17, 1862. It was called up before and laid aside.

Mr. JOHNSON. When this subject was before the Senate, prior to the recess, I submitted some remarks to the Senate, but had not concluded what I purposed to say when another subject was brought before the body. If the honorable member from Illinois will permit the bill to go over until to-morrow it will be an accommodation to me, for I am not ready to go on to-day; I did not expect that the discussion would be resumed to-day. If he will let it go over until to-morrow I can very readily in a comparatively short period say what I intended to have said when the subject was before us prior to the recess.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The bill was called up, I would state to the Senator from Maryland, when he was out some two or three hours ago, and in consequence of his not being present it was then laid aside. I certainly have no disposition to inconvenience the Senator from Maryland. I have been struggling to get action upon this bill on several occasions.

Mr. JOHNSON. It has not been delayed at my instance. I had the floor and was discussing it when the Nebraska bill was called up. If it goes over until to-morrow or whenever the Senate meets again, I will then state what I desire to say.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The Senator desires to address the Senate upon it, I understand.

Mr. JOHNSON. I do.

Mr. TRUMBULL. With that understanding I will call it up to-morrow.

Mr. HENDERSON. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. SUMNER. I hope the Senator will withdraw that motion to let me put a bill on its passage.

Mr. HENDERSON. I withdraw the motion.

Mr. SUMNER. I move that the Senate take up Senate bill No. 475.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, [Mr. EDMUNDS in the chair.] Does the Chair understand the Senator from Illinois as withdrawing his motion?

Mr. TRUMBULL. Yes, sir.

FALSE REPRESENTATIONS TO EMIGRANTS.

On motion of Mr. SUMNER, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 475) to prevent and punish false and fraudulent representations to induce emigration to a foreign country. It provides that if any person shall, within the jurisdiction of the United States, make false and fraudulent representations to any negro, mulatto, or other person, for the purpose of inducing such negro, mulatto, or other person to emigrate to a foreign country where such negro, mulatto, or other person would be liable to be sold as a peon, so called, or otherwise reduced to virtual servitude, the person so offending shall be punished on conviction by a fine of not less than $500 nor more than $5,000, or by imprisonment not exceeding five years, or by both punishments. If the master or owner or person having charge of any vessel shall, within the jurisdiction of the United States, receive on board or shall allow to be received on board any negro, mulatto, or other person, with the knowledge that such negro, mulatto, or other person has been induced by false and fraudulent representations to embark in such vessel to proceed to a foreign country, State, or place where such negro, mulatto, or other person would be liable to be sold as a peon or reduced to virtual servitude, such master, owner, or other person offending shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $5,000 nor less than $500, or by imprisonment not exceeding five years, or by both punishments, and the vessel on board of which such negro, mulatto, or other person was received to be carried away shall be forfeited to the United States.

Mr. SUMNER. I move to amend the bill by striking out in the eighth line of the first section the word "virtual," and inserting "involuntary;" so as to read, "reduced to involuntary servitude."

Mr. HENDRICKS. I think it is very evident that there is not a quorum of Senators here; and I rise therefore to move an adjournment.

Mr. SUMNER. I think there can be no question about this bill. If the Senator were opposed to the bill I should expect him to object; but I think I shall have his concurrence.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I did not make the motion with any view to the merits of the bill. I was not thinking about it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Chair understand the Senator from Indiana to move an adjournment?

Mr. HENDRICKS. If the Senator is very anxious without a quorum to proceed with the consideration of his bill I shall not insist on the motion.

Mr. SUMNER. I thought the bill would take very little time, and by passing it there would be one bill struck off the Calendar.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SUMNER. I move also that the same word "virtual," in the tenth line of the second section, be struck out and "involuntary" substituted therefor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That amendment will be made to conform to the preceding one, if no objection be interposed.

Mr. SUMNER. Now, Mr. President, that the bill may be understood before the vote is taken upon it, I will call attention first to its title "A bill to prevent and punish false and fraudulent representations to induce emigration to a foreign country." I will then ask the attention of the Senate to a very short dispatch which has been communicated to me by the Department of State from our minister in Peru. It is as follows:

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
LIMA, PERU, November 28, 1866.

SIR: I have been positively informed that Mr. Antonio Millan left Peru on the last steamer for New York for the purpose of bringing out a cargo of negroes from the United States to this country. I fully concur in the views expressed in your order to prevent the immigration of that race to Peru; their condition would certainly not be improved, and they would share the fate of the coolies, who are now meeting with very harsh treatment in some localities.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, your obedient servant,

ALVIN P. HOVEY.

Hon. W. H. SEWARD,
Secretary of State of the United States.

There is other evidence that has been communicated to me by the State Department, showing that this person has actually arrived in New York, and that in conversation with some of his associates he has boasted that he would successfully carry out his plans. In short, he has commenced the work of obtaining these negroes in order to use them practically as coolies in foreign countries. It was thought by the committee to whom the subject was referred that we owed it to ourselves to provide by legislation as far as we could against any such conduct. I think the bill has been carefully drawn, and that it meets the case.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I move to strike out the words "negro, mulatto, or other" wherever they occur in the bill, so as to read "any person," so as not to be legislating with a view to any particular class. I suppose they are persons. We might just as well say "negro, mulatto, or white persons." If the words I propose are stricken out, it will read, "make false representations to any person," so as not to seem to be legislating for any class.

Mr. SUMNER. That very point was carefully considered by the committee, and after consideration it was thought advisable that these words should be introduced precisely as they now stand in the bill. In introducing them we have but followed the practice of legislation which is to repeat, not to stop merely with one word, but to repeat, so as on the very face of the legislation if possible to point out the evil which you intend to remove. If you simply adopt the language "any person," though that of course would be applicable to any negro or mulatto, it would not so completely as the text of the present bill put the reader on his guard as to the evil that Congress had in view when it passed the bill. It was that view which influenced the Committee on Foreign Relations after a careful consideration of the bill, to the conclusion that it was better to keep it as it now is. Nothing was lost by introducing these words; something of clearness and positiveness, it was thought, was gained by having them there; and beside that we followed in so doing the precedents of Congress, the habits of legislation. I hope they will not be struck out.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I do not know what precedents the Senator could have followed other than those that are to be found in the legislation when slavery was an institution of the country. It was then, I suppose, understood to be necessary to distinguish between negroes, mulattoes, and other persons; but under the constitutional amendment and the civil rights bill and other legislation of that class, I will ask the Senator if in the eye of the law he understands there is any difference among persons now as a question of law. I understand the argument of the Senator to be that it is necessary in this bill to admonish the country that negroes and mulattoes are persons.

Mr. SUMNER. No.

Mr. HENDRICKS. To give emphasis to it, something of force, as he expresses it. The only purpose can be to say that they are persons. If he thinks that in the eye of the law they are persons, unquestionably persons, then in framing a law he ought to use the most exact phraseology possible, and not confuse it by going into detail which is covered by general language. As a matter of taste in the framing of the bill, I think the words which I move to strike out are objectionable. If he intends to legislate for all the people of this country; if he intends to protect the white person, ignorant and unwary, who may be induced to leave his country by false representations, legislate for him by the use of such language as includes him. If he attempts also to legislate for negroes and mulattoes who are likely to be imposed upon and carried away from their country by false representations, let him use just such language as applies to them, but not go into detail which adds nothing to clearness, as I think. I think it confuses. I have understood the Senator to be laboring to wipe out all distinctions because of race and color, and to say that under the laws of the United States all persons are alike and equal. If so, how can he defend himself in using language such as this in a bill of his own framing, a bill that comes from his own committee, keeping up a distinction in the bill which he himself draws? If he intends to protect all alike, and to legislate for all, then there is a propriety in his using language that applies alike to all.

Mr. SUMNER. Mr. President, the argument of the Senator is ingenious, but I doubt whether he himself has much confidence in its soundness. He is too good a lawyer not to know that constantly in legislation and also in professional documents, several words are used in order to cover a given case, words that are general and words that are specific. Sometimes we content ourselves with the general term, sometimes we content ourselves with the specific term, and sometimes we are not contented without both the general and the specific terms. Now, sir, that is just the object of the committee in the present bill. The general term is used and the specific, and it was not supposed that there was any inconsistency in using them; and the two were used, borrowing a professional expression, for greater caution, ex majori cautela, so that we might be sure that in the statute we had met the case.

Then again it was felt desirable in the statute to exhibit on its face what its object was. Had the language been general, had it been simply "any person," one reading the statute whose attention had not been called to this grievance would be at a loss perhaps to imagine what the grievance was; but the introduction of these specific words would indicate to any intelligent reader the character of the grievance. However, this discussion is verbal rather than substantial, and I hope the Senator will not press his objection.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. In relation to the section of the bill which constitutes this new offense, I suggest to my honorable friend from Massachusetts that there are some amendments which I think ought to be made.

Mr. SUMNER. I have made an amendment.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I know that one amendment has been made, but there are other amendments which I think are necessary in order to define properly the offense which is aimed at. The language as it now stands, it seems to me, does not cover it. I think it certainly ought to be required that these false and fraudulent representations, which are the basis of the offense, should have been made knowingly and willfully. The section now provides that the offense shall be the falsely making of these representations "to any negro, mulatto, or other person, for the purpose of inducing such negro, mulatto, or other person to emigrate to a foreign country where such negro, mulatto, or other person would be liable to be sold as a peon, so-called, or otherwise reduced to involuntary servitude." There certainly is some amendment needed there, it seems to me, in order to charge the person guilty of the crime with a scienter that he knows that the person would be liable to be reduced either to involuntary servitude or to peonage. A person might hold out representations to another to emigrate with him to a foreign country, not knowing what the laws of that country were, and not knowing whether he would be liable to be sold to peonage or reduced to involuntary servitude or not.

Mr. JOHNSON. The vessel is forfeited too.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I suggest to my honorable friend from Massachusetts in relation to that section, before I should be quite willing to vote for it as defining this new statutory offense I should like to see its language changed in several particulars. I suggest to my honorable friend that perhaps he had better let this bill pass over and let us adjourn.

Mr. SUMNER. The Senator is a member of the committee from which this bill came. He was invited to its meeting. I believe that he was not with us on that occasion. I regretted it very much; but the Senator knows very well how the business of that committee is conducted. He knows that a bill like this is not reported from that committee except after very careful consideration. I will say to the Senator that it was read carefully in committee and considered section by section.

Now, as to the criticism of the Senator, he wishes that there should be something introduced here requiring what is called technically the scienter. I ask him if that is not here adequately. The offense is the making false and fraudulent representations. Surely there is in that alone a scienter—"false and fraudulent representations to any negro, mulatto, or other person." For what? "For the purpose of inducing such negro, mulatto, or other person to emigrate to a foreign country where such negro, mulatto, or other person would be liable to be sold as a peon, so called, or otherwise reduced to involuntary servitude."

Mr. JOHNSON. Must he know that the involuntary servitude exists there?

Mr. SUMNER. That is not required by the statute, and I think if the Senator will reflect one moment he will find that if that were required it would make the statute, I was going to say, good for nothing. You would be requiring too much. You require by the bill now before you that the representation should be "false and fraudulent." You then require that it should be "for the purpose of inducing" a "negro, mulatto, or other person to emigrate to a foreign country where such negro, mulatto, or other person would be liable to" slavery. Surely there is an offense. There is a moral offense which the conscience of every man must recognize; and the object of this bill is simply to reach that moral offense, a false and fraudulent representation for the purpose of inducing certain persons herein mentioned to emigrate to a country where they will be exposed to slavery. Now that you should introduce a second scienter—I use the technical language of the Senator—and require that this person should actually know the character of slavery in the country to which the emigrant is to go is to require too much. If you require that, you will require more, probably, than could be proved against the man. You require enough to make an offense by the existing bill. It surely is an offense by the existing bill, even if he did not know the character of the institutions to which this emigrant would be exposed in the foreign country. Such a bill as this would put any person seeking emigrants on his guard; and such a bill surely is needed when we are warned that there are persons here now with a view of getting up such emigration. I hope the Senator from Wisconsin will not persevere in his objection. Indeed I think, if he gives a better attention to the bill, he will see that it does meet a grievance, and though there may be something more, yet this bill is good as far as it goes. It does something to punish an offense which certainly is well worthy of the judgment of Congress.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. It is true I have the honor of being a member of the Committee on Foreign Relations, of which the honorable Senator from Massachusetts is chairman. That committee's sessions are usually on the same day that the Committee on Indian Affairs meet, and sometimes between both I am not as prompt in my attendance perhaps as I ought always to be upon either. It struck me when this bill was first introduced into the Senate that it should have been referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, because the Committee on the Judiciary are much more familiar from habit with the defining of offenses; but still, upon the suggestion of the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, who thought it concerned foreign affairs, and who, having some communications on the subject, preferred it should go to that committee, it was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations. Although I am a member of that committee, I feel at perfect liberty to look into the provisions of the bill as it stands.

I am not hostile to the bill nor to the object of the bill. My sole purpose is to have the offense so defined that when we come to pass the bill into a law we shall actually create an offense in the language which is usually known to the law in the definition of offenses, so that it may be clear, and if a man is guilty he may be punished. It did seem to me in reading the bill over cursorily—I have not given very much attention to it—that what is denominated the scienter ought to be charged more specifically against a person in order to make out the offense. It is true, the words are used:

"If any person shall, within the jurisdiction of the United States, make false and fraudulent representations to any negro, mulatto, or other person," &c.

A man may innocently make false representations. There is nothing in the language of the bill which requires that these representations shall originate with him. They may be false and fraudulent pretenses concocted by other persons and he be the innocent instrument which is used to put them in operation; and therefore it seems to me the statute should clearly require him to be charged that he knowingly and willfully made these false and fraudulent representations. It seems to me further that if the representations be made "for the purpose of inducing such negro, mulatto, or other person to emigrate to a foreign country for the purpose of being sold as a peon or reduced to involuntary servitude," that purpose should also be charged upon the person making these representations, or else it should be charged upon him that he knowingly and willfully made these false and fraudulent representations to induce him to emigrate to a country where he knew that by the laws of that country the person emigrating would be liable to be sold as a peon or reduced to involuntary servitude in order to constitute a valid offense. It strikes me that this section of the bill needs amendment.

Beside, an important question is raised by the pending amendment proposed by the Senator from Indiana to strike out the words "negro, mulatto, or other person," and let the bill stand, "that if any person shall within the jurisdiction of the United States make false and fraudulent representations to any person" for the purpose of inducing him to emigrate where he would be liable to be sold as a peon or reduced to involuntary servitude. I have no hostility to the object of the bill. I certainly agree with the Senator from Massachusetts in condemning the offense as severely as he can condemn it. I only desire that the bill should be so drawn as to define an offense in the ordinary language of criminal proceedings. It seems to me that something more is necessary than is contained in that section.

Mr. HOWARD. I agree entirely with the honorable Senator from Massachusetts in the object of this bill; but after reading the first section with some little care it strikes me that the language may be improved. As the section now reads, no offense will be committed if the representations made by the offender had been made directly to the negro, and the negro told that the object of his exportation was to have him sold as a slave, and they might therefore make perfectly true representations to the negro and induce him to leave the country for the purpose of being sold as a slave, and no offense would be committed. I suppose that was not the intention of the honorable Senator from Massachusetts. The object of the bill is to prevent absolutely the exportation of this class of persons or of any persons for the purpose of having them sold as slaves or peons. Now, I would suggest, with great respect to the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, that the language would be improved if he should strike out the words "false and fraudulent," and insert instead of them the word "any," and also in lines seven, eight, and nine to strike out the words "where such negro, mulatto, or other person would be liable to be sold as a peon, so called, or otherwise reduced to virtual servitude," and to insert in lieu of those words the words "and with intent to sell or cause to be sold such person as a peon or slave." Then the clause would read as follows:

That if any person shall, within the jurisdiction of the United States, make any representations to any negro, mulatto, or other person for the purpose of inducing such negro, mulatto, or other person to emigrate to a foreign country, and with intent to sell or cause to be sold such person as a peon or slave, the person so offending shall be punished on conviction thereof by a fine, &c.

I think that change would meet the case exactly; it strikes me that it would; but as it stands now the Senate will see at once that if false and fraudulent representations, or any representations, were made to a negro with a view to induce him to leave this country and go to another country where slavery did not exist and where he could not be treated as a slave, and if after he had reached that place he was then transported to some other place by the wrong-doer and sold as a slave, the wrong-doer would not be guilty of any crime under the bill as it is drawn. This, it strikes me, will make it more specific.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I think it is quite apparent from the discussion we have had that we had better take a little more time to word this bill precisely right. There is no quorum present, as would be disclosed if a division should be called, as doubtless there would be on a bill like this. I therefore suggest to my friend from Massachusetts—and I hope we shall have his consent—that we now adjourn.

Mr. SUMNER. I will make simply one remark before the adjournment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Illinois move an adjournment?

Mr. TRUMBULL. I will withdraw it to enable the Senator from Massachusetts to make a remark.

Mr. SUMNER. I will merely make one remark, and the remark I make I will address at once to the Senator from Wisconsin and also to the Senator from Michigan. Each has the same object in view; but I fear that if I should follow the suggestion of either the bill would be impaired in its efficacy. Already, as it is reported by the committee, I fear that it may become inoperative because it requires too much; it requires more than could be proved in court, and I fear, therefore, that the bill would be but another instance of brutum fulmen. Even in that respect it might have a certain efficacy. It would have this effect: to put people on their guard, and possibly to frighten offenders away; but still I should like to have the bill in such form as would make it something more than brutum fulmen to give it complete efficacy. It is on that account that I deprecate the amendments of the Senators from Wisconsin and Michigan. I fear that they are going to require so much that the bill will actually be destroyed in its efficacy. I now yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Before the Senator from Massachusetts takes his seat I wish to inquire of him whether it is his purpose to punish the party who makes the representation alone, or those who make representations and thereby induce emigration. Is it his purpose to make the offense a complete one simply by the representation? I suggest to him that I think that would be introducing a new feature in legislation.

Mr. SUMNER. The purpose of the bill, as I think the Senator will see by reading it, was to make an offense which had several elements in it; the first would be the false and fraudulent representation; the other would be the purpose of the false and fraudulent representation.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Then the purpose of the Senator is to punish the man who shall make the representation, although the fraudulent representation shall result in no harm to anybody.

Mr. SUMNER. If he does it for a criminal purpose, then I would punish him even though the person on whom he operated escaped. Even though he did not suffer from the false and fraudulent representation, the offense is complete.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I called the Senator's attention to it because I wanted to know what was the purpose of the bill.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

RECONSTRUCTION.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I now call for the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. The first business in order is the consideration of House bill No. 543, to provide for restoring to the States lately in insurrection their full political rights, which was under consideration on the 19th of December last. The pending question is upon the substitute then offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] upon which that gentleman is entitled to the floor.

Mr. STEVENS. I ask that the substitute be read in full, as it has not yet been read.

The substitute was read, as follows:

Strike out all after the word "whereas" in the preamble, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

The eleven States which lately formed the government called the "confederate States of America," have forfeited all their rights under the Constitution, and can be reinstated in the same only through the action of Congress: Therefore,

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the eleven States lately in rebellion, except Tennessee, may form valid State governments in the following manner:

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the State governments now existing de facto, though illegally formed in the midst of martial law, and in many instances the constitutions were adopted under duress, and not submitted to the ratification of the people, and therefore are not to be treated as free republics, yet they are hereby acknowledged as valid governments for municipal purposes until the same shall be duly altered, and their legislative and executive officers shall be recognized as such.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That each of the ten States which were lately in rebellion, and have not been admitted to representation in Congress, shall hold elections on the first Tuesday of May, 1867, to choose delegates to a convention to form a State government. The convention shall consist of the same number of members as the most numerous branch of the Legislature of said State before the rebellion. It shall meet at the former capital of said State on the first Monday of June of said year, at twelve o'clock noon, with power to adjourn from time to time, and shall proceed to form a State constitution, which shall be submitted to the people at such time as the convention shall direct, and if ratified by a majority of legal votes shall be declared the constitution of the State. Congress shall elect a commission for each of said States, to consist of three persons, who shall select, or direct the mode of selecting, the election officers for the several election districts, which districts shall be the same as before the rebellion, unless altered by said commission. The officers shall consist of one judge and two inspectors of elections, and two clerks; the said officers, together with all the expenses of the election, shall be paid by the United States, and said expenses shall be repaid by said State or Territory. Each of said officers shall receive five dollars per day for the time actually employed. Each of the members of said commission shall receive $3,000 per annum, and their clerk $2,000. The commission shall procure all the necessary books, stationery, and boxes, and make all regulations to effect the objects of this act. The President of the district shall furnish so much military aid as the said commissioners shall deem necessary to protect the polls and keep the peace at each of said election districts. If by any means no election should be held in any of said late States on the day herein fixed, then the election shall be held on the third Monday of May, 1867, in the manner herein prescribed. Returns of all such elections shall be made to the said commissioners, whose certificates of election shall be prima facie evidence of the fact.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That the persons who shall be entitled to vote at both of said elections shall be as follows: all male citizens above the age of twenty-one years who have resided one year in said State and ten days within the election district.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That the word citizen, as used in this act, shall be construed to mean all persons (except Indians not taxed) born in the United States, or duly naturalized. Any male citizen above the age of twenty-one years shall be competent to be elected to act as delegate to said convention.

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That all persons who on the 4th day of March, 1861, were of full age, who held office, either civil or military, under the government called the "confederate States of America," or who swore allegiance to said government, are hereby declared to have forfeited their citizenship and to have renounced allegiance to the United States, and shall not be entitled to exercise the elective franchise or hold office until five years after they shall have filed their intention or desire to be reinvested with the right of citizenship, and shall swear allegiance to the United States and renounce allegiance to all other governments or pretended governments; the said application to be filed and oath taken in the same courts that by law are authorized to naturalize foreigners: Provided, however, that on taking the following oath, the party being otherwise qualified, shall be allowed to vote and hold office:

I, A. B., do solemnly swear, on the Holy Evangelists of Almighty God, that on the 4th day of March, 1861, and at all times thereafter, I would willingly have complied with the requirements of the proclamation of the President of the United States, issued on the 8th day of December, 1863, had a safe opportunity of so doing been allowed me; that on the said 4th of March, 1861, and at all times thereafter, I was opposed to the continuance of the rebellion, and to the establishment of the so-called confederate government, and voluntarily gave no aid or encouragement thereto, but earnestly desired the success of the Union, and the suppression of all armed resistance to the Government of the United States; and that I will henceforth faithfully support the Constitution of the United States, and the Union of the States thereunder.

Sec. 7. And be it further enacted, That no constitution shall be presented to or acted on by Congress which denies to any citizen any right, privileges, or immunities which are granted to any other citizen in the State. All laws shall be impartial, without regard to language, race, or former condition. If the provisions of this section should ever be altered, repealed, expunged, or in any way abrogated, this act shall become void, and said State lose its right to be represented in Congress.

Sec. 8. And be it further enacted, That whenever the foregoing conditions shall be complied with, the citizens of said State may present said constitution to Congress, and if the same shall be approved by Congress said State shall be declared entitled to the rights, privileges, and immunities, and be subject to all the obligations and liabilities of a State within the Union. No Senator or Representative shall be admitted into either House of Congress until Congress shall have declared the State entitled thereto.

The question was upon agreeing to the substitute.

Mr. BINGHAM. I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. BINGHAM. I submit that the eighth section of this substitute is one which provides for the representation in Congress of the insurrectionary States; therefore, under the order adopted by the House at the last session, and renewed this session, this should be referred to the joint committee on reconstruction without debate. The provision of this substitute to which I refer is as follows:

Sec. 8. And be it further enacted, That whenever the foregoing conditions shall be complied with the citizens of said State may present said constitution to Congress, and if the same shall be approved by Congress said State shall be declared entitled to the rights, privileges, and immunities, and be subject to all the obligations and liabilities of a State within the Union. No Senator or Representative shall be admitted into either House of Congress until Congress shall have declared the State entitled thereto.

That section has relation to representation in Congress, and provides the terms and conditions upon which the States lately in insurrection shall be entitled to representation in Congress. I therefore make the point of order that under the existing rule this subject should be referred to the joint committee on reconstruction without debate.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BINGHAM] is correct in his statement of facts. But he overlooks this fact, that on the 30th of April, 1866, the House of Representatives waived the rule to which he has referred, so far as the original bill under consideration is concerned, and allowed it to be introduced; when of course it became subject to amendment and action as any other bill. The section the gentleman has read is from the substitute offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS.]

Mr. BINGHAM. I would inquire if the original bill contains any provision in relation to the representation from the lately insurrectionary States?

The SPEAKER. The title of the original bill is "A bill to provide for restoring to the States lately in insurrection their full political rights."

Mr. BINGHAM. The title may be properly recited by the Speaker, but the question I make is, does the original bill, introduced on the 30th of April last, provide the conditions I have just recited from the eighth section of the substitute?

The SPEAKER. It may not have provided for those specific conditions, but it provides "for restoring to the States lately in insurrection their full political rights." And having been introduced it is subject to amendment. The Chair therefore overrules the point of order.

Mr. STEVENS. I desire to modify the third section of the substitute by striking out the words "Congress shall elect" and inserting in lieu thereof the words "the supreme court of the District of Columbia shall appoint" before the words "a commission for each of said States."

The question was upon the substitute, as modified.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. Speaker, I am very anxious that this bill should be proceeded with until finally acted upon. I desire that as early as possible, without curtailing debate, this House shall come to some conclusion as to what shall be done with the rebel States. This becomes more and more necessary every day; and the late decision of the Supreme Court of the United States has rendered immediate action by Congress upon the question of the establishment of governments in the rebel States absolutely indispensable.

That decision, although in terms perhaps not as infamous as the Dred Scott decision, is yet far more dangerous in its operation upon the lives and liberties of the loyal men of this country. That decision has taken away every protection in every one of these rebel States from every loyal man, black or white, who resides there. That decision has unsheathed the dagger of the assassin, and places the knife of the rebel at the throat of every man who dares proclaim himself to be now, or to have been heretofore, a loyal Union man. If the doctrine enunciated in that decision be true, never were the people of any country anywhere, or at any time, in such terrible peril as are our loyal brethren at the South, whether they be black or white, whether they go there from the North or are natives of the rebel States.

Now, Mr. Speaker, unless Congress proceeds at once to do something to protect these people from the barbarians who are now daily murdering them; who are murdering the loyal whites daily and daily putting into secret graves not only hundreds but thousands of the colored people of that country; unless Congress proceeds at once to adopt some means for their protection, I ask you and every man who loves liberty whether we will not be liable to the just censure of the world for our negligence or our cowardice or our want of ability to do so?

Now, sir, it is for these reasons that I insist on the passage of some such measure as this. This is a bill designed to enable loyal men, so far as I could discriminate them in these States, to form governments which shall be in loyal hands, that they may protect themselves from such outrages as I have mentioned. In States that have never been restored since the rebellion from a state of conquest, and which are this day held in captivity under the laws of war, the military authorities, under this decision and its extension into disloyal States, dare not order the commanders of departments to enforce the laws of the country. One of the most atrocious murderers that has ever been let loose upon any community has lately been liberated under this very decision, because the Government extended it, perhaps according to the proper construction, to the conquered States as well as to the loyal States.

A gentleman from Richmond, who had personal knowledge of the facts, told me the circumstances of the murder. A colored man, driving the family of his employer, drove his wagon against a wagon containing Watson and his family. The wagon of Watson was broken. The next day Watson went to the employer of the colored man and complained. The employer offered to pay Watson every dollar that he might assess for the damage that had been done. "No!" said he, "I claim the right to chastise the scoundrel." He followed the colored man, took out his revolver, and deliberately shot him dead in the presence of that community. No civil authority would prosecute him; and, when taken into custody by the military authority, he is discharged by order of the President under this most injurious and iniquitous decision.

Now, sir, if that decision be the law, then it becomes the more necessary that we should proceed to take care that such a construction as that shall not open the door to greater injuries than have already been sustained. Thus much I have said at the outset of my remarks, which shall not be very long.

The people have once more nobly done their duty. May I ask, without offense, will Congress have the courage to do its duty? Or will it be deterred by the clamor of ignorance, bigotry, and despotism from perfecting a revolution begun without their consent, but which ought not to be ended without their full participation and concurrence? Possibly the people would not have inaugurated this revolution to correct the palpable incongruities and despotism provisions of the Constitution; but having it forced upon them, will they be so unwise as to suffer it to subside without erecting this nation into a perfect Republic?

Since the surrender of the armies of the confederate States of America a little has been done toward establishing this Government upon the true principles of liberty and justice; and but a little if we stop here. We have broken the material shackles of four million slaves. We have unchained them from the stake so as to allow them locomotion, provided they do not walk in paths which are trod by white men. We have allowed them the unwonted privilege of attending church, if they can do so without offending the sight of their former masters. We have even given them that highest and most agreeable evidence of liberty as defined by the "great plebeian," the "right to work." But in what have we enlarged their liberty of thought? In what have we taught them the science and granted them the privilege of self-government? We have imposed upon them the privilege of fighting our battles, of dying in defense of freedom, and of bearing their equal portion of taxes; but where have we given them the privilege of ever participating in the formation of the laws for the government of their native land? By what civil weapon have we enabled them to defend themselves against oppression and injustice? Call you this liberty? Call you this a free Republic where four millions are subjects but not citizens? Then Persia, with her kings and satraps, was free; then Turkey is free! Their subjects had liberty of motion and of labor, but the laws were made without and against their will; but I must declare that, in my judgment, they were as really free governments as ours is to-day. I know they had fewer rulers and more subjects, but those rulers were no more despotic than ours, and their subjects had just as large privileges in governing the country as ours have. Think not I would slander my native land; I would reform it. Twenty years ago I denounced it as a despotism. Then, twenty million white men enchained four million black men. I pronounce it no nearer to a true Republic now when twenty-five million of a privileged class exclude five million from all participation in the rights of government.

The freedom of a Government does not depend upon the quality of its laws, but upon the power that has the right to enact them. During the dictatorship of Pericles his laws were just, but Greece was not free. During the last century Russia has been blessed with most remarkable emperors, who have generally decreed wise and just laws, but Russia is not free.

No Government can be free that does not allow all its citizens to participate in the formation and execution of her laws. There are degrees of tyranny. But every other government is a despotism. It has always been observed that the larger the number of the rulers the more cruel the treatment of the subject races. It were better for the black man if he were governed by one king than by twenty million.

What are the great questions which now divide the nation? In the midst of the political Babel which has been produced by the intermingling of secessionists, rebels, pardoned traitors, hissing Copperheads, and apostate Republicans, such a confusion of tongues is heard that it is difficult to understand either the questions that are asked or the answers that are given. Ask, what is the "President's policy?" and it is difficult to define it. Ask, what is the "policy of Congress?" and the answer is not always at hand.

A few moments may be profitably spent in seeking the meaning of each of these terms. Nearly six years ago a bloody war arose between different sections of the United States. Eleven States, possessing a very large extent of territory, and ten or twelve million people, aimed to sever their connection with the Union, and to form an independent empire, founded on the avowed principle of human slavery and excluding every free State from this confederacy. They did not claim to raise an insurrection to reform the Government of the country—a rebellion against the laws—but they asserted their entire independence of that Government and of all obligations to its laws. They were satisfied that the United States should maintain its old Constitution and laws. They formed an entirely new constitution; a new and distinct government, called the "confederate States of America." They passed their own laws, without regard to any former national connection. Their government became perfectly organized, both in its civil and military departments. Within the broad limits of those eleven States the "confederate States" had as perfect and absolute control as the United States had over the other twenty-five. The "confederate States" refused to negotiate with the United States, except upon the basis of independence—of perfect national equality. The two powers mutually prepared to settle the question by arms. They each raised more than half a million armed men. The war was acknowledged by other nations as a public war between independent belligerents. The parties acknowledged each other as such, and claimed to be governed by the law of nations and the laws of war in their treatment of each other. On the result of the war depended the fate and ulterior condition of the contending parties. No one then pretended that the eleven States had any rights under the Constitution of the United States, or any right to interfere in the legislation of the country. Whether they should ever have all men of both sections, without exception, agreed would depend on the will of Congress, if the United States were victorious. The confederate States claimed no rights unless they could conquer them by the contest of arms.

President Lincoln, Vice President Johnson, and both branches of Congress repeatedly declared that the belligerent States could never again intermeddle with the affairs of the Union, or claim any right as members of the United States Government until the legislative power of the Government should declare them entitled thereto. Of course the rebels claimed no such rights; for whether their States were out of the Union as they declared, or were disorganized and "out of their proper relations" to the Government, as some subtle metaphysicians contend, their rights under the Constitution had all been renounced and abjured under oath, and could not be resumed on their own mere motion. How far their liabilities remained there was more difference of opinion.

The Federal arms triumphed. The confederate armies and government surrendered unconditionally. The law of nations then fixed their condition. They were subject to the controlling power of the conquerors. No former laws, no former compacts or treaties existed to bind the belligerents. They had all been melted and consumed in the fierce fires of the terrible war. The United States, according to the usage of nations, appointed military provisional governors to regulate their municipal institutions until the law-making power of the conqueror should fix their condition and the law by which they should be permanently governed. True, some of those governors were illegally appointed, being civilians. No one then supposed that those States had any governments, except such as they had formed under their rebel organization. No sane man believed that they had any organic or municipal laws which the United States were bound to respect. Whoever had then asserted that those States had remained unfractured, and entitled to all the rights and privileges which they enjoyed before the rebellion, and were on a level with their loyal conquerors, would have been deemed a fool, and would have been found insane by any inquisition "de lunatico inquirendo."

In anarchical Governments, where the sovereign power rests in the Crown, the king would have fixed the condition of the conquered provinces. He might have extended the laws of his empire over them, allowed them to retain portions of their old institutions, or, by conditions of peace, have fixed upon them new and exceptional laws.

In this country the whole sovereignty rests with the people, and is exercised through their Representatives in Congress assembled. The legislative power is the sole guardian of that sovereignty. No other branch of the Government, no other Department, no other officer of the Government, possesses one single particle of the sovereignty of the nation. No Government official, from the President and Chief Justice down, can do any one act which is not prescribed and directed by the legislative power. Suppose the Government were now to be organized for the first time under the Constitution, and the President had been elected and the judiciary appointed: what could either do until Congress passed laws to regulate their proceedings?

What power would the President have over any one subject of government until Congress had legislated on that subject? No State could order the election of members until Congress had ordered a census and made an apportionment. Any exception to this rule has been a work of grace in Congress by passing healing acts. The President could not even create bureaus or Departments to facilitate his executive operations. He must ask leave of Congress. Since, then, the President cannot enact, alter, or modify a single law; cannot even create a petty office within his own sphere of duties; if, in short, he is the mere servant of the people, who issue their commands to him through Congress, whence does he derive the constitutional power to create new States; to remodel old ones; to dictate organic laws; to fix the qualification of voters; to declare that States are republican and entitled to command Congress to admit their Representatives? To my mind it is either the most ignorant and shallow mistake of his duties, or the most brazen and impudent usurpation of power. It is claimed for him by some as the Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy. How absurd that a mere executive officer should claim creative powers! Though Commander-in-Chief by the Constitution, he would have nothing to command, either by land or water, until Congress raised both Army and Navy. Congress also prescribes the rules and regulations to govern the Army. Even that is not left to the Commander-in-Chief.

Though the President is Commander-in-Chief, Congress is his commander; and, God willing, he shall obey. He and his minions shall learn that this is not a Government of kings and satraps, but a Government of the people, and that Congress is the people. There is not one word in the Constitution that gives one particle of anything but judicial and executive power to any other department of Government but Congress. The veto power is no exception; it is merely a power to compel a reconsideration. What can be plainer?

"All legislative powers herein granted shall be vested in a Congress of the United States. Such shall consist of a Senate and House of Representatives."—Constitution United States, art. 1, sec. 1.

To reconstruct the nation, to admit new States, to guaranty republican governments to old States are all legislative acts. The President claims the right to exercise them. Congress denies it and asserts the right to belong to the legislative branch. They have determined to defend these rights against all usurpers. They have determined that while in their keeping the Constitution shall not be violated with impunity. This I take to be the great question between the President and Congress. He claims the right to reconstruct by his own power. Congress denies him all power in the matter, except those of advice, and has determined to maintain such denial. "My policy" asserts full power in the Executive. The policy of Congress forbids him to exercise any power therein.

Beyond this I do not agree that the "policy" of the parties are defined. To be sure many subordinate items of the policy of each may be easily sketched. The President is for exonerating the conquered rebels from all the expense and damages of the war, and for compelling the loyal citizens to pay the whole debt caused by the rebellion. He insists that those of our people who were plundered and their property burned or destroyed by rebel raiders shall not be indemnified, but shall bear their own loss, while the rebels shall retain their own property, most of which was declared forfeited by the Congress of the United States. He desires that the traitors (having sternly executed that most important leader, Ricketty Weirze, as a high example) should be exempt from further fine, imprisonment, forfeiture, exile, or capital punishment, and be declared entitled to all the rights of loyal citizens. He desires that the States created by him shall be acknowledged as valid States, while at the same time he inconsistently declares that the old rebel States are in full existence, and always have been, and have equal rights with the loyal States. He opposes the amendment to the Constitution which changes the base of representation, and desires the old slave States to have the benefit of their increase of freemen without increasing the number of votes; in short, he desires to make the vote of one rebel in South Carolina equal to the vote of three freemen in Pennsylvania or New York. He is determined to force a solid rebel delegation into Congress from the South, and, together with Northern Copperheads, could at once control Congress and elect all future Presidents.

In opposition to these things, a portion of Congress seems to desire that the conquered belligerent shall, according to the law of nations, pay at least a part of the expenses and damages of the war; and that especially the loyal people who were plundered and impoverished by rebel raiders shall be fully indemnified. A majority of Congress desires that treason shall be made odious, not by bloody executions, but by other adequate punishments.

Congress refuses to treat the States created by him as of any validity, and denies that the old rebel States have any existence which gives them any rights under the Constitution. Congress insists on changing the basis of representation so as to put white voters on an equality in both sections, and that such change shall precede the admission of any State. I deny that there is any understanding, expressed or implied, that upon the adoption of the amendment by any State, that such State may be admitted, (before the amendment becomes part of the Constitution.) Such a course would soon surrender the Government into the hands of rebels. Such a course would be senseless, inconsistent, and illogical. Congress denies that any State lately in rebellion has any government or constitution known to the Constitution of the United States, or which can be recognized as a part of the Union. How, then, can such a State adopt the amendment? To allow it would be yielding the whole question and admitting the unimpaired rights of the seceded States. I know of no Republican who does not ridicule what Mr. Seward thought a cunning movement, in counting Virginia and other outlawed States among those which had adopted the constitutional amendment abolishing slavery.

It is to be regretted that inconsiderate and incautious Republicans should ever have supposed that the slight amendments already proposed to the Constitution, even when incorporated into that instrument, would satisfy the reforms necessary for the security of the Government. Unless the rebel States, before admission, should be made republican in spirit, and placed under the guardianship of loyal men, all our blood and treasure will have been spent in vain. I waive now the question of punishment which, if we are wise, will still be inflicted by moderate confiscations, both as a reproof and example. Having these States, as we all agree, entirely within the power of Congress, it is our duty to take care that no injustice shall remain in their organic laws. Holding them "like clay in the hands of the potter," we must see that no vessel is made for destruction. Having now no governments, they must have enabling acts. The law of last session with regard to Territories settled the principles of such acts. Impartial suffrage, both in electing the delegates and ratifying their proceedings, is now the fixed rule. There is more reason why colored voters should be admitted in the rebel States than in the Territories. In the States they form the great mass of the loyal men. Possibly with their aid loyal governments may be established in most of those States. Without it all are sure to be ruled by traitors; and loyal men, black and white, will be oppressed, exiled, or murdered. There are several good reasons for the passage of this bill. In the first place, it is just. I am now confining my argument to negro suffrage in the rebel States. Have not loyal blacks quite as good a right to choose rulers and make laws as rebel whites? In the second place, it is a necessity in order to protect the loyal white men in the seceded States. The white Union men are in a great minority in each of those States. With them the blacks would act in a body; and it is believed that in each of said States, except one, the two united would form a majority, control the States, and protect themselves. Now they are the victims of daily murder. They must suffer constant persecution or be exiled. The convention of southern loyalists, lately held in Philadelphia, almost unanimously agreed to such a bill as an absolute necessity.

Another good reason is, it would insure the ascendancy of the Union party. Do you avow the party purpose? exclaims some horror-stricken demagogue. I do. For I believe, on my conscience, that on the continued ascendancy of that party depends the safety of this great nation. If impartial suffrage is excluded in the rebel States then every one of them is sure to send a solid rebel representative delegation to Congress, and cast a solid rebel electoral vote. They, with their kindred Copperheads of the North, would always elect the President and control Congress. While slavery sat upon her defiant throne, and insulted and intimidated the trembling North, the South frequently divided on questions of policy between Whigs and Democrats, and gave victory alternately to the sections. Now, you must divide them between loyalists, without regard to color, and disloyalists, or you will be the perpetual vassals of the free-trade, irritated, revengeful South. For these, among other reasons, I am for negro suffrage in every rebel State. If it be just, it should not be denied; if it be necessary, it should be adopted; if it be a punishment to traitors, they deserve it.

But it will be said, as it has been said, "This is negro equality!" What is negro equality, about which so much is said by knaves, and some of which is believed by men who are not fools? It means, as understood by honest Republicans, just this much, and no more: every man, no matter what his race or color; every earthly being who has an immortal soul, has an equal right to justice, honesty, and fair play with every other man; and the law should secure him those rights. The same law which condemns or acquits an African should condemn or acquit a white man. The same law which gives a verdict in a white man's favor should give a verdict in a black man's favor on the same state of facts. Such is the law of God and such ought to be the law of man. This doctrine does not mean that a negro shall sit on the same seat or eat at the same table with a white man. That is a matter of taste which every man must decide for himself. The law has nothing to do with it. If there be any who are afraid of the rivalry of the black man in office or in business, I have only to advise them to try and beat their competitor in knowledge and business capacity, and there is no danger that his white neighbors will prefer his African rival to himself. I know there is between those who are influenced by this cry of "negro equality" and the opinion that there is still danger that the negro will be the smartest, for I never saw even a contraband slave that had not more sense than such men.

There are those who admit the justice and ultimate utility of granting impartial suffrage to all men, but they think it is impolitic. An ancient philosopher, whose antagonist admitted that what he required was just but deemed it impolitic, asked him: "Do you believe in Hades?" I would say to those above referred to, who admit the justice of human equality before the law but doubt its policy: "Do you believe in hell?"

How do you answer the principle inscribed in our political scripture? "That to secure these rights governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed?" Without such consent government is a tyranny, and you exercising it are tyrants. Of course, this does not admit malefactors to power, or there would soon be no penal laws and society would become an anarchy. But this step forward is an assault upon ignorance and prejudice, and timid men shrink from it. Are such men fit to sit in the places of statesmen?

There are periods in the history of nations when statesmen can make themselves names for posterity; but such occasions are never improved by cowards. In the acquisition of true fame courage is just as necessary in the civilian as in the military hero. In the Reformation there were men engaged as able and perhaps more learned than Martin Luther. Melancthon and others were ripe scholars and sincere reformers, but none of them had his courage. He alone was willing to go where duty called though "devils were as thick as the tiles on the houses." And Luther is the great luminary of the Reformation, around whom the others revolve as satellites and shine by his light. We may not aspire to fame. But great events fix the eye of history on small objects and magnify their meanness. Let us at least escape that condition.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I move to amend the substitute of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] by striking out all after the enacting clause and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

That it is hereby declared that the State governments which have been organized in that portion of the territory of the United States in which "the rebellion in its revolutionary progress has deprived the people of all local civil governments," to wit: in the States of Alabama, Arkansas, Florida, Georgia, Louisiana, Mississippi, North Carolina, South Carolina, Texas, and Virginia, are not valid constitutional State governments, having been established without authority of law, under the duress of military power, and without the voluntary cooperation and ratification of the loyal citizens of the United States residing in said States; and all laws enacted in pursuance of authority derived from such State governments, and all acts done by any officer thereof, are hereby declared void, except so far as the laws and acts of said governments may be approved and ratified by the constituted authorities of the State governments organized as hereinafter provided.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That all male citizens of the United States above the age of twenty-one years, residents for six months in either of the States above named, and ten days next preceding any election within the election district in which they shall offer to vote, and who will take the oath hereinafter prescribed, are hereby authorized and invited, in the name and on behalf of the people of the United States represented in Congress, to organize constitutional State governments in each of the States aforesaid; and the term "citizens of the United States," as used in this act, shall be taken and held to include all persons, irrespective of race or former condition of servitude, born in the United States, or naturalized in pursuance of its laws.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That constitutional State governments may be organized and established in each of the States named in the first section of this act, as follows:

First. All male citizens of the United States above the age of twenty-one years shall be qualified to vote for delegates to the conventions herein authorized, and none other, who will first take the following oath: "I, A. B., do solemnly swear (or affirm) that on the 4th day of March, A. D. 1864, and at all times thereafter, I would willingly have complied with the requirements of the proclamation of the President of the United States, issued on the 8th day of December, A. D. 1863, had a safe opportunity of so doing been allowed me: that on the said 4th of March, 1864, and at all times thereafter, I was opposed to the continuance of the rebellion and to the so-called confederate government, and voluntarily gave no aid or encouragement thereto, but earnestly desired the suppression of the rebellion and the reestablishment of the Union and the authority of the Government of the United States; that I will, at all times hereafter, use my best endeavors to perpetuate the Union of these States, and maintain in any State of which I am an inhabitant a government completely republican, in which all men shall enjoy equal protection and equal rights; that I am not now, nor have I been since the 4th of March, A. D. 1865, a member of any organization, secret or otherwise, inimical to the peace and unity of the Government of the United States and the rights of loyal citizens thereunder; that I have never treated officers or soldiers or sailors of the United States captured during the late war otherwise than as lawful prisoners of war; and that I will henceforth bear true faith and allegiance to the Government of the United States and to the constitutional State government which shall be organized and established by the people of this State in pursuance of this act. So help me God."

Second. A convention for each of the States hereinbefore designated, to be composed of as many delegates as each were entitled to members in the most numerous branch of their respective State Legislatures under their old State governments, shall be selected at a mass convention in each representative district by those qualified to vote under the provisions of this act.

The delegates thus selected shall assemble at the late State capitol, or at such point as may be agreed upon, within thirty days after their election, and, before organizing, shall each take and subscribe, in a book to be provided for that purpose, the following oath:

"I, A. B., do solemnly swear (or affirm) that I have never voluntarily borne arms against the United States since I became a citizen thereof; that I have voluntarily given no aid, counsel, or encouragement to persons in armed hostility thereto; that I have never held any office, civil, military, or naval, under any authority, or pretended authority, in hostility to the United States; that I have not yielded a voluntary support to any pretended government, authority, power, or constitution within the United States hostile thereto; that I will, at all times hereafter, use my best endeavors to perpetuate the Union of these States, and maintain, in any State of which I am an inhabitant, a government completely republican, in which all men shall enjoy equal protection and equal rights; that I am not now, nor have I been since the 4th of March, A. D. 1865, a member of any organization, secret or otherwise, inimical to the peace and unity of the Government of the United States and the rights of loyal citizens thereunder; that I have never treated officers, soldiers, or sailors of the United States captured during the late war otherwise than as lawful prisoners of war; and I do further swear (or affirm) that, to the best of my knowledge and ability, I will support and defend the Constitution and Government of the United States against all enemies, foreign or domestic; that I will bear true faith and allegiance to the same, and to such State government as may be organized and recognized by the Congress of the United States, as the constitutional government of this State; that I take this obligation freely, without mental reservation or purpose of evasion; and that I will well and faithfully discharge the duties of the office on which I am about to enter. So help me God."

Third. The delegates who take and subscribe the above oath, and they only, shall then organize the convention, and proceed to determine whether they are willing to adopt the terms herein proposed by the Congress of the United States, and recommend their acceptance to the people of their respective States.

If the convention vote affirmatively, they shall then proceed to select five citizens, distinguished for their loyalty and fidelity to the Constitution and the Union of these States; and the persons thus selected shall act as a provisional committee of public safety for the State until a constitutional State convention shall assemble and elect a provisional governor for the State, as hereinafter provided. Any three of this committee shall constitute a quorum for business. The duty of said committee shall be to see that the provisions of this act, and the orders of the convention appointing them, are faithfully executed. Before entering upon the discharge of their duties they shall take and subscribe the oath above prescribed to be taken by members of the convention.

The provisional committee thus selected for each State shall, within thirty days after the adjournment of the respective conventions which appointed them, meet and organize by selecting one of their own number for president, and one to act as secretary and treasurer, after which they shall issue an address to the electors qualified to vote under the provisions of this act, notifying them that they have accepted the trust committed to them by the convention, and that they are ready to cooperate with all good-disposed citizens, who are willing to take the oath herein prescribed for electors, and in good faith enter upon the work of reorganizing loyal State governments.

The provisional committee thus appointed for each of the States shall, as soon as possible after organizing, appoint sub-provisional committees for each county in the State, to be composed of three electors of undoubted loyalty, who, before acting under such appointment, shall take and subscribe the oath above prescribed, and in addition, "that they will faithfully perform all lawful duties imposed upon them by the provisional committee for the State."

The provisional committee for each State shall also appoint a suitable number of competent loyal citizens to act as judges and clerks of elections, who, in addition to the oath above prescribed, shall take and subscribe such an oath as the provisional State committee may prescribe, faithfully to perform the duties of judges and clerks of the elections herein provided for.

The provisional committee for each State shall, as soon as practicable after appointing the committees and judges and clerks of election herein provided for, issue a call inviting all citizens of the United States entitled to vote under the provisions of this act to elect delegates to a constitutional convention, who shall be charged with the duty of forming a constitution of State government, subject to the Constitution of the United States and the provisions of this act.

The provisional committee for each State shall designate the time and manner in which delegates to the respective constitutional conventions shall be elected, giving at least sixty days' notice of such election. They shall also apportion the State into as many districts as there are delegates to be elected, taking care to secure an equitable representation as near as may be to those entitled to vote in the State under the provisions of this act: Provided, That said delegates shall be elected in single districts, and all voting shall be by ballot. And provided further, That the number of delegates in each State shall not exceed the number of members to which such State was entitled under their old government in the most numerous branch of its Legislature.

The judges and clerks of elections herein authorized to be appointed shall make and keep two poll-books at each place of voting, in which the name of each voter shall be registered, and within three days after the election transmit one of them, duly signed, sealed, and certified, to the president or acting president of the provisional State committee, and the other to the provisional committee for the county in which the election is held, which committee shall open and publish the result in said county; and the provisional State committee shall, within thirty days after the election, open and inspect the election returns for the State in the presence of at least three loyal citizens; and they shall declare the person having the greatest number of votes in each district duly elected a member of the convention; and the certificate of the president or acting president of the provisional State committee shall entitle the holder to a seat in the convention.

Immediately after canvassing the returns of said election the provisional State committee shall issue a public call appointing a time and a place for the meeting of said convention, which time shall be within sixty days after said election.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the members of the said convention thus elected in each State shall assemble at the time and place designated in the call of the respective provisional State committees; but before entering upon the discharge of their duties the president or acting president of the provisional committee for the State shall administer to each delegate the oath hereinbefore prescribed for the members of the first convention, and no delegates shall be permitted to act in such convention who refuses to take and subscribe said oath; and a majority of the delegates thus elected shall constitute a quorum of said convention. Each convention after organizing shall first declare its assent on behalf of those whom they represent that the people of said State adopt the Constitution of the United States and accept it as the supreme law of the land; whereupon the said convention is authorized to select a provisional governor and all necessary officers for the said State, including State, district, and county judges. And the governor and all officers thus provisionally appointed shall discharge the duties imposed upon them under such rules and regulations as the convention may prescribe until a governor and such officers as may be authorized by law for said State are elected and qualified; after which the said convention shall be, and it is hereby, invested with full power and authority to form a constitution of State government for said State: Provided, That the constitution when formed shall be republican and not repugnant to the Constitution of the United States and the principles of the Declaration of Independence; And provided further, That said convention shall provide by an ordinance forever irrevocable without the consent of Congress—

First. That all persons in this State are free and equal before the law, so that no man can hold another as a slave; and all laws enacted by this State shall be impartial, without regard to race or former condition of servitude.

Second. That this State shall never assume or pay any debt or obligation contracted in aid of insurrection or of war against the United States, or any claim for the loss or emancipation of any slave.

Third. That this State will establish and maintain a well-organized system of free schools for all children in the State between six and twenty years of age, from which no child shall be excluded because of race or color.

Fourth. That no person who has held office, civil, military, or naval, under either of the recent revolutionary governments, State or confederate, shall be allowed to hold any office of honor or profit under said State government until the Legislature thereof, by special act in each case, and by a two-thirds vote, shall have granted a full and unconditional pardon to such person.

Fifth. That whenever the constituted authorities of this State, aided by a sufficient number of the people thereof, shall attempt to dissolve the constitutional relations of this State with the Government of the United States, or shall attempt to form alliances with other States or with foreign Powers, or shall levy war against the United States, such acts or either of them shall at once operate to dissolve this State of its right to representation in Congress; and the Congress of the United States, which represents the sovereignty of the nation, is hereby recognized as having power and authority to do any act not inconsistent with the rules of civilized warfare to protect the lives and property of citizens of the United States residing in this State, and for the restoration of this State to its constitutional relations with the national Government upon such terms and conditions as they may prescribe.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That in case any convention hereby authorized shall form a constitution of State government for the people of said State in compliance with the provisions of this act, the convention forming the same shall provide by ordinance for submitting said constitution and ordinance to the people of said State for their approval or rejection at an election to be held at such time and place and under such regulations as the convention may prescribe; at which election the electors qualified to vote for delegates to the convention and none other, shall vote directly for or against said constitution. And the returns of said election shall be made to the provisional governor, who shall open and canvass the same in the presence of at least three loyal citizens of the State within thirty days after said election, and if a majority of legal votes shall be cast at such election for said constitution and ordinance, the provisional governor or acting provisional governor shall certify the same to the President of the United States, to the President of the Senate, and Speaker of the House of Representatives, together with a certified printed copy of the proceedings of said convention and of the constitution and ordinance adopted. Whereupon the Congress of the United States shall determine whether the foregoing conditions have been complied with by the citizens of said State, and if Congress shall approve the constitution and ordinance submitted to them said State shall be declared entitled to all the rights, privileges, and immunities and be subject to all the obligations and liabilities of a State in the American Union.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That the convention may authorize the election of all State, county, or other officers provided for in the State constitution, and for Representatives in Congress, at the same time the question of ratifying or rejecting the proposed constitution and ordinance is submitted to the people: Provided, That no Senator or Representative shall be admitted as such until Congress shall have declared the State entitled thereto.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That if in either of the States above named the conventions herein authorized shall decline to accept the terms proposed in this act as conditions precedent to the restoration of said State to its constitutional relations with the national Government, and shall refuse to form a constitution of State government, subject to the conditions and limitations herein prescribed, the convention thus refusing may, and it is hereby invited to, submit to the Congress of the United States for their approval, modification, or rejection such plan of restoration as they may agree upon: Provided, That such plan shall declare: first, that the Constitution of the United States is the supreme law of the land; second, that the constitution of said State shall guaranty the freedom and equality of all persons before the law; third, that all voting in said State shall be by ballot, and suffrage shall be impartial, without distinction of race or color. That no debt or obligation contracted by this State in aid of insurrection or of war against the United States, or claim for loss of property during the war, or for compensation for loss or emancipation of any slave, shall ever be made by said State upon the United States, or be assumed or paid by said State.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That in the several States wherein a provisional governor is authorized by this act to be appointed the judges provisionally appointed as herein provided shall have such jurisdiction, both civil and criminal, of all cases whereof the State courts of such State had cognizance on the day when it renounced its obedience to the Constitution of the United States, and said laws not inconsistent with the provisions of this act shall continue to be rules of judgment of said courts in such State until a State government is formed and recognized as above provided. And said courts shall have such additional jurisdiction as the said convention appointing them may prescribe: Provided, That all laws, judicial decisions, or usages of said State which recognize or sustain any form of slavery, or which exclude the testimony of persons of color, or which deny them the right of trial by jury, or which make any distinction because of race or color or former condition of servitude, shall be utterly void within said State.

SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That if any person shall falsely take either of the oaths herein prescribed he may be indicted and prosecuted for the crime of perjury in any court or district court of the United States having jurisdiction of the person, and upon conviction thereof shall be imprisoned in the penitentiary at hard labor not less than three nor more than ten years, and pay the cost of prosecution; and in the trial of any person for perjury under the provisions of this act, or for any offense against the laws of the United States in either of the States named in the first section of this act, no person shall be qualified to sit upon the jury until he shall have taken the oath herein prescribed to be taken by members of the constitutional convention, and the court may require any juror to take it unless he shall swear that he cannot truthfully do so.

SEC. 10. And be it further enacted, That the President of the United States is hereby authorized, and it shall be his duty, to furnish so much military aid as the provisional committee or provisional governor selected in pursuance of this act for either of the States hereinbefore named shall deem necessary to protect the polls and keep the peace at the elections herein authorized; and he shall so dispose and employ the military and naval forces of the United States as to enforce the prompt and efficient execution of the provisions of this act, and to secure order and obedience to the laws of the United States in said State.

SEC. 11. And be it further enacted, That if in any of the States above named any person or persons shall conspire together or attempt forcibly to obstruct or prevent the peaceful assembling of the loyal citizens of said States to petition the Congress of the United States, in pursuance of the provisions of this act, the person or persons so offending shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon trial and conviction before any court or district court of the United States having jurisdiction of the person shall be punished by imprisonment in the penitentiary not less than three nor more than ten years, at the discretion of the court.

SEC. 12. And be it further enacted, That if any provisional governor appointed as herein provided shall be unable because of forcible resistance to his authority to administer the State government over which he is called to preside, with the aid of such military and naval force as the President of the United States may be able to furnish as above provided that he be, and he is hereby, authorized to organize, arm, and equip such military force as he may deem necessary to keep the peace and enforce the laws and such ordinances as the constitutional convention in such State may require said governor or any officer appointed by them to execute.

SEC. 13. And be it further enacted, That if the provisional governor or the judge of any court, or any officer appointed or authorized to be appointed by either of the constitutional conventions organized as hereinbefore prescribed, is unable because of forcible resistance to execute civil process, the provisional governor of such State may proclaim martial law and suspend the writ of habeas corpus in the county or district in which such resistance is made, and may order the arrest and imprisonment during the continuance of martial law of any person or persons who shall resist, or conspire to resist, by force the establishment of such governments as are herein authorized; and if the persons combined to resist the civil and military power of the provisional government herein authorized are too numerous to be arrested and imprisoned by the ordinary process of law, the provisional governor shall call on the President of the United States, and it shall be his duty to furnish such military aid as the said Governor may deem necessary to cooperate with the militia force of the said State, which he is hereinbefore authorized to call into service to keep the peace, protect the courts, and execute the laws.

SEC. 14. And be it further enacted, That when the constitutional convention for the State of Texas shall have assembled and organized, as provided in this act, said convention may divide the State into two States: Provided, That said convention shall first cede to the United States all right and title of said State to any part of the territory hereinafter described and not included within the proposed boundaries of either State, to wit: all that part of the territory of said State lying west and north of the following boundaries: commencing at a point formed by the intersection of the Rio Grande with the twenty-fourth degree of longitude west from Washington; thence northward along said twenty-fourth degree of longitude to its intersection with the main branch of Red river; thence eastward down the main channel of said river to its intersection with the twenty-third degree of longitude west from Washington; thence the present boundary line between Texas and the Indian Territory; thence northward along said twenty-first degree of longitude to the northern boundary line of Texas; thence westward along said northern boundary line of Texas to its intersection with the present eastern boundary of the Territory of New Mexico; and said convention shall cause such cession to be so made to the United States so as to include all right and title to the soil not disposed of by the State of Texas prior to the 4th day of March, A. D. 1861, and from the date of such cession the title to all the territory thus ceded shall vest in the United States, and the territory so acquired shall be attached to and thereafter form part of the Territory of New Mexico.

The said convention may then divide the State, either by beginning at the mouth of the Colorado, where it empties into Matagorda bay, or at the mouth of the Brazos, and following up the main channel of either river until its intersection with the twentieth degree of longitude west from Washington; thence northward along said twentieth degree of longitude to its intersection with the Red river; and all east of said boundary line shall constitute the State of Texas, and the remainder may be erected into a new State with such name as the convention may select and Congress approve.

After the dividing line shall have been agreed upon, the members of said convention residing within the limits of the proposed States shall assemble in separate conventions and organize as hereinbefore provided, and proceed as directed in this act: first, to select a provisional governor and all other officers for the State, whereupon each convention shall be, and they are hereby, vested with power and authority to form a constitution of State government for the State of Texas and the proposed new State, in accordance with the conditions and limitations prescribed for the States named in this act.

SEC. 15. And be it further enacted, That if any person shall be elected a delegate to any constitutional convention herein authorized who cannot take the oath above prescribed because he has held some subordinate civil or ministerial office under either of the revolutionary governments, State or confederate, but who is able and willing to take said oath, except so far as to swear that he has never held any office under either of said pretended governments, the convention, after having been duly organized, may, by a two-third vote, if they are satisfied of the loyalty and fidelity of the person asking for admission, permit him to take the oath, omitting the clause, "that I have never held any civil office," and admit him to a seat in the convention, if he is otherwise qualified.

SEC. 16. And be it further enacted, That acts and parts of acts inconsistent with the provisions of this act be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

MR. PIKE. Mr. Speaker, in the remarks which I propose to make at the present time I shall not speak particularly upon the substitute presented this morning by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] because I have had no opportunity to examine it; but I shall rather occupy the attention of the House in giving my opinion upon the present state of affairs with regard to the insurrectionary States than to enforce it by a recital of the facts and arguments upon which it is based. It has got to be time now for action if we are to fulfill the reasonable expectations of the country during the life of this Congress, and for one I am quite ready to act.

Three modes of dealing with those States have been proposed and are now before us for consideration and decision:

1. The President's plan of admission at once to a full participation in the Government, treating them as if they had never been in rebellion;

2. The let-alone policy, which would merely refuse them representation in the General Government until they had adopted the constitutional amendments proposed at the last session of Congress, with perhaps the addition of negro suffrage;

3. The immediate action by Congress in superseding the governments of those States set up by the President in 1865, and establishing in their place governments founded upon loyalty and universal suffrage.

It is not worth while to waste words upon the President's "policy." It is res adjudicata. He explained it at length to the people before the election, and the better they understood it the more emphatically they condemned it. What little life his plan had during the last session of Congress was crushed out of it by the weight of the popular avalanche at the polls; and now that the Democratic party has deserted the Administration—as rats do a sinking ship—there are no mourners at its grave. It and its cognate, "universal suffrage and universal amnesty," are laid out of the question. We are not to allow the rebels to participate in the Government they sought to destroy without being somewhat shorn of their capacity for mischief; nor are we to purchase of them good conduct toward the loyal men in their midst by entire condonation of crime. We cannot afford to ignore all distinction between rebellion and loyalty just yet. Neither the past nor the future demand such action at our hands.

The second plan stands in a somewhat peculiar position. The constitutional amendments should be adopted and will be. They have been sanctioned by the popular judgment in the most decided manner. There are no reasons why loyal men should object to them.

But the question of their acceptance or rejection is quite outside of these States. It is one with which they have nothing to do.

Should they persist in their desire to be admitted to representation, it is quite certain they cannot succeed during this Administration unless they each of them adopt these amendments. No State can have representation here that does not itself subscribe to them. Such an adoption would constitute a badge of loyalty that is indispensable.

Whether having adopted the amendments they shall be admitted is another and different matter. As yet there is no agreement to that effect. A bill was prepared at the last session providing for their admission under certain contingencies; but it failed, and its failure indicates an indisposition on the part of Congress to hamper itself with pledges.

Undoubtedly there were expectations on the part of many of the voters that those States would be admitted upon the adoption of the amendments. The national committee of the Union party issued an address to that effect. The constitutional amendments were called the "congressional plan" and antagonized against the President's "policy." It is not improbable that many members in the canvass declared themselves willing to vote for the admission of every State that should adopt these amendments. If so, they should fulfill their pledges. That should always be done. But it is matter of individual concern. There is nothing binding me, either as a member of this Congress or a member of the Union party. I have made no agreements here or elsewhere to admit the representation from any of those States upon such contingency, and do not propose to do so.

Undoubtedly they would have been admitted had they or any of them adopted the amendments. It may not be too late now. I should not undertake to say what would be the action of the two Houses if they should at once accept the amendments.

Furthering this idea, it is said that a proposal is to be made that the House shall make a direct promise to those States in the shape of a resolution pledging admission to any State that shall ratify the constitutional amendments. But such a resolution ought not to pass. A ratification of the amendments by any of the rebel States is at most but an indication of loyalty on the part of the State ratifying. It has no legal significance. The amendment was submitted only to the States recognized by Congress as States, and their action alone should govern the question of its adoption or rejection. If one of those States should give such indication of loyalty as an adoption of this amendment would certainly be, and should accompany it by a grant of suffrage to all loyal men, of whatever color, I should cheerfully vote for her admission. But let them adopt it grudgingly and under protest, as Alabama did the great anti-slavery amendment, determined to give it in practice as little significance as possible, and refuse to colored citizens their rights, and I would not vote for the admission of such a State, for I should deem the Union better without her than with her. In any event I shall retain to myself the privilege of judging in each particular instance whether or not the State applying shall be admitted to representation.

I am in no hurry about the admission of any of them. It is better they should come in gradually. They are incongruous elements at best; let them be absorbed by degrees and assimilate with the other States and thus do the least possible harm to the body-politic. I protest against any action here which shall bind the House to admit all these States to representation upon going through the formality of adopting the constitutional amendment. They might do it as the rebels took the oath in Maryland, declaring it unconstitutional and not binding in conscience or law. They might declare themselves under legal duress and appeal to the Supreme Court for such protection as a majority of that body seems to be in the way of granting to rebels. I beg the House to commit itself to no such folly. "Every tub on its own bottom." Let us judge each State by itself, and let us make up that judgment in the light of facts as they exist at the time we act.

But there seems little probability that any of the rebel States will comply with the terms and seek admission through such channels. We shall adopt the amendment by means of three fourths of the loyal States, and then the question will come back on us in full force, what shall be done with the ten States not now represented?

The fact that the amendments have become part of the Constitution by means of the action of the other States will make little difference in our action toward them. They should not be allowed to come back into the Union under the implied protest which the non-acceptance of the amendments by all of them would itself be. They went out on what they called constitutional grounds. Let them come back with no unsettled questions between us. Let them come like the new States of the West—in harmony in feeling and interest with the States now comprising the Government. The Union is certainly stronger in all desirable elements as it now is than it would be with the other States in it as they used to be. We want no more nominal union with them. Let us make a clean thing of it, and settle everything that is to be settled between us. We shall never have a better opportunity in the whole tide of time.

The third plan I have mentioned is for Congress to act at once affirmatively, and, gathering up the elements best fitted for the purpose, proceed to constitute a State government which shall take the place of that now in operation under the sanction of the President.

The present governments seem to have been the offspring of the military authority of the Executive. I see by the newspapers that Judge Ruffin, of North Carolina, pronounces the present government of the State illegal because the President's authority over the States has ceased by the advent of peace, and also because the conventions were called by him for special purposes, and when these things he required were done they were functus officio. Neither rebels or loyal men or even the Democratic party indorse the President's action.

It is clear that the President has no authority to create a State. If, as he says, he found the rebel States "destitute of all civil government," he should have appealed to the law-making power to carry into effect that great clause of the Constitution guarantying governments to the States.

And the governments so established have failed. Complaints are made to us from loyal men in all those States, and we are urged to interpose and protect the property and persons of citizens of the United States not now safe or rather entirely at the mercy of the prevailing lawlessness. The memorial of the loyal men of those States exhibits a state of things which should call for the intervention of Congress if the statements are true.

The reports of officers in charge of the departments in which those States are situated confirm the statements. General Sheridan in his report to General Grant last month says:

"But justice is not done. To give you an instance of this, two soldiers were shot at Brenham, Texas, about two months ago; they were unarmed and offered no provocation. The grand jury could find no bill against their would-be assassins, but found a bill against Brevet Major Smith, seventeenth infantry, for burglary, because he broke into the house of some citizen in his attempt to arrest these men."

"My own opinion is that the trial of a white man for the murder of a freedman in Texas would be a farce, and in making this statement I make it because truth compels me, and for no other reason."

"During the last six months Indian depredations have taken place on the remote frontier. Their extent is not defined as yet, but they are not very alarming, and I think that the Governor has to some extent been influenced by exaggerated reports gotten up in some instances by frontier people to get a market for their produce, and in other instances by army contractors to make money."

"I have ordered two regiments of cavalry to the frontier and placed a regiment of infantry at Austin, to be moved if necessary."

"It is strange that over a white man killed by Indians on an extensive frontier the greatest excitement will take place, but over the killing of many freedmen in the settlements nothing is done. I cannot help but see this, and I cannot help but tell it to my superiors no matter how unpleasant it may be to the authorities of Texas."

His statement of the murder of soldiers is paralleled by that in South Carolina, where the murderers of three soldiers on the Savannah river in 1865 go at large and no attempt is made to punish them. The court has decided that military commissions have no authority, and the civil authorities are indisposed.

General Sickles gives a better account of South Carolina, but he says of some parts of it:

"In some parts of Barnwell, Edgefield, Newberry, Chester, Laurens, and Richland districts, (counties,) in South Carolina, a freedman has little security for life, limb, or property apart from the presence and protection of a garrison of United States troops. There are other districts in the western part of South Carolina where the same insecurity exists. The truth is, that in certain localities of these States personal encounters, assaults, and difficulties between citizens, often resulting in serious wounds and death, have for years occurred without the serious notice or action of the civil authorities; and in those neighborhoods where it has heretofore seemed to the population officious to arrest and punish citizens for assault upon each other they can hardly be expected to yield with any grace to arrests for assaults and outrages upon negroes. It is precisely in these localities that the most impatience is displayed at the presence of a garrison, because people who have long violated civil law with impunity dislike martial law or any other law that is enforced."

I am informed at the Freedmen's Bureau that in Georgia during the last year there have been about one hundred and fifty murders of freedmen and not a single punishment. The Watson case in Virginia indicates the state of public opinion there.

It is useless to go into details. The statements could be duplicated almost everywhere in the rebel States.

Besides this insecurity of life and property, these present governments have ostracised a large fraction of the loyal citizens of those States. In two States and perhaps more a majority of the whole population is so ostracised. Black men are in the same condition politically, now that they are citizens, as they used to be when they were slaves.

Certainly, if ever the "United States," in the language of the Constitution, were called upon to intervene, it would be for the relief of American citizens so situated. That clause in the Constitution is but a dead letter if it will not apply now.

And I should hardly be willing to wait for a decision of the Supreme Court affirming the authority of Congress before we act. I notice that a decision is threatened against such action. I do not know that it is improbable. But the court should recollect that it has had bad luck with its political decisions. The people of this country thus far have preferred to govern the country themselves and let the court attend to its law business. Both its great political opinions have been reversed upon appeal to the ballot-box, and the general opinion of the bar of the country follows the popular verdict rather than the judicial decisions. The Constitution, by furnishing Congress with a mode of getting rid of both President and court, evidently intended to make it "master of the situation." Of course its ultimate powers are not to be exercised upon slight occasions. But the questions with which we have now to deal embrace in their scope the well-being of a large portion of the country and one fourth the entire population. As an industrial and political question we shall have none more important before us during this Congress. Having determined the proper thing to be done, it is the manifest duty of Congress to take all the constitutional methods within its power to compass it.

And I know nothing that promises so good a result as to reorganize one or more of the insurrectionary States. Perhaps it would be wise now to make the attempt in such States as offer the best opportunities for success: a general bill, embracing the whole present difficulties in its execution, which would bid fair to shipwreck the attempt. Better allow a part to await future developments, getting along meantime as best they may.

Nor do I see the wit of establishing territorial governments, as is proposed. Why create a territorial organization in a State of a million inhabitants? Appoint a Governor from Washington, and provide that a delegate may be sent here to speak, but not to vote? It looks like a farce. It will serve no good purpose whatever. Certainly for domestic government it is not needed, nor to prepare the machinery to become a State. Such an organization would be a laughing-stock to the people in the State and out of it.

But let Congress provide at once for a convention to frame a constitution, to be submitted to Congress for its approval. The principal question in such a case, upon which there would be division of opinion, would be as to the qualification of voters. All who would favor such organization would of course insist upon ignoring color as a basis for suffrage; but should there be any other restriction?

Both education and property have been at times insisted upon; but I have hoped that, since the prompt action on suffrage in the District of Columbia, we had come to the sensible conclusion that "man was superior to his accidents," and go at once to a result, which will be arrived at finally, delay it as long as we may. If men all over the country may safely be trusted with the ballot when it is in white hands, I know of no reason to apprehend danger when it is in colored hands. Let us have no adjourned or unsettled questions about this matter. Organize a government, give universal suffrage without regard to color; in other words, duplicate the suffrage bill in the District of Columbia, and then our friends across the way may begin to congratulate themselves that they are in a fair way to see the end of the "negro question." The negro has been a hard antagonist for them. He has destroyed the Democratic party; and the only way now for any party to deal with him successfully is to do the fair thing by him and give him his rights! Let him have the same rights as the white man, and be subject to the same disabilities. Then he will help to pay your debt and bear his share of the burdens of the Government. But restrict him, hamper him, and you make trouble for the future. It is only when the stream is vexed with dams and its natural course impeded that you have care and anxiety. If we will but strike out boldly and rest the governments of the States we are to reorganize upon manhood, and not upon caste, I have entire faith we shall be successful and the "negro question" be finally settled. I confess I see no other course that promises the blessing of good government to this generation.

Having done this, the present Congress may well leave the completion of this great business to its successor. Make the attempt with two or three of the States, I care not which, and the next Congress will, I have no doubt, so far approve your course as in time to bring in all the States in the same manner.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Speaker, I wish to enter a motion to refer to the joint committee on reconstruction the bill introduced by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, together with his substitute and the amendment of my colleague [Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio] to the substitute.

Mr. MILLER. I desire to move an amendment by adding to the ninth section of the substitute of my colleague, [Mr. STEVENS.]

The SPEAKER. That would not be in order. The original bill can be amended. The substitute cannot be, because there is already pending an amendment to the substitute, which is as far as any amendment can go. In addition to that, the motion to refer while pending precludes any motion to amend.

Mr. BINGHAM. I do not wish to proceed with my remarks this evening, and therefore will yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

Mr. STEVENS moved that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union and proceed to the consideration of the President's annual message.

The motion was agreed to.

So the rules were suspended; and the House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. Urson in the chair,) and proceeded to the consideration of the President's annual message, on which Mr. GRINNELL was entitled to the floor.

Mr. GRINNELL. I understand the gentleman from Pennsylvania is ready to proceed this evening, and I therefore yield the floor to him.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Chairman, within an hour of the opening of the present session I introduced the following resolution, which was adopted without dissent:

"That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to inquire into the expediency of immediately repealing the provisions of the internal revenue law whereby a tax of five per cent. is imposed on the products of the mechanical and manufacturing industry of the country."

On the succeeding Monday, having in the mean time examined the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, I submitted the following:

Resolved, That the proposition that the war debt of the country should be extinguished by the generation that contracted it is not sanctioned by sound principles of national economy and does not meet the approval of this House.

I hoped that this resolution would also receive the immediate assent of the House, but it thought proper to refer it to the Committee of Ways and Means. I am, however, not without an assured hope that with the sanction of that committee it will at an early day meet the approval of the House and relieve the country from the profound anxiety and depression created by the unprecedented propositions of the Secretary. With these resolutions in view I propose, Mr. Chairman, to detain the committee for a little while by an examination of that budget of inaptitudes, incongruities, and non-sequiturs—the report of the Secretary of the Treasury.

This report is indeed a noticeable document. It abounds in phrases and propositions of doubtful meaning; its abstract propositions, many of which as mere abstractions are true, and should be considered by the founder of a new and independent community, are not only inapplicable but are contravened by the inextinguishable peculiarities of our condition; its astounding facts do not sustain but with emphasis gainsay the conclusions they are marshaled to support; and the means by which it proposes to return to specie payments and extinguish the national debt within given periods would, by virtue of laws as fixed as that of gravitation, produce bankruptcy, individual, corporate, State, and national, and postpone the permanent resumption of specie payments for a quarter of a century. There is nothing in this report to gratify one's national pride. As we read it we seek excuses for its author and hope we may be able to say for him that he confided its preparation to a subordinate who dealt unfairly by him. It may, however, be that Mr. McCulloch, like an oarsman, rowed one way and looked another, and was too modest to announce his real purpose. He may have improved the occasion to repair a neglect in the education of the people; for Rev. Mr. Nasby tells us that the Secretary was present at the Cabinet meeting convened to consider the "onparallelled loosening of the Nashua-Union-Johnson-Dimecratic party in the various States which held elections on the 9th of October last," and that he attributed it "to the limited knowledge the masses had of 'Ingany banking.'" But, be this as it may, I am sure the country will sustain the assertion that whatever commendation the report may deserve or receive from "Ingany" or other bankers it is marked by no leading suggestion adapted to the existing exigencies of our country.

The Secretary's wisdom is that of a man owning a thousand fertile acres, who by the aid of a loan on mortgage had fenced them in and built barns and all requisite outbuildings, and gathered live stock and the many implements by which genius has lightened the labors and increased the profits of the farmer, and who withal had able-bodied sons to share his labors, and of these agencies was accumulating a fund with which in a few years he could extinguish his indebtedness; but who when a fire consumed his barns and implements and choice stock would not use his savings to renew his stock and implements, but though his creditor was not anxious for his money would sell his interest-bearing bonds and hand over the proceeds, his working capital, as part payment of the mortgage debt.

He who under such circumstances would come to such a conclusion and execute it would find but little sympathy among his neighbors. Eager as they might be to repair his losses they would not be likely to make him county treasurer or confide the township funds to his administration. They would probably deem him inadequate to the management of his own property, and feel that their neighborhood was well rid of one who could thus stupidly sacrifice his resources and doom his sons to idleness or to earn laborers' wages on the land of strangers. Yet, disavowing all disposition to exaggeration or caricature, I present such an one as the prototype of our Finance Minister, as he discloses himself in this report.

Witness the exultation with which he announces that during the brief period of fourteen months, namely, from August 31, 1865, to October 31, 1866, the principal of our debt was reduced $206,379,565 71. I wonder whether in his exultation Mr. McCulloch remembered that this immense sum of more than $206,000,000 had been added to the cost and market price of the product of but fourteen months of American labor and that by its addition to the cost and price of our home productions those of the underpaid labor of Europe had been given the advantage over the American laborer in our own markets and those of the world. I wonder whether in his pride he perceived that he was announcing the needless abstraction of more than two hundred and six millions of active working capital from the business men of this country, many of whom were struggling to maintain infant industries which had been called into existence by the war and needed the fostering care of the Government to give them prosperity and permanence. Unfamiliar as he appears to be with the laws of social science and the history of their development, it is possible he did not know the advantage he was giving to British monopoly over competing American enterprise and industry by recommending the continuance of the excessive taxation which enabled him to pay those hundreds of millions. England is the foe of the laborer in every land. To maintain her monopoly she must undersell other nations in their own markets, and to effect this must depress the wages of labor to the lowest possible point and use shoddy or other base material whenever it can be done without immediate detection. Her capitalists are, we are assured, accumulating £100,000,000 or $500,000,000 surplus capital per annum; and for more than a century it has been their policy to apply a portion of this surplus to the destruction of the industries of other nations by underselling them, though for a time it involved loss on certain kinds of goods. We have often been the victims of this unscrupulous policy, and if the suggestions of the Secretary prevail it will again prostrate us.

The war of 1812 developed our productive power very considerably; but in two years after the war closed the capitalists of England, by the express advice of her leading statesmen and in pursuance of a deliberate combination, swept our young manufactures out of existence. In the course of a speech in Parliament in 1815, Henry Brougham, exulting over our wide-spread bankruptcy, said:

"It is well worth while to incur a loss upon the first exportation in order by the glut to stifle in the cradle those rising manufactures in the United States which the war has forced into existence."

History, so far as that chapter is concerned, is repeating itself, and our market is glutted with British woolen goods which until our factories shall discharge their work-people and suspend operations will be sold at less than cost. The assessment of extraordinary taxes for the extinguishment of the war debt while such a contest is waging will make the victory of our enemy an easy one. The policy is suicidal, and will prove fatal to our revenues by paralyzing the productive power of the country and diminishing the ability of the people to consume either dutiable or taxable commodities. This is not the language of declamation. It has high official sanction, among which is that of the revenue commission appointed by the Secretary himself, as will appear by the following extract from the last annual report of the secretary of the National Association of Wool-growers.

Before presenting this extract I should remark that the tax on manufactures has been reduced from six to five per cent. since the preparation of the official reports to which it refers:

"The internal revenue tax paid in the year 1865 upon woollen fabrics and all manufactures of wool amounted to $7,947,094, being 3.79 per cent. upon the whole of the internal revenue collected. How heavily this tax bears upon our manufactures is shown by facts presented in the report of the Secretary of the State of Massachusetts upon the industrial statistics of the State for the year 1865. The capital invested in woollens proper is shown to have been $14,775,830, and the value of the woollen product to have been $48,430,671. Six per cent. upon the latter sum, the amount of the revenue tax, is $2,905,836, being 19.66 per cent., or in round numbers 20 per cent. upon the capital invested in woollens. This tax has been paid cheerfully under the impulses of patriotism. But it cannot be borne long. In the language of one of the special reports of the revenue commission, 'It has no parallel, probably, in the fiscal regulations of any civilized nation. It would utterly destroy in ten years two thirds of the various kinds of production subject to its operations.'

Gentlemen will not fail to observe how perfectly the views of the commission are supported by the facts above cited in relation to the woollen manufactures of Massachusetts. But I recur to the revenue report:

"A very large proportion of the manufacturing establishments in the United States sell products yearly to two or three times the amount of their invested capital; and in many departments of production their sales yearly amount to more than three times the cost of their establishments. If the capital invested be $100,000 the sales may amount to two or three hundred thousand dollars, and the tax on that business will range from twelve to eighteen thousand dollars; that is, from twelve to eighteen per cent. on the cost of the manufacturing establishment."

And again:

"In every point of view in which it is presented it seems clear that the six per cent. tax upon manufactures will destroy productive power in an increasing progression; that it will in a few years, if not removed, furnish a sad monument to perpetuate the memory of a great mistake."

The Secretary's time and attention have probably been so absorbed by his official guillotine that he has not been able to examine the reports submitted to him by the revenue commission. I will, in the hope of bringing them to his attention, add to the foregoing the following brief extract from their preliminary report of last year, submitted to him by Mr. Commissioner Wells:

"The remedy, therefore, for the difficulties above pointed out and illustrated, save in a few striking instances which have probably resulted from oversight in the framing of the law, must, in the opinion of the commission, be sought for in such a revision of the present internal revenue system as will look to an entire exemption of the manufacturing industry of the United States from all direct taxation, (distilled and fermented liquors, tobacco, and possibly a few other articles excepted.) This the commissioners are unhesitatingly prepared to recommend."

These grave considerations, though specially reported to him by his own agents, do not seem to have attracted the attention of Mr. McCulloch; for while exulting over the rapid payment of the debt, without seeming to detect the cause of the popular emotion, he says:

"Nothing in our history has created so much surprise, both at home and abroad, as the reduction of our national debt. The wonder excited by the rapidity with which it was created is exceeded by the admiration of the resolution of the tax-payers themselves that it shall be speedily extinguished."

It is true, Mr. Chairman, that surprise and wonder agitate the practical men of the country. These emotions are not, however, excited by the fact that we were able to bear extraordinary taxation while the development of our boundless productive power was stimulated by the exigencies of the war, and our own market was secured to our own producers by the difference between our lawful currency and gold, in which payment of duties on imports was required. The taxes under which those hundreds of millions accumulated were assessed while war was raging and for war purposes, and could have been borne as long as the conditions I have indicated were maintained. Wise men know this, and that the war terminated abruptly and earlier than was expected, and do not hold the Secretary accountable for the results of this contingency. No matter what sacrifices it involved, the people would have cheerfully borne them rather than yield the questions put at issue by the war. But these questions have been happily settled by war's arbitrament. Peace is restored, our currency approximates the specie standard, and it is discovered that by aid of our inordinate internal taxes foreign manufacturers are monopolizing our home market. Our publishers buy their paper and print and bind their books in England or Belgium; our umbrella-makers have transferred their workshops to English towns; our woollen and worsted mills are closed or closing, and the laborers in these branches are not only wasting their capital, which consists in their skill and industry, but drawing from the savings-banks or selling the Government bonds in which they had invested their small accumulations to maintain their families during the winter; and our enlarged importations of foreign goods are swelling the balance of trade against us and preparing us for general bankruptcy. The surprise of which Mr. McCulloch speaks is excited by the fact that in view of this condition of things the Secretary of the Treasury should urge the maintenance of extraordinary taxes sufficient to enable him to apply not less than $50,000,000 per annum to the extinguishment of our debt by the rapid absorption of the only portion of that debt which bears no interest. Wonder amounting almost to awe does possess our people, and it is excited as was that of the unsophisticated sailor who, in the midst of an exhibition of magical illusions, was blown into the air by the accidental explosion of powder, and in his damaged condition wondered what would come next in the order of exercises.

That the tax-payers have resolved that the principal of our debt "shall be speedily extinguished" I deny. They regard the attempt as Quixotic, as destructive of our industrial interests, and beneficial only to money-lenders, speculators in Government securities, and foreign manufacturers. Sir, if the Secretary is accessible to the voice of remonstrance he must by this time be satisfied that there is no tax-payer in the country who is not engaged in importing foreign goods or in shaving notes, or who, having bought bonds at low rates in a depreciated currency, hopes to have them redeemed at an early day in specie, who does not dissent from the assessment of extraordinary taxes for the extinguishment by the generation which created it, of a debt, the security of which is undoubted and which was incurred for the benefit of posterity. The opinion of the people on this question is modestly expressed by the editor of the ablest and most instructive of our industrial journals, the Iron Age. He says:

"We are glad to see that a resolution for the entire removal of the manufacturers' tax of five per cent. has been introduced, and hope it will be adopted. As an independent proposition, outside of any other amendment of the tax or tariff laws, this will commend itself to the good sense of the country as one so manifestly just that we should expect there would be a very general expression of public feeling in its favor. All classes can heartily unite in this effort to untrammel the industry of the country and to cheapen production. The free-trader and protectionist can at least here agree; the workman is quite as directly interested in this matter as the employer, for the effect of the tax is only to restrict the demand for the products of his labor. As a war necessity we cheerfully accepted this burden which the manufacturers of the country have borne with such uncomplaining loyalty; but now that the necessity is past, and that the national exchequer is in such a condition that it can easily and safely dispense with the revenue it produced, we think we are entitled, on behalf of manufacturers and their workmen, to demand its repeal. England, with all her load of taxes, has no such impost as this; her uniform policy is in every way possible to cheapen the production of her wares, and in the unequal contest which we are called to wage with her it is in the last degree unwise to put ourselves under this additional and unnecessary disability."

Sir, this generation embraces the widows, orphans, and maimed soldiers of the contending parties in a civil war, each of which parties had armies numbering more than a million men in the field. They at least are in no condition to welcome excessive taxation, especially those of the South, who are without even the poor pittance we give to ours as pensions. The folly of the dull farmer I have supposed—a case of stupidity scarcely probable, though possible within the range of human dullness—is the wisdom by which the Secretary proposes to guide the finances of this country and extricate them from embarrassments which in this report he depicts as almost overwhelming. Let us hear him. He says that—"He has been clear in his convictions that specie payments are not to be restored by an accumulation of coin in the Treasury to be paid out at a future day in the redemption of Government obligations; but rather by quickened industry, increased production, and lower prices, which can alone make the United States what they ought to be—a creditor and not a debtor nation."

And as if to illustrate his want of sincerity, or the confusion of his ideas, proceeds to speak of "certain branches of industry that are now languishing under the burdens which have been imposed on them;" and to tell us that though "the people of the United States are naturally a commercial and maritime people, fond of adventure—bold, enterprising, persistent"—

"The disagreeable fact must be admitted, that with unequal facilities for obtaining the materials and with acknowledged skill in ship-building, with thousands of miles of sea-coast, indented with the finest harbors in the world, with surplus products that require in their exportation a large and increasing tonnage, we can neither profitably build ships nor successfully compete with English ships in the transportation of our own productions. Twenty years ago it was anticipated that ere this the United States would be the first maritime power in the world. Contrary to our anticipations, our foreign commerce has declined nearly fifty per cent. within the last six years."

And as if to impress us more profoundly with our present inability to bear excessive taxation, he sets forth the following statistics:

"The tonnage of American vessels engaged in the foreign carrying trade which entered United States ports was—

In 1860.....	5,921,285 tons.
In 1865.....	2,943,661 "
In 1866.....	3,372,000 "

"The tonnage of such vessels which were cleared from the United States was—

In 1860.....	6,165,924 tons.
In 1865.....	3,025,134 "
In 1866.....	3,383,176 "

"The tonnage of foreign vessels which entered our ports was—

In 1860.....	2,353,911 tons.
In 1865.....	3,216,967 "
In 1866.....	4,410,424 "

"The tonnage of foreign vessels which were cleared was—

In 1860.....	2,624,005 tons.
In 1865.....	3,535,123 "
In 1866.....	4,438,384 "

While admitting that something of the diminution of our shipping must be attributed to the effects of the war, the Secretary, as if to prove that high taxes have been more destructive than war, says:

"The scarcity of American vessels ought to have produced, and but for a redundant currency and high taxes would have produced, activity in our ship-yards and a rapid increase of tonnage; but this has not been the case. The prices of labor and materials are so high that ship-building cannot be made profitable in the United States, and many of our ship-yards are being practically transferred to the British Provinces. It is only a few years since American ships were sought after on account of their superiority and cheapness; and large numbers of vessels were built in Maine and other States on foreign account or sold to foreigners, while at the same time our own mercantile marine was being rapidly increased."

"It is an important truth that vessels can be built very much cheaper in the British Provinces than in Maine. Nay, further, that timber can be taken from Virginia to the Provinces, and from these Provinces to England, and there made into ships which can be sold at a profit; while the same kind of vessels can only be built in New England at a loss by the most skillful and economical builders."

"The same causes—a redundant currency and high taxes—that prevent ship-building tend to prevent the building of houses and even of manufactories. So high are prices of every description that men hesitate to build dwellings as fast as they are required, and thus rents are so advanced as to be oppressive to lessees, and the healthy growth of towns and cities is retarded. So it is in regard to manufactories. Mills which were built before the war can be run profitably, but so expensive are labor and materials that new mills cannot be erected and put into operation with any prospect of fair returns upon the investment, unless upon the expectation that taxes will remain as they are and prices be sustained, if they are not advanced. The same causes are injuriously affecting agriculture and other interests which it is not necessary to particularize. It is everywhere observed that existing high prices are not only oppressing the masses of the people, but are seriously checking the development, growth, and prosperity of the country."

What remedies does our sagacious Secretary propose for the evils he so truthfully de-picks? One, and apparently in his judgment the most efficacious, is that which I have been considering, namely, to add not less than four or five million dollars per month to the price of American products by taxing them to that amount for the express purpose of extinguishing so much of our national debt! If gentlemen doubt my statement I beg them to give the report an attentive reading. This mad policy pervades all its suggestions. Nor is it to be temporary. It is to be the fixed policy of the Government, and he says our debt which, according to his statement, was on the 31st of October last $2,551,424,121 20, "can be paid by the generation that created it."

Sir, if my suspicion that the preparation of the Secretary's report was committed to a treacherous subordinate be correct gentlemen will be able to estimate the wantonness of that person's cruelty by the fact that in further illustration of the absurdity of its leading proposition he proceeds to tell us that "between the years 1848 and the 1st of July, 1860, the product of the gold and silver mines of the United States was about $1,100,000,000," but that "it is not probable that the amount of gold and silver now in the United States is very much larger than it was eighteen years ago." And as if to give greater effect to what, were it not gravely trifling with the prosperity of the American people, might be regarded as a huge joke, adds the fact that beside exporting all our bullion we have, in exchange for perishable foreign commodities which we might have fabricated from our own raw materials, given to foreign capitalists, who now hold them, interest-bearing evidences of debt to the amount of $600,000,000, as follows:

United States bonds.....	$350,000,000
State and municipal bonds.....	150,000,000
Railroad and other stocks and bonds.....	100,000,000
Total.....	$600,000,000

Nor does he yet stay his hand in presenting reasons why we should not adopt his proposition, for he informs us that the reports of the custom-houses show that though we exported specie during the fiscal year which ended June 30, 1866, to the amount of $82,643,374, the balance of trade, as shown by those reports, was still against us in gold values $8,009,577. And with a measure of candor for which I award him full credit, adds:

"But these figures, taken from the reports of the custom-houses, do not present the whole truth. For many years there has been a systematic undervaluation of foreign merchandise imported into the United States, and large amounts have been smuggled into the country along our extended sea-coasts and frontiers. To make up for undervaluations and smuggling, and for cost of transportation paid to foreign shipowners, twenty per cent. at least should be added to the imports, which would make the balance for the past year against the United States nearly $100,000,000. It is evident that the balances have been largely against the United States for some years past, whatever may have been the custom-house returns."

Mr. Chairman, I confess my ignorance of "Ingeany bankin'," and will proclaim my gratitude to any of its disciples who will so far admit me to its mysteries as to enable me to reconcile the Secretary's premises and conclusions.

Meanwhile I ask who but he, unless it be bankers and shavers of notes, importers of foreign goods, and holders of our bonds who desire to get two dollars for every one they invested in them, who but these does not see in this fearful array of evidences of our tendency to universal bankruptcy a necessity for developing our productive power by diminishing the internal taxes of the country to the lowest possible amount consistent with an economical administration of the Government? And who but these does not see that by continuing the course we are pursuing we are retarding the permanent resumption of specie payments and postponing the day when we shall be able to enter judiciously upon the extinguishment of our debt?

Mr. Mculloch does not seem to perceive that this fearful array of facts is but so many concurrent items of evidence that notwithstanding our freedom, enterprise, and energy, and our infinitely diverse, easily-accessible, and inexhaustible stores of natural wealth, our extended sea-coast, fine harbors, broad lakes, and far-rolling rivers, which invite us to manufacturing and maritime effort and preëminence, we are but a mere commercial dependency. Like all other debtors we are at the mercy of our creditors. Though richer in natural resources than all of them combined the continuance of our prosperity is dependent upon the caprices or necessities of England and the nations of Europe, which, by protecting their industry and importing only raw material or commodities but slightly wrought and exporting products as much manufactured as possible, practice economies unknown to us, and by diversifying their industry provide remunerative employment for all their people.

Manufactures and agriculture are each the handmaid of the other, and the successful practice of both is prerequisite to profitable and sustained commerce. That sea-board nation which most diversifies its productions and best protects its skilled labor against unequal competition will ever be foremost in the race for commerce.

No, sir; the Secretary does not see the proper application of the facts he cites, and while dilating upon them illustrates his profound ignorance of the progress social science has made by reiterating trite maxims from English handbooks of political economy to prove that international trade-balances are settled with gold and silver and that the flow of specie "indicates the condition and results of trade between different nations." In the light of these laws I point him and the country to the fact that the trade between us and foreign nations has carried them our cotton and wool, our beef, pork, grain, and other staples, and $1,100,000,000 of our bullion with $600,000,000 of our bonds to pay for wines, silks, laces, cloths, &c., and iron rails to stretch across the coal and iron beds which underlie our country from the Atlantic coast to the Pacific and from the lakes to the Gulf, and ask them if the facts do not indicate bankruptcy as the "result" if the present and past "condition" of that trade be maintained. And whether, when as now we are compelled to look to our internal taxes for the bulk of our receipts, when duties on foreign imports could under no possible system provide us with adequate income, it would not be well as a pure question of revenue to so adjust our taxes as to relieve American labor and land from every possible exaction and by every possible device to stimulate the development of our productive power and the immigration of skilled laborers into the country? Thus, and thus alone, can we check the flow of specie and bonds to Europe and retain among us as capital the production of our gold and silver mines with which to redeem the $600,000,000 of bonds now held by foreigners. This the Secretary professes to desire, but how the imposition of extraordinary taxes upon our industry to the amount of $50,000,000 per annum is to promote it he has not condescended to inform us.

The scheme of the Secretary is as unprecedented as it is unwise. It is without a single historical example. The first Federal debt was funded in 1791, and for sixteen years no effort was made to reduce it. In 1807 the receipts of the Government from ordinary sources were in excess of current expenses, and the surplus was applied to the debt. This easy and natural process of extinguishment continued till 1812. The average rate of payment per annum from 1807 to 1812 was about $6,000,000, and at the breaking out of the war with Great Britain the debt had been reduced from $75,000,000 to $45,000,000. It was swollen by that war to $127,000,000; but no extraordinary taxes were imposed for its redemption. The revenues of the Government were derived from ordinary sources, and such balances as remained after paying current expenses were applied to its absorption. No statesman of either period proposed to cripple industry and retard the development of the country by the imposition of extraordinary taxes as a means of extinguishing its debt. They wisely stimulated both by imposing higher duties upon foreign importations, and under the avowedly protective tariffs of 1824 and 1828 paid it off. Such a spectacle had never been witnessed before, for no other nation had ever liquidated its entire debt.

The American people will rather follow the successful example of the statesmen of those days and foster our industry than accept the crotchets of our present Secretary of the Treasury and cripple labor and diminish production by extraordinary taxation. They freely lent their substance to the Government and hold more than eighty per cent. of our national securities, and none of them are demanding payment. Nor need we be specially anxious about that part of our bonds that are held in Europe. They who hold them bought them as investments or as matter of speculation. As investments they pay better interest than the holders can elsewhere obtain with equal security, and we are not required to prostrate our industry by a vain attempt to hasten the day on which foreign speculators shall realize anticipated profits. England has never been guilty of such stupidity. When the Napoleonic wars closed the governing class of England held her bonds, and like the money-changers and "Ingeany" bankers of our country clamored for the resumption of specie payments that they might get par for the bonds which they had bought during those wars at such prices as our own sold for and in paper as irredeemable and depreciated as ours has been. By this operation they would have made an average of one hundred per cent. on their investments. But governing class as they were, it was not until seven years after the close of the war that the statesmen who controlled the financial affairs of Great Britain attempted the experiment of a resumption, or till the suspension had endured for well nigh a quarter of a century. And only within a few years—I think I may say within the present decade—has England made serious effort to reduce the principal of her debt, nor has she yet imposed an extraordinary tax for the purpose. Her statesmen knew that her population was increasing and her productive power in process of rapid development, and they knew also that so long as the interest is ready at maturity and the creditors of the nation see that its taxes are steadily diminishing and its population and resources increasing, they will regard the investment as safe.

Thus has England, while permitting her debt to increase, by showing her steady ability to diminish the taxes upon her people and provide for interest and current expenditures been able to reduce the interest on her debt from war rates to the low rates at which she now holds it; and that debt which by its immense volume seemed to overshadow her whole future, is now not in the proportion of ten per cent. per man, per dollar, and per acre to what it was at the date of the treaty of Paris. So will it be with us if we shun the nostrums of the Secretary of the Treasury. The estimated wealth of the loyal States at this time is $17,428,000,000 and their annual product $4,685,000,000. But thirty years hence, if the progress of our growth is not retarded by financial chicanery, the wealth of those States will be $90,000,000,000, and the annual product amount to $23,000,000,000, and the now prostrate but naturally richer South will then rival the people of the North in prosperity and tax-paying power.

Let me, Mr. Chairman, as it is due to the Secretary I should say, that he does not rest this urgent demand for the speedy extinguishment of the debt upon principles of social science or national economy. In this matter his head yields to his heart. He is guided by a sentiment. He prides himself upon his magnanimity, and would ruin the industry of the North and retard the development of our country for a century if need be rather than wound the sensibilities of our "erring southern brethren."

ren." Thus, after indulging in some trite reflections upon the evil of public debt in general, he tells us that—

"To the perpetuation of the existing debt of the United States there are also, it may be proper to remark, serious objections growing out of the circumstances under which it was created. Although incurred in a great struggle for the preservation of the Government, and therefore especially sacred in its character, its burdens are to be shared by those to whom it is a reminder of humiliation and defeat. It is exceedingly desirable that this, with other causes of heart-burnings and alienation, should be removed as rapidly as possible, and that all should disappear with the present generation, so that there may be nothing in the future to prevent that unity and good feeling between the sections which are necessary for true national prosperity."

To others than the Secretary it is known that the country is no longer divided into hostile sections. That which made the South sectional was slavery and pride of caste. Slavery, thank God, has been forever abolished and pride of caste is vanishing. Yes, sir, the decree, sustained by a majority of nearly half a million of the voters of the northern States and enduring as the fiat of Heaven, that pride of caste must disappear from American politics has gone forth. Henceforth he who breathes the air of our country, let his color or fatherland be what or where it may, may by his own volition invest himself with the attributes of American citizenship. Everyone born on the soil is a citizen, and our naturalization laws are henceforth of universal application.

I fear the southern people after reading the Secretary's report will regard him rather as a man of sentiment than of affairs. They may applaud the delicacy of his sensibilities, but while doing so will probably wish that a well-informed statesman presided over his Department. Destructive to our interests, as the attempt to provide for the payment of our debt by extraordinary taxes on this generation would be, the southern people are less able than we to endure the mad experiment. Among them are, as I have said, the widows, orphans, and maimed soldiers of their armies, whose poverty is not relieved even by the pittance we give as pensions to the same classes; their industrial system has been overthrown and is not yet reorganized; their cities and towns by their dilapidation tell how their trade and commerce have suffered, and their lands to a great extent lie waste; their banks, insurance companies, and other moneyed institutions have gone into liquidation; their railroads are in ruins and almost bare of rolling-stock; and they are making daily appeals to the people of the North, whose presence among them the baser sort of Southerners will not permit, for capital with which to open and work mines of gold, silver, copper, lead, iron, and coal, in which their land abounds. Scourged by the results of their own folly they are awakening to a knowledge of the value of their possessions, and are proposing to make them available. They desire if they can obtain the requisite capital to locate the factory near the cotton-field and the forge and furnace near the mine and ore bed.

A brief extract or two from southern papers of very recent date will show how cruel Mr. McCulloch is to those to whom he wishes to be so kind. Says the Petersburg Index:

"The variety of schemes devised for the relief of that numerous and unfortunate class of persons who are now laboring under pecuniary embarrassment evinces the necessity, as well as the difficulty, of providing an adequate remedy for the mischief sought to be prevented. A further extension of the stay law, a total or partial repudiation of private indebtedness, and the exemption of specified property from involuntary alienation are some of the expedients now brought forward to meet the pressing exigencies of the occasion."

The Nationalist, Mobile, Alabama, says:

"Reliable planters from Mississippi say that not one half dozen, on an average, in each county in that State, can pay their debts. Large tracts of valuable land are selling at nominal rates."

And the Richmond Times says:

"If the tide of immigration continues to flow by us, and we make no energetic and intelligent effort to secure it, taxation will speedily devour what little the war left, and a few years hence when the pine, the persimmon, and the sassafras have made a wilderness of many a broad and once fertile field, some inauspicious day the tax-gatherer or the sheriff will hang out his red flag over the ruins of the old family mansion, and then, alas for the paternal acres, and the dear, sacred old homes of our boyhood! for everything, even the dear old graveyard, where repose the honored dust of our forefathers and the bones of many a noble soldier, son, and fair daughter will pass into the hands of some codfish-eating Puritan from Boston or Nantucket."

How incapable the people of North Carolina are of enduring extraordinary taxation is shown by reference to facts which occurred anterior to the war by a writer in the Newbern Times of September 8. After saying with truth that "the old North State is inferior to none of her sisters in the combined advantages of situation, climate, agricultural and mineral riches," he proceeds to make the following exhibit:

"In 1860 North Carolina ranked as twelfth among the States, containing a population of 992,622, of whom 331,059 were slaves. The free population are distributed according to places of birth, as follows:

Born in North Carolina.....	634,220
Born in other southern States.....	21,446
Born in northern States.....	2,399
Born in foreign countries.....	3,299
Born at sea and not classified.....	201

"While North Carolina was thus receiving from without her limits about twenty-seven thousand immigrants, she sent as emigrants to other States no less than 272,606 of her free-born offspring who are scattered throughout the western and southwestern States, of whom Tennessee received 55,000, Georgia 29,000, Indiana 27,000, Alabama 23,000, Arkansas 18,000.

"She was ninth among the States in her contribution to the population of the Union; seventh in contributing to the population of other States; behind all, save little Delaware and South Carolina, which ranks last of all, in the reception of citizens from other States.

"Of the vast foreign immigration, numbering upward of four millions, which has built up the manufactures and the internal improvements of the northern and western States she received only about three thousand, standing in that respect behind every State in the Union and behind three of the Territories."

But how capable the future people of North Carolina will be is well shown by the editor of the Old North State, published at Salisbury. In an article entitled "The Future of North Carolina," he says:

"The questions present themselves, how is all this to be done, and can the Government promote the great object by a proper policy? We shall endeavor to answer these questions to the best of our poor ability.

"The abolition of slavery has, in our opinion, changed the destiny of the State. The negro cannot be entirely relied upon as a laborer, and he must be assisted by or his place be supplied with white laborers sooner or later. These, except in a small portion of the State, cannot be profitably employed in agricultural pursuits until other interests are brought prominently forward and partially developed. This cannot be done without an influx of capital from abroad.

"The greatest of these interests, and those which we shall notice on this occasion, are the mining and manufacturing interests. It is perfectly useless for us to speak of the vast mineral wealth of North Carolina; it is known to all the world to be inferior to that of no country on the globe, both in quantity, quality, and variety of minerals, but we have no capital to render them available.

"And to the capitalist who desires to engage in manufacturing, no country in the world presents more inducements than North Carolina. Her water power is unsurpassed. As a general thing steam is useless in the State for manufacturing purposes; for the face of the country is intersected by water courses such as abound in few other lands. If we look at the map we shall see that there is a perfect network of streams, showing that it is one of the best watered portions of the earth, and the structure of the country is such that every one of these streams can be made to drive machinery. All this magnificent provision of nature has thus far been permitted to waste, in a great measure at least.

"It is scarcely necessary to refer to these facilities more in detail. Every reader knows the vast capacity of our larger rivers for these purposes. That of the Roanoke, the Neuse, the Haw, the Deep, the Main, the Yadkin, the South Yadkin, the Little Yadkin, the Catawba and other rivers of the State for driving machinery is scarcely equaled by any in the world, while we have many other smaller streams of very great capacity.

"And when all this water power is turned to account for manufacturing purposes, as it will be at no great distance of time, when we have thousands of furnaces in full blast turning the ores from the bowels of the earth into the richest marketable commodities, and when our vast deposits of coal shall be used for these and other purposes for which nature intended them, what a country we will have! What vast amounts of wealth must then flow into our laps. Our State will then be dotted over with the most flourishing manufacturing towns and villages and our now barren fields will teem with the richest verdure.

"This must necessarily be so. We stated at the outset that until the mining and manufacturing interests were at least partially developed imported white labor could not be profitably employed in agricultural pursuits. But when these interests become to be a power in the State the thing changes. All the thousands, if not hundreds of thousands, of factory operatives and miners must find a support, and the result will be that vast home markets will be created. The soil will be heavily taxed for their sustenance and consequently vast improvements will be made in our system of agriculture—and nothing needs improvement more. But we will not pursue this line of remark further—we have presented the general outlines, and we leave it to the imagination of our readers to fill up the picture. In the course of time the farms of our State will rival those of the Dutch Pennsylvanians; our lands will become equally productive, while our system of internal improvements will become equal to theirs."

More gladly, sir, than the people of the North will those of the South welcome release from every dollar of taxation from which sagacity can exempt them. And I assure the Secretary that the people of no part of the country have shared so largely as those of the South the surprise and wonder to which he alludes.

Mr. McCulloch says:

"We have but touched the surface of our resources; the great mines of our national wealth are yet to be developed."

This is specially true as to the southern portion of our country, and in the name of the impoverished people of that section I ask, is it well to tax a generation the surface of whose resources has not been touched by the transmuting hand of labor, and the mines of whose wealth are yet to be developed, in order to pay the principal of a mortgage the holder of which neither needs nor desires his money? and would not wisdom or state craft suggest the propriety of enabling the owners of these mines of wealth to accumulate the capital with which to work them and by the magic touch of labor to convert them into current gold? The taxing process maintains our exhausting dependence on foreign nations, while the developing process would make us as free commercially as we are politically; and enable us, by our example of liberal wages and freedom from their exhausting hours of toil, to influence the commercial and manufacturing usages of European States, as our political example is influencing their political and social institutions.

The Secretary, however, has other prescriptions than that of excessive taxation by which to restore the country. In his opening paragraphs he says:

"With proper economy in all the Departments of the Government, the debt can be paid by the generation that created it, if wise and equal revenue laws shall be enacted and continued by Congress, and these laws are faithfully enforced by the officers charged with their execution."

Again, he tells us that he "has mainly directed his attention to measures looking to an increase of efficiency in the collection of revenues, to the conversion of interest-bearing notes into five-twenty bonds, and to a reduction of the public debt." "Efficiency in the collection of revenues," forsooth! "The faithful enforcement of laws by the officers charged with their execution!" These are brave words to fall from the lips of one whose faithless exercise of official functions in this very matter has during the past year cost the Government more than $50,000,000. Brave words, indeed, are these from one who in a wicked attempt to subvert the popular will by the corrupt use of official patronage has removed hundreds of well-trying, capable, and experienced officers of the revenue and customs departments and substituted for them men deficient alike in capacity, experience, and character. There is not a congressional district in the country whose people are not grieving over the fact that the Secretary of the Treasury, who embodies in his report reiterations of these fine phrases, has wantonly and wickedly aggravated the onerous taxation under which they groan. Let who will speak of the necessity of a faithful administration and due enforcement of the revenue laws, for which every patriot will pray, becoming modesty would constrain the Secretary of the Treasury to avoid the topic. This is a matter on which Congress should take early action; and if it means that the customs and internal revenue laws shall be faithfully and impartially enforced it must see that another than the author of the report I am considering shall have the selection of officers for their enforcement.

Some of the Secretary's suggestions are embodied in distinct—no, not in distinct, but in numerical propositions. To one of these I invite the attention of the committee. It is as follows:

"2. That the duties upon imported commodities should correspond and harmonize with the taxes upon home productions; and that these duties should not be so high as to be prohibitory, nor to build up home monopolies, nor, to prevent that free exchange of commodities which is the life of commerce. Nor, on the other hand, should they be so low as to seriously impair the revenues, nor to subject the home manufacturers, burdened with heavy internal taxes, to a competition with cheaper labor and large capital which they may be unable to sustain."

"There's wisdom for you!" I venture to assert that Jack Bunsby throughout his intellectual career never uttered a more characteristic proposition than that; and all will agree that since the celebrated Kane letter of James K. Polk our political literature has embodied no utterance more shrewdly Delphic.

This ingeniously inexpressive proposition does not embody the Secretary's only allusion to "home monopolies." He seems to hold them in special dread; and it is to be deeply regretted that he has not indicated the argument by which his apprehensions are sustained, as they are not to be found in the works of the disciples of any school of political economy or social science.

The teachers of free trade do not agree with him in believing that high duties "build up home monopolies." They assert that protection secures undue profits to certain branches of production and tempts capitalists to ruin themselves by so overdoing the business as to glut the market and have to sell their goods at small profits or at a loss. Their theory proceeds upon the want of judgment in capitalists and business men—but by asserting that high duties beget undue domestic competition denies that they promote local monopolies.

Nor does Mr. McCulloch agree with the school of protectionists, for they say that assured protection against unequal competition gives capitalists confidence and induces them to open mines and build furnaces, forges, and factories, whereby constant employment and ample wages are secured to the otherwise idle people of the country. This theory proceeds on the assumption that the American manufacturer is competent to measure the contingencies of our own markets and of the natural course of foreign trade, but is not competent to resist the gigantic efforts which were commended by Lord Brougham, and one of which is now making by the Cressus-like capitalists of England "to stifle in the cradle those rising manufactures in the United States which the war has forced into existence."

Our present condition resembles very closely that of the States of Europe at the close of Napoleon's wars, and the following passage from the admirable address of John L. Hayes, Esq., entitled "The Fleece and the Loom," embodies illustrations of fixed laws applicable enough to dispel even the Secretary's dread of "home monopolies:"

"What would have been the future industrial condition of continental Europe if at the time when peace restored the nations to labor the textile manufactures had been left to their own free course and no legislation had intervened to regulate their progress? Can there be any doubt that they would have become the exclusive occupation of England? Alone in the possession of steam power and machinery; alone provided with ships and means of transport; alone endowed, through her staple legislation, with capital to vivify her natural wealth, she had absolute command of the markets of the Continent. The question was presented to the continental nations whether they should accept the cheap tissues of England, or at some sacrifices repel them, to appropriate to themselves the labor and profit of their production. The latter course was successively adopted, with some modifications, by each of the continental nations; and with what results to their own wealth and the industrial progress and comfort of the world? Instead of a single workshop Europe has the workshops of France, Russia, Austria, Prussia, Belgium, Sweden, Denmark, Spain, each clothing its own people with substantial fabrics; each developing its own creative genius and peculiar resources; each contributing to substitute the excellence of competition for the mediocrity of monopoly; each adding to the progress of the arts and the wealth and comfort of mankind."

The fifth of the Secretary's propositions is

"the rehabilitation of the States recently in insurrection." Referring to the conquered territories, which notwithstanding the President's usurpations await the action of the law-making power, Mr. McCulloch says:

"Embracing as they do one third part of the richest lands of the country, and producing articles of great value for home use and for exportation to other countries, their position with regard to the General Government cannot remain unsettled, and their industrial pursuits cannot continue to be seriously disturbed, without causing such a diminution of the production of their great staples as must necessarily affect our revenues, and render still more unsatisfactory than they now are our trade relations with Europe." "There will be no real prosperity in these States, and consequently no real prosperity in one third part of the United States, until all possess again equal privileges under the Constitution."

If it be true, as it undoubtedly is, that "one third part of the richest lands of the country" are by reason of temporary causes not producing "articles of great value for home use and for exportation to other countries" would it not seem to suggest the idea that this unhappy state of affairs should be permitted to pass away and these lands be made productive before they should be burdened with taxes not demanded by imperious necessity? And whether before these lands shall be able to bear taxation for that purpose the people of the North, whose sacrifices during the war saved the integrity of the Union, should be called upon to extinguish the debt created by the crimes of the possessors of this broad and rich territory? The people of the northern States have certainly arrived at this conclusion, and I have shown that schooled by suffering the people of the South, while antagonizing them on many points, agree with them on this.

Pursuing this branch of his subject, Mr. McCulloch asks, "Can the nation be regarded as in a healthy condition when the industry of so large a portion of it is deranged?" And the people, North and South, answer "No; and in our enfeebled condition we pray you not to rob us of our working capital in order to extinguish a debt which was contracted for the benefit of mankind and future ages."

He asks again, "And can the labor question at the South be settled as long as the political status of the South is unsettled?" And the country answers "yes, there is no inseparable connection between the labor question and the political status of the conquered territories;" and adds that the "political status" of the South cannot be settled until its rebellious leaders discover that the loyal people of the country are able to defend its institutions against the usurpations of Andrew Johnson, accept the constitutional amendments already adopted and which are in process of adoption by three fourths of the States which now constitute the Union, and submit to Congress constitutions republican in form upon which the people shall have set the seal of their approval. The people of the loyal North cannot restore those of the conquered territories to their "political status." We can only consent to their restoration when they shall be willing that it shall take place on terms which will render the future peace of the country secure, and for this we are and have been ready. The leaders of the South now we are the dog in the manger. It is they who by refusing to abandon the dogmas that evoked the war and the oligarchic institutions that sustained it resist the influx of the tide of immigration that would fertilize their lands and republicanize their institutions.

The imminent want of the people of the South is not "political status." That would not enable them to settle the "labor question." What they want is capital and currency and a willingness to permit loyal men, whether white or black, native or foreign, to dwell among them, and by their labor quicken into commercial value the boundless and varied natural wealth of the land they occupy, but which they will neither work themselves nor permit others to work in peace and safety. When in obedience to a healthy national sentiment or the promptings of their own interests they will make capital secure, opinion free, and give peaceful scope to enterprise within their borders, the immense deposits which profitless to their owners now lie in bank, because under the hammering process of the Secretary of the Treasury judicious men are afraid to embark in new enterprises will be transferred to the South to develop her productive and taxable power, and make her populous and prosperous beyond the wildest dream of the visionary theorists who involved her in a war as causeless as it was disastrous.

Mr. Chairman, time will not permit me to answer all the Secretary's interrogatories or examine each of his numerical propositions.

But his friends may complain that I have not alluded to that which they regard as his chief specific. It is set forth in the second of another series of propositions as follows: "a curtailment of the currency to the amount required by legitimate and healthful trade." On this point, though not condescending to indicate what amount of currency is in his judgment required by "legitimate and healthful trade" in the present abnormal condition of the country, the Secretary is peculiarly coherent and luminous. He is clearly a disciple of Dr. Sangrado. He recognizes the circulating medium as the life-blood of commerce, and as Sangrado attempted to restore his patients by withdrawing blood and injecting warm water into their veins he proposes to assist extraordinary taxation in the work of rehabilitating the southern States, whose great want is currency and working capital, and in invigorating the languishing interests of the North by contracting the currency, and especially by withdrawing that portion which is of equal and unquestioned value in every part of the country—the United States notes, commonly called "greenbacks." He says:

"He regards a redundant legal-tender currency as the prime cause of our financial difficulties and a curtailment thereof indispensable to an increase of labor and a reduction of prices to an augmentation of exports and a diminution of imports, which alone will place the trade between the United States and other nations on an equal and satisfactory footing."

And that—

"He is of opinion that the national banks should be sustained, and that the paper circulation of the country should be reduced, not by compelling them to retire their notes, but by the withdrawal of the United States notes."

Mr. Chairman, had I been properly instructed in the mysteries of "Injeany banking" I might be able to comprehend and appreciate these suggestions; but in the blindness of my ignorance I cannot see what there is to commend his theory to the Finance Minister of our country. The greenbacks are, it is true, part of our debt, and must therefore at some day be redeemed; but they are the only part of our immense debt which bears no interest; and while there are outstanding, as the Secretary's statement of December 1, 1866, shows, $147,387,140 of compound-interest notes which are currency and used as such by the national banks, and $699,933,750 of three-years' notes bearing seven and three tenths per cent. interest, all of which were purchased in a greatly depreciated currency, I cannot comprehend the philosophy which proposes to let the interest on these run, while absorbing a non-interest-bearing loan which the people cherish as furnishing the best currency except specie they have ever had.

The experiment if attempted as a means of hastening specie payments will prove a failure, but not a harmless one. It will be fatal to the prospects of a majority of the business men of this generation and strip the frugal laboring people of the country of the small but hard-earned sums they have deposited in savings banks or invested in Government securities. It will make money scarce and employment uncertain. Its object is to reduce the amount of that which in every part of our country and for the hundreds of thousands of millions of dollars of domestic trade is money and to increase its purchasing power; and by unsettling values it will paralyze trade, suspend production, and deprive industry of employment. It will make the money of the rich man more valuable and deprive the poor man of his entire capital, the value of his labor, by depriving him of employment. Its first effect will be to increase the rate of interest and diminish the rate of wages, and its final effect wide-spread bankruptcy and a more protracted suspension of specie payments. Anxious as the people are to relieve the country of the evils entailed upon it by the war, and willing as they have proven themselves to be to endure any privations or make any sacrifices required by the exigencies of the country, they will not consent to an experiment involving such terrible consequences for the purpose of paying the "Injeany" and other banks which hold and use as part of their reserve our compound-interest notes two dollars for every one they invested in this interest-bearing portion of our "lawful money." Much as banks, bankers, and speculators in Government securities may approve this policy, the people earnestly and indignantly protest against it.

Does Mr. McCulloch forget that the compound-interest bearing notes are part of the "legal tender currency" against which he declaims, and that by absorbing them he will be contracting the currency and reducing the volume of interest that is compounding against the Government? The banks are required, those of certain cities, to maintain a reserve of "lawful money" equal to twenty-five per cent. of their circulation and deposits, and the balance of them a like reserve of fifteen per cent., and as he well knows they have absorbed and hold not greenbacks, but compound-interest notes as that reserve. He should keep his non-interest-bearing notes afloat till these are redeemed. They will mature in 1867 and 1868, and by redeeming them he will contract the currency at the rate of $6,000,000 per month and relieve the Government of one of its most exhausting interest accounts. By this process he will keep five-twentieths above par and promote the conversion into them of seven-thirtieths, and reduce the interest on that portion of our debt from seven and three-tenths to six per cent. But by his process of contracting the volume of greenbacks and imposing extraordinary taxes on our industry he will delay the redemption of the one and the conversion of the other, and may deprive us of the ability to redeem either the seven-thirtieths or compound-interest notes at maturity.

The people do not regard greenbacks and the notes of national banks with equal favor, but have a well-grounded preference for the former. They know that the ultimate redemption of the bank notes is secured by deposits of Government securities and the maintenance of a reserve of greenbacks; and as the substance is more solid than its shadow, they prefer that which secures to that which requires to be secured. Several national banks have failed; and though the ultimate redemption of the notes was secured, there was no provision for their immediate redemption, and the laboring people who held them had to sell them at great loss to "Injeany" or other bankers, who could afford to hold them till the Government was ready to redeem them. Having sustained no such losses by greenbacks they naturally prefer them. Adequate as these reasons are for the popular preference, there are others which I will state, in the language of the Secretary's report.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. If I understand the gentleman from Pennsylvania, he asserts that when national banks fail their notes cease to circulate. Has the gentleman ever heard of any such instance? The Government is still responsible when the bank fails, and these notes are redeemed when presented at the Treasury. I understand they circulate, therefore, as well after as before the suspension of the bank. It may be remembered that the Treasurer of the United States was recently somewhat criticised by the press for his statement that the national bank notes were better after the bank failed than before.

Mr. KELLEY. I have recognized the ultimate responsibility of the Government for them, but I know that traders, and traders in money especially, take advantage of all contingencies, and I have known laboring men to sell to brokers the notes of a broken national bank at considerable loss. The announcement that a bank has failed depreciates the notes in the market, for the people, and especially laboring people, are not as familiar as the gentleman from Massachusetts with all the minute provisions of the law by which the ultimate redemption of these notes is secured; and when a bank fails those poor people, who cannot carry them to the Treasury for redemption, are compelled to sell them at a heavy loss. But, as I was proceeding to show, the Secretary of the Treasury more than sustains my position on this point, for he deliberately argues that legislation is required "to make them throughout the United States a par circulation." He says:

"The solvency of the notes of national banks is secured by a deposit of bonds with the Treasurer at Washington; but as the banks are scattered throughout the country, and many of them are in places difficult of access, a redemption of their notes at their respective counters is not all that is required to make them throughout the United States a par circulation. It is true that the notes of all national banks are receivable for all public dues, except duties upon imports, and must be paid by the Treasurer in case the banks which issued are unable to redeem them; but it will not be claimed that the notes of banks, although perfectly solvent, but situated in interior towns, are practically as valuable as the notes of banks in the sea-board cities."

These depreciatory remarks are not applicable to greenbacks. They are of equal value throughout the country, and the people cherish them for this reason more than from the fact that they are the evidence of a patriotic loan made by the people to the Government without interest. Had Mr. McCulloch suggested that the national bank notes, for holding bonds to secure which we pay the banks $18,000,000 per annum, should be supplanted by greenbacks, and that a sum equal to the interest on the bonds should be applied to the creation of a sinking fund for the redemption of the national debt, the people would have applauded his wisdom and patriotism, and not questioned his motives as they are now constrained to.

Had such been the Secretary's suggestion he might have omitted this one of his propositions, namely, to compel "the national banks to redeem their notes at the Atlantic cities, or, what would be better, at a single city," which, in plain language, is a recommendation that we increase the power and profits of the banks of New York by compelling every national bank outside of that city to deposit a portion of its funds with them. The gambling tendencies of the New York speculators in stocks and provisions need no such stimulant as this; and recent experience has shown that leading banks of that city are managed more recklessly than any others in the country, and would therefore be an unsafe depository for so large a trust. Less than a month ago the Secretary tested their management and produced a perturbation in prices throughout the country by which fortunes were lost and won by calling upon them for a small portion of the Government deposits, which were mistakenly supposed to be represented by a reserve of greenbacks in their vaults. He has not given the facts to the country, but it is known in well-informed circles that some of them were compelled to ask for a "brief extension" because they were unable to pay the checks of a depositor. Practical men may therefore be excused for speaking of the proposal of such remedies as charlatanism.

Mr. Chairman, as I have said, the Secretary has not ventured to indicate what, in his judgment, is the amount of currency "required by legitimate and healthful trade" in the present condition of the country. That condition is abnormal, though not entirely peculiar, and certainly not unprecedented. By unwise and unpatriotic legislation, which was dictated by the magnates of the South, millions of our poor people were doomed to the simplest and least remunerative forms of agricultural labor, or to enforced idleness, in which they were tending to barbarism; while our raw materials were being wrought into fabrics for our use in the workshops of transatlantic nations, and we had thus been drained of specie and had become largely a debtor nation before the war begun. Those same magnates plunged us into a war of unprecedented proportions, which we were unable to maintain with a specie or convertible currency. In the hour of our need we discerned the fact that ours is one of the two countries to which, in the language of Gortschakoff, the enlightened prince who is guiding the destinies of the other, "God has given such conditions of existence that their grand internal life is enough for them," and determined that until the war and its consequences should have passed away we would give the world an example of our ability and self-reliance, and use a currency based, not on the international standard, gold and silver, but on our faith in the resources of our country and the integrity of its Government. We thus furnished the Government $3,000,000,000 with which to create, arm, feed, clothe, and pay our Army and Navy.

How this prompt supply of money quickened industry and developed the productive power of the country I need not pause to say. I will, however, remind the committee that though it was "irredeemable legal-tender currency," it restored the credit of the nation, which had been unable to borrow $5,000,000 at twelve per cent., and lifted the people from the bankruptcy of 1857 to a degree of prosperity unequaled in our history. From 1857 to 1861 the rate of interest was high and that of wages low, and neither capital nor labor could find profitable and permanent employment. But with a safe, though perhaps somewhat redundant, currency, by the use of which our people were compelled to look to our own workshops for supplies, prosperity, in the midst of war, succeeded the adversity of contracted and stagnant peace with magic speed. And if we now adopt a tariff law that will protect our industry as faithfully as did the difference between our paper and gold, in which we required the duties on foreign imports to be paid during the war, we will soon discover that there is ample and profitable employment for all the currency authorized by law; and that if we resolutely refuse to increase its volume it will approximate the standard of convertibility more rapidly by the development of the productive power of the country and the diversification of employment for the people than it can by the process of contraction at any rate. Protection and development will insure a prosperous future; but rapid contraction will reproduce the stagnation, bankruptcy, and suffering of 1837 and 1857.

The question presented to the mind of practical statesmen is not what would be the best currency if we were founding a new community, or how far we might with advantage add paper to a purely metallic currency, but is, what under existing conditions do the true interest of the country require. And on this question I again take issue with the Secretary of the Treasury and deny that the country will find in a rapid or material contraction of its currency, or in extraordinary taxation, a remedy for any of the evils that afflict it. If, as some of his friends have done, the Secretary should point me to the high prices which many articles command, or to the immense deposits which, unproductive to their owners, are enhancing the present profits and future liabilities of the banks, I will reply to him, as I have to them, that these are not proofs of the redundancy of the currency, but of his mistaken policy and inveterate mismanagement.

Though the use of those immense deposits is lost to their cautious proprietors, the money does not lie idle in the vaults of banks; it is lent on call in large sums to adventurers, who by its use enhance the price of such commodities as they can monopolize or control. Those who could make their own capital productive are afraid to use it, and reckless gamblers riot in its use. Yes, sir, the Secretary's policy is calculated to diminish production and stimulate speculation, which symptoms have been the twin precursors of all our commercial crises and eras of bankruptcy. Under his fatal policy—

"The native hne of resolution
Is sicklied o'er with the pale east of thought;
And enterprises of great pith and moment,
With this regard, their currents turn awry,
And lose the name of action."

The sagacious but prudent owners of those deposits grieve that the money with which they would gladly open coal-mines and ore banks and build forges and furnaces and factories and import skilled laborers from Europe to increase and diversify our productions, enlarge our home market, and swell the revenues of the Government, lies dead and profitless to them. They justly charge their loss and that of the country to Mr. McCulloch, who, from his Fort Wayne speech forward, has lost no opportunity, official or unofficial, to warn the energetic men of the country against embarking in any new enterprises or accumulating any considerable stock of goods, or otherwise enlarging their arrangements for the future; and who, in his last utterance—the report which I am considering—notifies them of the near approach of the fatal collapse by assuring them that though the banks are without specie, the balance of trade is vastly against us and the Treasury has nearly one billion dollars of temporary loan to provide for, he is "confident that specie payments may be resumed by the time our interest-bearing notes are retired, which must be done in less than two years, and probably will be in a much shorter period."

What the effect of an effort at early resumption under such circumstances would be every experienced business man in the country knows. They know that it can by any possibility be but a spasmodic movement, which will literally vomit forth from the country the little gold and silver left in it. They know that it will bankrupt individuals, corporations, States, and, alas, it may be, the national Government itself. The avowed object of the Secretary in contracting the currency is to increase the purchasing power of money; and they know that the rapid decline in prices pending this mad experiment will sweep away the garnered capital of those manufacturers whose stock largely exceeds their working capital, exclusive of buildings and machinery, that mechanical and manufacturing production must be wholly suspended till the blighting tornado shall have spent its power, and that while it rages the receipts of the Internal Revenue Bureau must fall to zero.

But, sir, if by thus returning to the wretchedness of 1857 and 1857 we could resume specie payments, how long could we maintain them? The Secretary tells us that $350,000,000 of our bonds are held abroad. The average rate at which they were bought, when gold for long periods was above two hundred per cent., was less than fifty cents on the dollar, nor was that small amount paid in specie; for he also tells us that—

"The opinion that the country has been benefited by the exportation of its securities is founded upon the supposition that we have received real capital in exchange for them. This supposition is to a large extent unfounded. Our bonds have gone abroad to pay for goods which without them might not have been purchased. Not only have we exported the surplus products of our mines and our fields, with no small amount of our manufactures, but a large amount of securities also, to pay for the articles which we have purchased from other countries. That these purchases have been stimulated and increased by the facility of paying for them in bonds can hardly be doubted. Our importations of goods have been increased by nearly the amount of the bonds which have been exported. Not one dollar in five of the amount of the five-twenties now held in England and upon the Continent has been returned to the United States in the form of real capital. But if this were not a true statement of the case, the fact exists, as has been already stated, that some three hundred and fifty millions of Government bonds—not to mention State and railroad bonds and other securities—are in the hands of the citizens of other countries, which may be returned at any time for sale in the United States, and which being so held may seriously embarrass our efforts to return to specie payments."

Thus by Mr. McCulloch's own statement it appears that our bonds were bought at half their nominal value and paid for in commercial products which should have been created by our own industry from our own raw material by setting "our unemployed and poor people at work on the growth of our own lands;" and, if we may believe the Secretary's statement to which I have referred, a large portion of which commodities were brought into the country in fraud of our revenue laws by "undervaluations and smuggling." For what purpose, let me ask, were those bonds bought by their foreign holders? How long will they be held? When and under what contingencies are they likely to be returned to this country? And a more pregnant question still: what effect would be produced by the early return to specie payments threatened by the Secretary of the Treasury?

That I may do Mr. McCulloch no injustice, I answer those momentous questions in the language of his report:

"A large portion of these bonds have been bought on speculation, and will be likely to be returned whenever financial troubles in the countries in which they are held shall make it necessary for the holders to realize upon them, or whenever satisfactory profits can be made by returning them, which will be when they nearly approach their par value in coin."

Here at least he is right. Those bonds, having been bought at half the value expressed on their face, will be returned "when they nearly approach their par value in coin," and that will be when we resume specie payments. But as Mr. McCulloch has failed to pursue this operation to its inevitable result, the committee will pardon me for attempting the duty, though in doing so I may deepen the shades in the melancholy picture of our future which I have presented.

When those foreigners who bought our bonds on speculation perceive that by returning them they can convert them into gold and double their investment they will assuredly avail themselves of the literally golden opportunity. Questions as to how they can reinvest the proceeds advantageously need not deter them. They know how limited our stock of specie is, how heavy the balance of trade is against us, and consequently that by selling their bonds in our markets they would compel us to suspend specie payments again. Nor are they strangers to the fact that during that suspension they would be able to repurchase their bonds for half the gold received for them. Thus the experiment of the Secretary would inevitably terminate in the impoverishment of the citizen and the disgrace of the country by a renewed and more protracted suspension of specie payments.

Mr. Chairman, neither the Secretary of the Treasury nor Congress know whether our currency is in excess of the amount required by legitimate and healthful trade, or if it be, how long it will remain so if undisturbed by legislation. Nor can we settle these points by an appeal to experience, for many of our conditions are novel. That would be a curious and instructive calculation which would show the country the precise demand for currency created by the operation of the Bureau of Internal Revenue, or by the enlargement of the Army and Navy and clerical force of the Government.

Under the discipline of Providence the southern people will, before many years glide away, consent to permit their fields to be tilled, their mines to be worked, and their cities to be rebuilt and expanded; and who can tell the amount of currency that will then be required by the four million enfranchised slaves and the two million poor whites, who did not in the past, but are henceforth to earn wages and buy and sell commodities, or for handling the crops and mineral productions of the South? Since we last adjourned the iron horse has crossed Nebraska on one of the routes to the Pacific, and his snort has been heard in the neighborhood of Fort Riley on another; and during the last year three hundred thousand industrious people, who had been fed and clothed through unproductive childhood at the cost of other nations, came and cast their lot among us to till our fields, smelt our ores, work our metals, and manage our spindles and looms; and I cannot guess what amount of currency these energetic people and the westward-marching column of our civilization will require. But, sir, of one thing I am certain, and it is that had the Secretary of the Treasury not destroyed all sense of security in the future, the demand for currency to purchase, especially in the South, mineral and other lands and develop their productive power would have prevented the accumulation of the immense deposits which now lie paralyzed in bank or are loaned on call to speculators in the necessities of life. We unsettled values and made or scattered fortunes by the rapid expansion of the currency; and the people implore us to avoid another violent change fraught with like consequences, and to stay the work of contraction till we shall have ascertained, at least proximately, the amount of currency required by healthy and legitimate trade.

Mr. Chairman, the Secretary of the Treasury is not a philosopher—

"A primrose by a river's brim
A yellow primrose is to him,"

And the thing that has been in his belief, the thing that shall be forever. Neither his experience as an "Injeany" banker nor his official connection with the Government has disclosed to him the real relation of currency in detail or in volume to the business of a community. Throughout his report he assumes that the currency is redundant, and ascribes to its alleged redundancy consequences which are directly attributable to another cause but remotely connected with the question of the amount of currency. I refer to the prevailing and traditional vice in our banking system, that of building credits upon credit, of banking on deposits, or lending money by a bank to one man because it owes a like amount to another who has intrusted his funds to it for safe-keeping and convenience. To this vice in our banking system, which Mr. McCulloch has done much to aggravate by leaving stupendous balances of the public funds in favored banks, is to be ascribed nearly all the evils he mistakenly attributes to a "redundant legal-tender currency." If the corporations and private bankers of the country were prohibited from lending on call the deposits intrusted to them or using them in discounting paper, the doubling of the volume of currency would not produce a material advance in the price of commodities in general. This vice in our banking system, this banking on deposits or lending that which the banks owe, and to calls for the payment of which they are constantly liable, aggravates from four hundred to one thousand fold every modification of our currency, whether it be by contraction or expansion.

Neither the price of gold nor of other commodities is regulated nor materially influenced by the amount of currency; nor is the difference between gold and our currency evidence that the latter is inflated. If the Secretary controverts these propositions, I will remind him that gold commanded a premium of 185 in 1864, and ask him to let us know how much he had contracted the currency before it went down to 25, as it did in June, 1865; and again, how much he expanded the currency to put the premium on gold up again to 50, at about which figure it stood so long before dropping to 29 and ascending again to its present price. During all these fluctuations the volume of currency was not essentially modified. What a commentary these facts are upon the theories of the Secretary and his costly but vaunted attempts "to keep the business of the country as steady as possible." On this point he says:

"He has regarded a steady market as of more importance to the people of the country than the saving of a few million dollars in the way of interest."

And elsewhere, that—

"The Secretary has also deemed it to be his duty to use such means within his control as were, in his judgment, best calculated to keep the business of the country as steady as possible, while conducted on the uncertain basis of an irredeemable currency. To accomplish this he has thought it necessary to hold a handsome reserve of coin in the Treasury."

But, sir, assuming that the volume of currency does not regulate prices, and that apart from the often fatal vice in our banking system to which I have alluded it has but little influence on them, I appeal from the judgment of Mr. McCulloch to that of the people; and ask whether, if the volume of currency regulated prices, it would not affect every species of property equally or nearly so?

If prices are regulated by the volume of currency, how is it that American wool is as cheap in the Philadelphia market now as it was before the war? How is it that corn is unusually low and wheat is commanding a higher price than ever before in the history of our country? How is it that during last month one variety of cotton goods, those known as brown or unbleached goods, advanced twenty per cent., or two cents per yard, and another variety, bleached goods, declined twenty per cent., or from five to seven cents per yard? How is it that mess pork commands but about half last year's prices, while the decline in beef has been little more than nominal? And how is it that in 1865, with gold at 25, Lehigh coal commanded at the shipping point from five to six dollars per ton; and in 1866, with gold ranging from 32 to 40, the same qualities of coal at the same points will not bring three dollars to three dollars and a quarter per ton?

But I will not weary the committee with further illustrations of the absurdity of the Secretary's postulate. It is, however, proper that before leaving this point for the present I should admit that a violent and sudden contraction of the currency at a time when the loans of our banks are extended by lending their deposits does work an inevitable and often ruinous reduction of prices. It is thus: under the influence of contraction depositors draw upon their reserve, and the banks to meet the demand call upon their debtors, and they to protect their credit must sell, no matter at what sacrifice, at such prices as they can get. I need not follow the movement to its consequences. A tight money market, causing a few failures, has more than once begotten panic and widespread bankruptcy, and would now extinguish the revenues of the Government. Had the Secretary of the Treasury ascribed the fluctuations in business and the inordinate prices at which many of the necessities of life are held to their real cause, our habit of banking on accumulated credits, and not pressed the purpose of contracting the currency, the country would not be depressed as it is. Threatened contraction has hung like the sword of Damocles over the heads of our producing classes.

Let me ask, what is currency and what is its function? Currency is that which a people have agreed to accept and use as money. It is the medium by which the small transactions of daily life are settled. Its sphere is that of personal use and retail trade. Except in the final settlements between banks and their customers, it is not commonly used in large transactions. We carry currency upon our persons to meet current demands. You find it in the till of the retail dealer and the hands of workmen, who, when currency is abundant, are paid in it, and not in orders on stores at which they are compelled to select articles from a small stock of inferior goods and pay high prices, as they did when currency was scarce. It is possible that Mr. McCulloch does not know that the abundance of currency has redeemed our laboring people from the burdensome taxation inflicted upon them by the order system and payment in the depreciated paper of distant and unknown banks. Currency in its legitimate use has no wider sphere than I have indicated. Like all other blessings, it may be perverted, as it is when it accumulates as deposits in banks and is used as the basis of large loans to adventurous operators or speculators. In the heavy operations of business currency finds no place. These are settled by checks, drafts, and bills of exchange. Before the war currency was scarce, and the deficiency was supplied by the promissory notes of individuals who, by indorsing the notes of those who bought from them or those of their factors or commission merchants, became debtors to the amount due them from others. It is said that when the war began the amount represented by the promissory notes of individuals was more than $200,000,000; but now that the supply of currency is adequate, few men take such notes, and none propose to give them but the people of the South, who have no currency. The contraction of the currency insisted upon by Mr. McCulloch would revive the credit system, with its orders, for work people, and its periodical returns of wide-spread bankruptcy to the community at large.

I do not think the Secretary is entirely ignorant of the simple truths I have been enunciating. It would be pleasant to know that he is, for it is not agreeable to be constrained to doubt the motives of one to whom we have given our confidence. But in view of the communication made by Mr. Nasby and the fact that the Secretary's theories, if carried into execution, will promote speculation, I cannot help thinking that he regards banking and stock operations as the interests to which all others should be subordinated. He recommends the withdrawal of the greenbacks that the national banks may supply the circulating medium of the country, and he wishes each national bank to be compelled to deposit in one of the Atlantic cities a sufficient amount of its capital to justify the redemption of its notes at that point. The Atlantic city to which he points is the great center of banking and speculation; and compliance with these suggestions would aggravate the speculative power of New York by the proportion such deposits would bear to its general fund. His theories are in perfect accord with his practice, for I find that he is in the habit of furnishing the banks, and through them speculators, an average loan of about twenty-five million dollars. Thus by an official statement which lies before me it appears that the balances in the hands of the national banks was—

June 1, 1866.	$26,335,725 59
July 1, 1866.	34,124,171 21
August 1, 1866.	36,931,415 22
September 1, 1866.	32,590,274 53
October 1, 1866.	30,976,793 85

I am, however, informed officially that there was during those months a liability to draft on these balances distributed through not less than three months amounting in all to $14,000,000 by coupons in transitu or in the hands of the holders; so that the banks could with safety lend on call during the whole period $25,000,000 to those engaged in speculating in food and increasing its price. Had $20,000,000 of the sum been applied to the absorption of seven-thirties or compound-interest notes speculation would have been less rife, our interest account would have been materially diminished, and a slight approximation have been made toward specie payments and the ultimate redemption of the public debt. Doubtless Mr. McCulloch's desire "to keep the business of the country as steady as possible" alone prevented this happy consummation.

Sir, it is within our memory that the establishment of the sub-Treasury—the divorcement of the public Treasury from the banks and banking system of the country—overthrew the Administration and party that inaugurated it; but it is also remembered that so beneficent were its operations that no succeeding administration of any party dared assail it. It had not been in operation a year till it had vindicated its wisdom in the estimation of every judicious business man. Nor would it probably ever have been interfered with in time of peace. The great convulsion which threatened to divide our country interrupted its action which should forthwith be restored. It acted as a regulator, a natural regulator, of the trade of the country. When enterprise ran into excesses and unduly increased the public revenues, it withdrew from circulation and locked up a portion of the currency, and by the stringency it thus created admonished banks and business men to pause; and when, having given an early check to rash operations and diminished the current revenues of the country, it gently, as by a process of nature, restored vigor to the circulation by the fact that its payments were in excess of its receipts, as its receipts had just been in excess of its payments. As a safeguard for the public funds, if for no other reason, the Secretary should have recommended its full restoration, for during the entire period of its existence, as far as I know, the Government did not lose by any of its officers as much as it did by the failure of the Merchants' National Bank of Washington alone. It was a safe depository for the public money, as well as a healthful influence in the business operations of the country. Had the Secretary suggested that it would answer as well for a mixed currency as it did for the era of specie payments, and recommended its immediate reestablishment he would have done much to give steadiness to the business of the country, diminish speculative prices, quicken production, and increase the revenue of the country. And I trust that Congress before it rises will pass a law prohibiting the deposit of any portion of the Government funds in any bank, or, in other words, divorce the Treasury from the banks by reorganizing the sub-Treasury.

It was perhaps too much to hope for such a recommendation from the Secretary. He enjoys the control he now exercises over the business of the country, and would not willingly surrender it. But for the maintenance of an average deposit of more than $30,000,000 could the National-Union-Johnson party have extorted from the banks—perhaps not directly as corporations, but from their stockholders and officers, to be accounted for in the item of incidental expenses—the large contributions which the newspapers told us certain banks were forced to make in aid of the recent effort of the President and the Secretary of the Treasury to subvert the popular will. But this was but an occasional incident, probably never to occur again; for I believe that the future can produce to our country no second Andrew Johnson, or that should it contain within its womb another like unto him he will be unable to find creatures to sacrifice their own convictions and the interests of the country for the poor privilege of unworthily filling high places in a great Government. That of which I speak is the influence these deposits, coupled with his exclusive control of the gold in the Treasury, averaging about one hundred million dollars, which he complacently calls a "handsome reserve of coin in the Treasury," give the Secretary over the business of the country.

Under the action of the sub-Treasury, as I have shown, a payment of money by the Government relieved a stringent money market; but how is it now? When the Secretary of the Treasury is sacrificing such immense amounts of interest in order to give steadiness to business the Government deposits are loaned by the banks on notes of short date or on call; and if the current revenues of the Government be in excess of its current expenses, as they have been throughout his administration, its deposits accumulate and swell the volume of such loans. The receipts of the Government thus aggravate the tendency to undue expansion; and what is the effect when it is required to use any considerable amount of its deposits? It is this: the Secretary notifies the banks that he is about to call for ten or twenty million dollars; and the banks, not knowing which of their debtors will be ready and who may be utterly unable to pay, notify not alone borrowers of the precise amount demanded by the Secretary, but holders of five, six, or ten times the amount. Thus that which should give relief to the market becomes an exaggerated cause of contraction, and the payment of $10,000,000 by the Government is made to interfere with business operations to the amount of $100,000,000. We have all observed this and know that instead of being a natural operation the effects of which should be felt beneficially, each payment of any considerable sum of money by the Government, after a long line of deposits has accumulated, produces a perturbation through all commercial circles.

The payment of but $15,000,000 in the early part of last month came near producing a national panic and damaged the credit of leading banks. This system gives the Secretary despotic control over the markets of the country, and his favorites may have ascertained practically, as did Voltaire, who was given to stock speculations, that "it is a good thing to have a friend at court" through whom they may learn when it is well to sell, because things have reached their highest price, as Government is about doing that which should establish confidence, but which, owing to the Secretary's efforts to insure steadiness to business, will produce consternation if not panic and a general decline in prices; and when it is well to buy, because it suits the convenience of the Government to make another large and long loan to the banks. Such a power over the business of the country should be vested in no man; and I challenge the world to point to any fact in the official career of the present Finance Minister of the country which would induce any judicious man to vest it in him. There certainly is nothing in the suggestions of the report which I am considering to indicate that he is a safe depository for so useless, so wide-spread, and so dangerous a power.

But, Mr. Chairman, I am admonished that I should hasten to a conclusion. I must, however, beg the committee to bear with me while I examine briefly another of Mr. McCulloch's suggestions. It is offered as a specific remedy, because it is said it will diminish the rate of interest on our loans and protect us against the direful contingency of the bonds bought on speculation at depreciated rates coming home to exhaust our specie within a month of the day on which we are, by the magical agencies suggested by Mr. McCulloch, to resume specie payments within two years. It is characterized by the candor and wisdom which pervade his other suggestions. To a shrewd man of mere practical business habits, one not skilled in the mysteries of "Ingeany bankin'," it might seem to be somewhat impracticable; and the country regards it with humiliation and disgust. It is this: that after having carried on the war without an appeal to foreign nations or capitalists and without their sympathy; after having by our patriotic sacrifices put our credit so high that the people of Europe have voluntarily come and carried away, with great profit to themselves, $350,000,000 of our bonds; that now, when peace is restored, when we again possess the custom-houses, post offices, forts, and arsenals of the country, and when our taxes are not divided between our Treasury and that of a hostile confederacy, but all flow to our own, we shall issue "bonds payable in not over twenty years and bearing interest at the rate of not over five per cent., payable in England or Germany, to an amount sufficient to absorb the six per cent. bonds now held in Europe and to meet the demand there for actual and permanent investment."

If this scheme were practicable, I for one would spurn it. With their pirate ships on every sea, their ship-yards and factories busy in fabricating implements of war for our enemies, and in the face of their hatred, with self-reliance, of which posterity will be proud, we marched steadily on to conquest and final victory. And now, in the hour of our triumph, or in the calm season which should succeed so grand and successful an exhibition of power, with a continent beneath our feet abounding in raw material for the profitable employment of every art, trade, and mystery known to ingenious man; with India decimated by famine, Europe disturbed by wars and rumors of war, Ireland in incipient rebellion; and when we offer to the people of Europe established peace, political equality, public schools, a free church, and briefer hours of labor with better wages than those known to the artisans of any other country, this suggestion is as degrading as it is inopportune. Sir, nothing but some such folly as this official proclamation, as it would be regarded by the people of Europe, that our struggle exhausted us, and that with victory came premature decrepitude, can prevent us from compelling the nations of the world, by the tide of skilled workmen that will flow from their shores to ours, to follow our example and give those who produce their wealth culture, leisure, and the consciousness of free manhood. In such an hour and in view of such a prospect I am sure that Congress will not degrade the country by asking the money-changers of Europe to lighten its burdens or help us bear them.

But the scheme is hopelessly impracticable. Mr. McCulloch may see advantages in it which others fail to detect. It would serve, I doubt not, by what he calls "the trifling commissions to the agents through whom the exchanges might be made," to found a great American banking-house in London with continental branches, and might bless the country with the hope of large gratuities from some future George Peabody whom the Secretary would designate as the agent for making transfers and paying interest; but it would not accomplish the purpose its author suggests. With such knowledge of human nature as we possess let us consider the proposition. Those who hold our bonds bought them either as an investment or on speculation, and the interest upon them ranges from six to seven and three tenths per cent. Is it probable that those who bought them as an investment will change them before maturity for bonds bearing but five or four and a half per cent.? Or will those who bought them as matter of speculation, in view of the Secretary's assurance that in less than two years we will resume specie payments and enable them to convert them into gold at par, hasten to make such a conversion? When the leopard shall change his spots, the vulture protect the dove, and hungry mice abstain from eating unguarded crackers and cheese, I will be prepared to regard the Secretary's proposition as practicable.

Nor need we grieve that it is not practicable. Our destiny is written. Unwise legislation or such reckless maladministration as now prevails may retard it, but it will be achieved. It is written in the sublime doctrine of human equality, which gives vitality and stability to our institutions, and more perceptibly though not more enduringly in the geographical position, the continental proportions, and the unequaled resources of our country. Bounded by both oceans, with a larger area than all the nations of Europe, including Great Britain, which lie between the same distant parallels of latitude that mark our limits, and embracing mineral, agricultural, manufacturing, and commercial resources greater than they combined possess, the United States must be the foremost, richest, and most powerful nation of the world. However blind our Finance Minister may be to this fact, others perceive it, and our affairs will yet be administered in accordance with the sublime assertion of Gortschakoff, who, in an utterance to which I have already referred, when speaking of Russia and our country, said: "God has given to the two countries such conditions of existence that their grand internal life is enough for them."

Yes, the capitalist of Europe will yet be eager to lend us money as cheaply as they now loan it to England; but it will be when, by the conversion of our now profitless raw material into fabrics, by the skill and industry of our now unemployed citizens and the millions of industrious people who are coming to us from abroad, we manufacture more than we consume, and by rivaling England, France, and other continental nations in tropical markets, and those of other non-manufacturing regions, shall have turned the balance of trade in our favor. Then Americans will be able to compete with foreigners in bidding for our loans; and in exchange for cotton, tobacco, and other staples, our bonds will be returned to us instead of woolen goods and various other textile and metallic fabrics, which we now receive but ought to manufacture for ourselves. But foreign capitalists will not take bonds from us at four and a half or five per cent. in exchange for those which pay six per cent., while the balance of trade is against us to the amount of $100,000,000 per annum, and with compound-interest and seven-thirty notes afloat to the amount of nearly $1,000,000,000, with more than Gascon vanity we promise the almost immediate return to specie payments.

During the above speech, Mr. KELLEY's hour having expired, on motion of Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio, by unanimous consent, his time was extended till he had concluded.

Mr. HOLMES. Mr. Chairman, in "swinging around the circle" the President is again brought face to face with the Thirty-Ninth Congress. Professing similar views upon the grave questions growing out of the war, owing their election to the same political party, it was anticipated that the President and the Republican or Union members of this Congress, when called upon to act officially, would be found acting in concert and harmony.

Prior to the presidential election of 1864, the President had won the confidence of the Union party by the most lavish professions of loyalty and the most pointed denunciations of treason. With him no language was too strong to express his sentiments upon these subjects, and upon the question of reconstruction his creed was of the most radical stamp. Treason was to be made odious, traitors punished, impoverished, and banished from the ballot-box and legislative council, while loyalty was to have exclusive control of the work of reorganizing the governments of the States in rebellion, and was to be reimbursed for all losses during the war from the confiscated property of wealthy traitors. From uncomfortable back seats the disloyal were to look on without interfering with the process of reconstruction. No wonder that, with such professions upon his lips, the people were slow to believe that it was possible for their author to forget or repudiate them.

The first session of this Congress had hardly commenced before it became apparent to a majority of the Union members of this body that there could be no harmonious action between them and the President unless they proved recreant to their principles; and the close of the session found them not only in conflict with him upon every important measure of legislation relating to the States lately in rebellion, but the power and patronage of the General Government were being wielded with all the energy that disappointed and enraged ambition could stimulate to weaken or destroy the confidence of the people in their Representatives, upon the avowed and shameless principle that the public offices were "the bread and butter of the President," to be eaten only by those who would blindly follow him in his erratic course.

The "congressional plan of reconstruction" and "the President's policy" were diametrically opposed to each other, and were submitted to the people at the recent election for their approval or condemnation. Each had its advocates; each was fully canvassed before the people. The President in person discussed, explained, and illustrated, as few but him could illustrate, the internal and external workings of his "policy;" and after a patient hearing the verdict of the people has been pronounced. Everywhere has loyalty decided in favor of the "congressional plan," and against the "President's policy;" in favor of the power of Congress and against the power of the President to control or prescribe the terms of reconstruction. Emphatic and overwhelming has been the verdict. The people have answered the question so arrogantly propounded to them, "Will you have Andrew Johnson for President or King?" and the waning seer of the Administration can read and profit by the response.

In but three of the States that did not enact the rôle of secession can any claim be made that the "President's policy" has been sustained. Kentucky, that did not go through the form of secession, because she could better protect slavery in than out of the Union, and, failing in that, would be in a better condition to claim payment for her emancipated slaves;

Delaware, that sympathized with the rebellion, and Maryland, where the voice of loyalty has for the time been smothered and suppressed by returned and disfranchised rebels, alone sustain the President. But one of these—Maryland—contributed to his election; the other two cast their votes against him, as they had given their influence to the rebellion. Every other State that voted for Lincoln and Johnson sustains Congress and repudiates the President; and yet he has had the assurance, in a carefully prepared speech, to denounce this Congress in such language as the following:

"We have seen hanging upon the verge of Government, as it were, a body calling itself and assuming to be the Congress of the United States, when it was, in fact, but a Congress of a part of the States; and we have seen such a Congress pretending to be for the Union when every single step it took was to perpetuate dissolution and to make disruption permanent."

What portion of the States, let me ask, does he and his "policy" represent? When his administration commenced he had the same constituency and represented the same States as the Republican or Union members of Congress. Now, twenty-one of the twenty-two States that contributed to his election have repudiated him. The place made vacant in the Union ranks by the compulsory defection of Maryland has been filled by the accession of New Jersey, entitled to an equal number of electoral votes, so that twenty-two of the twenty-five States that participated in the election of President and Vice President in 1864, and casting two hundred and twelve out of an aggregate of two hundred and thirty-three electoral votes then given, condemn the "policy" of the President.

In the light of these results may we not ask if there is not another "body hanging on the verge of the Government calling itself and assuming to be the" President of the United States, when, in fact, upon the theory above applied to Congress, it is the President of a part only of the States, and that a very small part if those only are included that support "my policy" and are entitled to representation in Congress? What a constituency is this! What a stand-point from which to assail the Thirty-Ninth Congress as wanting in legality or popular support! No wonder the Secretary of the Treasury is anxiously waiting for the "rehabilitation" of the States lately in rebellion, ostensibly for the purpose of regulating the disturbed and nervous finances of the country, but really to enable the Administration, in theory if not in fact, to claim to represent as many States at least as there are Cabinet ministers.

So overwhelming has been the defeat of the Administration, so thoroughly have the people become disgusted with the "President's policy," that the Democratic party, through one of its ablest Representatives on this floor, was forced to disown all connection with or responsibility for the Administration, and to declare that the President was too heavy a load for any party to carry and expect to survive.

Even John Tyler never sunk as low as this during his official term. He was flattered and caressed by the Democratic party so long as he had offices to bestow; and it was not until he again became a private citizen that he realized how thoroughly he had forfeited the confidence of all parties. But the head of this Administration is not permitted to enjoy the hallucination that he has the confidence of any party, even during the continuance of his short and inglorious official career. The "ground swell" of public indignation followed fast upon the retreating footsteps of the presidential caravan; and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Le BLOND] but echoed the opinion of all candid and disinterested men when he characterized the President as too heavy a burden for any party to carry. And when an Administration has become so obnoxious and impotent that the Democratic party is constrained to reject its proffered support and embrace, it must be poor indeed. It has reached the lowest point indicated by any political thermometer yet invented. Repudiated by the people, shunned by the Democratic party, the Administration party is but an association of political lepers, wandering outside of any responsible organization, and upon whom the people have written the word unclean in blazing capitals; so that the honest and upright of all parties may shun their demoralizing association.

The President, in his assumed meekness, claims to be willing and anxious at all times to conform to and carry out the popular will. In the speech already referred to he says:

"I acknowledge no superior except my God, the author of my existence, and the people of the United States. The commands of the one I try to obey as best I can compatible with poor humanity. As to the other, in a political and representative sense, the high behests of the people have always been and ever will be respected and obeyed by me."

And yet, in the face of the overwhelming popular verdict against him, he renews in his message the oft-repeated recommendations of his "policy," insists that the governments of these States are entirely restored, and that it is the duty of Congress to admit them to representation here.

The unrepresented States also revive and intensify the agitation of this subject by rejecting or refusing to accept the constitutional amendment, leaving Congress released from any implied pledge to adopt their governments and declare them entitled to representation if they had accepted the amendment and conformed their institutions, laws, and governments to its provisions.

We may therefore begin this work de novo, and it is the duty of this Congress to review the whole subject, especially as the States most directly interested have shown a determination not to accept the very liberal terms proposed by this amendment.

I do not speak of a ratification by these States of the constitutional amendment as an act that can have any influence whatever upon its adoption or rejection as a part of the organic law of the land. I regard their action upon this subject only in the light of evidence as to the existence of loyalty or disloyalty in the people of these States. The question of its adoption as a part of the Constitution is to be decided by the States represented in Congress, and by those alone.

It is apparent that these State organizations have been and will be used in all cases to defeat or prevent the acceptance of this amendment, and to prevent the realization by the loyal people of the fruits of victory, to which they are entitled by their success in the war.

We may with propriety, then, inquire into the legitimacy of these governments to see what claims they have for recognition by Congress.

I will not go over the arguments on this subject so often adduced at the last session. It is sufficient to say that, agreeing with the President in the statement made in his proclamations appointing provisional governors, "that the rebellion had deprived the people of these States of all civil government," his subsequent proceedings to reorganize or reconstruct them find no warrant in the Constitution; and the fruits that they have produced are not such as appeal to the patriotism of the people for support, or to the well-settled power of Congress over the subject for toleration or longer forbearance.

On the other hand, from suffering and oppressed loyalty throughout these States, groaning under the most intolerant despotism and proscription, comes the earnest and persistent appeal that Congress will now speak the word that shall number these governments with the things that have been; that shall send them back to the prolific hot-bed of treason in which they were generated, and in the interest of which they have been mainly administered, and shall recognize as the people of those States capable of establishing governments therein those only, without distinction of color, who were true to the Government in the time of its weakness and trial.

While we might have winked at the gross irregularities in the reorganization of these States by the Executive or under his direction, or even have assented to and adopted them if they had been administered in the interest of freedom, no excuse can be given for such recognition when they are used to depress loyalty and exalt treason. The mandate of the Constitution, which requires the United States to guaranty to every State in the Union a republican form of government, contains ample authority for the overthrow of these governments and the erection of republican governments in their places, and it is time that its provisions were enforced.

The great objection the constitutional amendment encountered in the loyal States was on account of its extreme liberality. The people are far in advance of their Representatives upon this subject, and would have sustained with equal unanimity more stringent terms. And yet these terms, mild as they are, are denounced by the reconstructed governors of some of these States as an insult to their people that requires only to be read to be rejected.

The power of Congress to exact these or any other terms that may be deemed necessary having been affirmed by the people by so large a majority, should be considered settled and not open to discussion. It is res judicata, so far at least as this Congress is concerned.

The gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. HISE,] who appears here as counsel for the Administration after its defense has been abandoned by the Democratic party, made a heroic attempt to justify and sustain the "President's policy." Had his speech been brought down in point of time to the present generation, it might have been pertinent to the subject when the question was an open one and under discussion at the last session; but it is now too late, even if stripped of its antediluvian flavor, to be of benefit to his client, or to have the least influence upon the verdict already rendered. He is excusable, of course, because he was not present to hear the arguments and positions of the message, so often repeated on this floor at the last session, as often answered and refuted. He cannot now even secure an arrest of judgment in the case. He is like the lawyer who, on making a motion to set aside a judgment against his client in a criminal case, where the punishment was public whipping, was informed by the court that the penalty had already been inflicted, and that if he succeeded in obtaining a new trial his client would undoubtedly be again convicted, and the court would be compelled to resentence him and increase the punishment, as it would be a second conviction. He wisely concluded, under the circumstances, to waive his application for a new trial; and I commend his discretion to the consideration of the gentleman from Kentucky and all others who are like-minded.

I shall regard the question of the power of Congress over this subject as settled, and ask that the judgment of the people be enforced. They have decided that, as a condition precedent to the admission of Representatives from the States lately in rebellion, each of them shall accept the terms presented in the constitutional amendment and conform their laws and governments, both in letter and spirit, in practice as well as theory, to those terms. This those States are refusing to do, and their refusal is made in the most offensive manner. Can we waive or modify these conditions? "One jot or one tittle shall in no wise pass from the law till all be fulfilled." The only change that can be made in them will be to increase their stringency. We must not dilute or waive a single condition intended as "security for the future." This much, at least, the people will require at our hands. If those terms and conditions are rejected, they will demand that we advance instead of retreat; that we do now what, with propriety, might have been done before.

The governments that stand in the way of the acceptance of these conditions, and which have not even the shadows of regularity or popular approval, must be set aside and new ones organized in their places based upon impartial suffrage to trusted and confiding loyalty, and recognizing the equal rights of all men before the law.

As fast, then, as these States, through their pretended Legislatures or otherwise, reject the constitutional amendment in a manner indicating a settled purpose to prevent its acceptance or adoption, or neglect promptly to accept its terms and conditions, it is, in my opinion, the duty of Congress to declare their governments usurpations, and pass an enabling act authorizing the loyal people only in those States, without distinction of color, to take the necessary measures to establish therein governments, republican in form, that shall be entitled to and shall receive the recognition, protection, and support contemplated by the Constitution. In this way only will treason be rendered powerless, loyalty encouraged, and republican governments for those States established upon a firm and an enduring basis. If we do less than this we shall fail to meet the just expectations of the people, and shall receive, as we shall deserve, their censure and condemnation, and the condemnation of the friends of justice and impartial liberty through all coming time.

Mr. MERCUR obtained the floor, but yielded to Mr. MYERS, who moved that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. URSON reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, having had under consideration the President's annual message, had come to no resolution thereon.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION.

Mr. TROWBRIDGE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled Senate joint resolution No. 123, in relation to the settlement of the accounts of William P. Wingate, collector at the port of Bangor, Maine; when the Speaker signed the same.

PROTECTION OF OVERLAND ROUTES.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in compliance with a resolution of the House, information respecting the protection of the routes across the continent to the Pacific from molestation by hostile Indians; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

CHICAGO HARBOR.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in compliance with a resolution of the House, the report of the chief of Engineers respecting the improvement of Chicago harbor; which, on motion of Mr. WENTWORTH, was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

WESTERN MILITARY POSTS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in compliance with a resolution of the House, portions of General Babcock's report of the inspection of military posts on the western frontier; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

ADDITIONAL COMPENSATION.

Mr. GARFIELD, by unanimous consent, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a joint resolution giving additional compensation to certain employes in the civil service of the Government; which was read a first and second time, ordered to be printed, and made the special order for Tuesday next, after the morning hour.

The SPEAKER. The question now pending is the proposition in reference to reconstruction, on which the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BINGHAM] is entitled to the floor.

ORDER FOR FRIDAY AND SATURDAY.

Mr. NIBLACK. I move that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I suggest to the gentleman from Indiana that we had better meet here to-morrow, and go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, with the understanding that no business shall be done. There are many members who wish to make speeches.

Mr. NIBLACK. I would like to have some general understanding on the subject.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I think there will be a general understanding that there will be no vote taken to-morrow.

Mr. NIBLACK. If that is so, I will withdraw my motion.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I now move that by unanimous consent to-morrow and the next day (Friday and Saturday) be devoted to debate, and that no vote be taken on those days.

No objection being made, it was so ordered.

J. B. M'FARLAND AND OTHERS.

Mr. STOKES, by unanimous consent, presented the petition of J. B. McFarland, E. B. Turner, A. G. Buddington, S. B. Reid, and others; which was referred to the Committee of Claims.

DISLOYALTY.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I ask unanimous consent to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the following resolution, introduced into the House of Representatives December 4, 1862, by Hon. THADDEUS STEVENS, expresses the convictions and sense of this House, to wit:

"Resolved, That if any person in the employment of the United States, in either the legislative or executive branch, should propose to make peace or should accept or advise the acceptance of any such proposition on any other basis than the integrity and entire unity of the United States and their Territories as they existed at the time of the rebellion he will be guilty of a high crime.

And that the bill (H. R. No. 543) is clearly in violation of the spirit of said resolution, and that the same does in fact assert or at least admit that secessionists and rebels were successful in the dividing of the Union and destroying certain of the States of the United States as such in the Union and degrading them into Territories; and that Hon. THADDEUS STEVENS, in and by the introduction and advocacy of the said bill, has manifested a mind and heart disloyal to the Constitution and the Union of the States as they existed at the time of the rebellion, and is guilty of the crime specified in the resolution, and therefore deserves the reprobation of this House.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I object.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I insist that this is a question of privilege.

The SPEAKER. When the committee rose the House resumed the consideration of another bill which was already before it. The pending question is on House bill No. 543, which takes precedence.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I do not, however, wish to press the resolution at this time, as I see the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] is not in his seat.

JOHN COTTER.

Mr. FARQUHAR, by unanimous consent, introduced a joint resolution for the relief of John Cotter, of Franklin county, Indiana; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. FARQUHAR, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to amend an act entitled "An act to establish and equalize the grades of line officers of the United States Navy," approved July 16, 1862; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

AMOS HOPPER.

Mr. HARDING, of Illinois, by unanimous consent, submitted a resolution in relation to the claim of Amos Hopper and others for pensions; which was referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

MILITIA.

Mr. PAINE, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing under the law:

Resolved, That three thousand extra copies of the bill to provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining the militia, and for other purposes, referred to the Committee on the Militia, January 3, 1867, be printed in pamphlet form for the use of the said committee.

NEW EXECUTIVE MANSION.

Mr. NIBLACK. I ask unanimous consent to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds be instructed to inquire into the practicability and expediency of providing for the erection of a new Executive Mansion for the use of the President of the United States. And in case such committee shall deem it practicable and expedient to provide for the erection of such new Executive Mansion then that said committee be further instructed to inquire into the propriety of setting apart the present Executive Mansion for the use of the Department of State, and to report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. BAKER. I object.

RIVER SURVEYS IN ILLINOIS.

Mr. WENTWORTH offered the following resolution; which, being a call for executive information, was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be requested to communicate to this House what progress has been made in the surveys of the Rock and Illinois rivers ordered at the last session of this Congress, and the names of the officers to whom said surveys have been intrusted.

CLERK TO A COMMITTEE.

Mr. HARDING, of Illinois. I ask unanimous consent to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Militia be authorized to appoint a clerk, who shall receive the compensation allowed to the clerk of the Committee on Commerce for the time of actual service.

Mr. SPALDING. I object.

And then, on motion of Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio, (at half-past three o'clock p. m.) the House adjourned.

POWER OF AMNESTY AND PARDON.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 453, to regulate the tenure of offices.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I desire the bill which the Senator from Vermont has in charge to come up, but I do not suppose he expects to get through with it before the hour of one o'clock, and I am anxious to dispose of the bill which I called up yesterday and upon which the Senator from Maryland [Mr. JOHNSON] had the floor. He was unwilling to go on yesterday and asked to have it go over. Perhaps we can dispose of that to-day. As this bill of the Senator from Vermont will take some time, and the other bill has been up several times, and the Senator from Maryland is now in his seat, if the Senator from Vermont has no objection, I should like to call up that bill to repeal section thirteen of the confiscation act and dispose of it. We have had it up several times, and it has been put off to accommodate different parties. It was put off yesterday at the instance of the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am quite willing to assent to that, for I am in favor of the measure my friend from Illinois has in charge; but the bill which I have moved to proceed to the consideration of has been reported for a considerable length of time, and is of very considerable importance, and I should dislike to have it go over unless with the understanding that when this measure is disposed of it may then be proceeded with. With that understanding I shall have no objection.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Certainly I am as much for the bill the Senator has in charge as the others; but as we have progressed with the other I thought we had better finish it to-day if we could.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I will waive my motion, then, for the time being.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion of the Senator from Vermont is withdrawn.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I will then move that we now proceed to the consideration of the bill which I have indicated, to repeal section thirteen of the confiscation act, upon which the Senator from Maryland [Mr. JOHNSON] has the floor.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 828) to repeal section thirteen of "An act to suppress insurrection, to punish treason and rebellion, to seize and confiscate the property of rebels, and for other purposes," approved July 17, 1862; the pending question being on the amendment of Mr. SAULSBURY, to strike out all of the bill after the enacting clause and to insert in lieu thereof the following:

That the act entitled "An act to suppress insurrection, to punish treason and rebellion, to seize and confiscate the property of rebels, and for other purposes," approved July 17, 1862, be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, if the measure upon your table, which proposes to repeal the thirteenth section of the law to which it refers, was supported by its friends upon the ground that that section gives no additional power to the President and is consequently simply void, I should not trouble the Senate with the remarks I am about to submit;

but I understand it to have been the opinion of the friends of the original measure, and of course of the friends of the bill which is now upon your table, that that section is operative and does give the President powers which he has not under the Constitution. I propose, first, to examine the constitutional question; and secondly, assuming that that question should be decided as I suppose the friends of the measure upon your table think it should be decided, to examine into the expediency of adopting this bill at this time.

When the subject was before us prior to the recess, I asked my friend from Illinois, the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, if he proposed to repeal the section upon the ground that it gave powers to the President which he had not or whether he supposed it was within the authority of Congress to take from the President any powers which he has with reference to the subject by the Constitution. The latter question he of course answered in the negative. He told us, and told us correctly, as he always means to do, that the power of pardon vested in the President by the Constitution cannot by legislation be taken from him; and for the same reason I have no doubt he would admit that it cannot be in any way limited or qualified. It is vested in him alone in his official capacity as President.

The Senate are not to be told that in the deliberations of the convention by which the Constitution was framed this particular clause in it was the subject of some contrariety of opinion. Some of the members of the convention believed that if the power of pardon should exist at all (and most of them did think that it should exist, contrary to the opinion, I think, of Montesquieu or some of the European writers that the power should not exist in a republic because there is no necessity for it) it should be vested not in the President alone or in any of the departments of the Government alone, but that it should be given to the President, if given to him at all, in connection with some of the other departments or some branch of one of the other departments. They, however, came to the conclusion, and I believe that conclusion received the unanimous assent finally of the convention, that it was much more desirable to give it to the President alone, and so it was given. From the nature of the power it must, I think, be very evident that it is not only in the President but in the President exclusively.

The power of pardon cannot be under the same Government well given to any two departments of such Government. It must be given to one to the exclusion of all others, and if given to one to the exclusion of all others the decision of one, whether to grant the pardon or to refuse the pardon, must be conclusive. In our Government the only possible control that Congress can have over offenses created by statute is after the offenses have been committed, if they shall be committed, and they desire that they shall not be prosecuted, or after they have been prosecuted and prior to final judgment, to repeal the statute. The statute being repealed, no prosecution can be instituted if none has been instituted, and every prosecution that has been instituted necessarily falls. That has been decided over and over again. But that is not the exercise of the pardoning power—it is the mere exercise of the legislative power of Congress. Being alone authorized to pass the law which creates the offense and imposes the penalty, they are alone the judges to determine whether that law should continue or not, and if they resolve that it shall not continue and repeal under that opinion the law antecedently passed no prosecution can be made under it in the future and all pending prosecutions at once fall.

The power, then, of the President to pardon is not only comprehensive of every variety of offense which may be subject to prosecution unless pardoned, but is granted to him in terms as comprehensive as the English language permits. How he is to execute the power is not stated. Whether he is to execute it at all is necessarily not stated. When he is to execute it is also not stated. Now, in the absence of any particular specification of the mode in which the power is to be exerted, it would seem to follow that it may be exerted in any mode by which the President can make known to the public or to the Government what his opinion is in relation to the offenses which he professes to pardon.

I understood my friend from Illinois the other day as stating that he supposed when Congress passed the section which we are now asked to repeal, some doubt was entertained whether, in the absence of any congressional authority, the President could pardon by proclamation, or whether he could grant an amnesty by proclamation. I answered that the other day by suggesting that in the absence of any particular specification of the mode in which the power to pardon was granted, it might be exercised in any mode by which the President could make known his will. The usual mode in which it is exercised is by granting to each individual offender a pardon: that is issued under the great seal, and unless the party pardoned thinks proper to accept it and after accepting it, in the event of prosecution thinks proper to plead it, he stands, as far as the prosecution is concerned, as an unpardoned offender; but that is only because a pardon of that description is in the nature of a conveyance, a deed of which the courts can have no notice. The courts cannot take notice what pardons there are, if any, in the State Department. Like every other fact, therefore, existing in pais it must be brought to the attention of the tribunal before whom the question may be raised by evidence in pais. That evidence in cases of this description is, as I have stated, the pleading and the production in support of the plea of a pardon under seal.

That is not applicable to a proclamation of the President. All proclamations which the President is authorized to make, no matter what may be the subject of the proclamations, operate as laws, and the courts are bound to take notice of them. It was upon that principle that the Supreme Court in the prize cases and all the circuit courts before whom cases of that kind arose noticed the proclamations which from time to time were issued by the President in relation to the rebellion. The act of 1861 authorized the President by proclamation to proclaim certain ports of the States in insurrection in a state of blockade. The courts said that that proclamation was a matter of which the courts were bound to take notice without any pleading, just as they would be bound to take notice of a law passed by Congress on a subject over which Congress has jurisdiction. When, therefore, a pardon or an amnesty is granted by proclamation every court in the land and every department of the Government is bound to know of its existence and to give the party the benefit of it, provided the President is authorized to grant pardon by proclamation.

Now, what doubt can there be about that? In the case of Wells, to which my friend from Illinois referred, reported in 18 Howard, (where the immediate question before the court was whether the President under the power to pardon had a right to pardon conditionally, and the court came to the conclusion that he had that right;) they came to it in part upon the ground that the extent of the power was to be ascertained by recurring to the power and the manner in which it was executed in England at the time the Constitution was adopted; and as in England it appeared that from time to time the King had granted a pardon upon condition; and as the Constitution in no manner restrained the exercise of the power by the President, but contented itself with vesting in him the entire power, he could, as the King could, exert that power conditionally.

The same reasoning evidently applies to the case before us, because as the Senate must be apprised—I am sure nobody knows it better than my friend from Illinois—the English monarch from time to time has granted pardon and granted amnesty by proclamation; and the passage which I read from the seventy-fourth number of the Federalist the other day shows that one of the reasons for vesting the power in the President was that it might be important at certain stages of an insurrection in order to the quelling of the insurrection to proclaim pardon to all the parties who might be engaged in it; and that could only be done, not by granting a pardon to each individual insurrectionist, for they could not be found out, but by a general statement on the part of the President in the form of a proclamation that all who should turn out to have been involved in the insurrection were to be considered as pardoned.

I am at a loss, therefore, to imagine, as far as the legal question is concerned, upon what plausible ground the necessity for passing the section which it is proposed to repeal was then placed, and of course I am at a loss to imagine upon what possible ground the repeal of that section can be placed consistent with the doctrine that, independent of that section, the whole power which the section proposes to give is already in the Executive.

I do not know, for he did not use it in connection with this particular question, whether my friend from Illinois is under the impression that what he supposes to be an absence of implied power in the Executive has any bearing on the question before us. In presenting some days since a memorial from certain persons claiming to be almost the exclusive loyalists of some of the southern States I understood the honorable chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, in contesting the authority of the President to organize governments in the States that had been in insurrection, to do it upon the ground that there was an absence of any implied power in the President, and that the only department of the Government which is clothed with a power of that kind is the legislative department, and that that department possesses it by virtue of the general clause which gives to Congress the power to pass all laws which may be necessary and proper to carry into effect the powers specifically delegated.

In this, as I think, the honorable chairman is clearly in error. The clause to which he refers has no operation whatever. It was so considered by the authors of the Federalist in one of the numbers by which they endeavored to satisfy the people of the country that the Constitution should be accepted. It has been held to give no additional power to Congress by every commentator upon the Constitution who has written upon the subject since, and by the unanimous opinion of the Supreme Court in the case of McCulloch vs. the State of Maryland, reported in 4 Wheaton. Mr. Justice Story, in his Commentaries, third volume, section twelve hundred and thirty-two, in dealing with the meaning of this clause, says, in so many words that the authority of Congress without this provision would have been the same as it is with it. He tells us—and we can all see the force of the proposition—that the power to do anything vested in any body of men, whether governmental or otherwise, is the faculty to do the particular thing, the right to choose any means proper to accomplish the end not expressly inhibited. A mere power without the means to execute the power would be an absurdity; and consequently, as the power to pardon, or any other power conferred on the President, or any power conferred upon Congress to do anything without the authority in each to carry out the particular object for which the power was created, would be a gross absurdity.

But my friend from Illinois is mistaken, as I think, on another ground, in supposing, if he does suppose, that with reference to this question there is a difference between Congress and the Executive. The powers conferred upon Congress in the very first section of the first article are stated to be only such as are therein delegated. The power conferred upon the President is stated in the very first section of the third article to be "the executive power;" and if I am not mistaken, upon every occasion when the power of the Executive was called in question because trenching upon that of Congress, or when Congress claimed for itself a power which was supposed to trench upon that conferred on the Executive, the difference in the terms in which the powers conferred upon the Legislature were conferred, and those in which the powers conferred on the President were conferred, has been relied upon as conclusive for the purpose of showing, first, that in the one case no power can be exerted except such as is delegated expressly or by fair implication, and in the other that all power executive in its nature, necessary to carry out the objects of the government as far as they are to be carried out through the instrumentality of the Executive, is vested in the Executive. That is stated with his usual felicity of language (and not contradicted by Mr. Madison in his reply) by Mr. Hamilton in the first number of his celebrated Pacificus letters. I will read a sentence or two from that letter. The question which he was discussing was the authority of the President by proclamation to announce to the world as well as to ourselves the determination of the United States to remain neutral in the war then being waged abroad. The authority of the President to issue that proclamation was at that time assailed with as much violence—I will not say scurrility, for that is never used anywhere in these days—as has been the action of the President of the United States or the Supreme Court of the United States; and Mr. Hamilton, in meeting the objection that the power was not one which the President had the authority to use, said:

"The difficulty of a complete enumeration of all the cases of executive authority would naturally dictate the use of general terms, and would render it improbable that a specification of certain particulars was designed as a substitute for those terms, when antecedently used. The different mode of expression employed in the Constitution in regard to the two powers, the legislative and the executive, serves to confirm this inference. In the article which gives the legislative powers of the Government the expressions are, 'All legislative powers herein granted shall be vested in a Congress of the United States.' In that which grants the executive power the expressions are, 'The executive power shall be vested in a President of the United States.'

"The enumeration ought therefore to be considered as intended merely to specify the principal articles implied in the definition of executive power, leaving the rest to flow from the general grant of that power, interpreted in conformity with other parts of the Constitution and with the principles of free government.

"The general doctrine of our Constitution, then, is that the executive power of the nation is vested in the President, subject only to the exceptions and qualifications which are expressed in the instrument."

In the very able letters published by Mr. Madison in reply to the letters of Pacificus, he not only does not question the correctness of that doctrine, but almost in words admits it. And to refer to a judicial decision, not because any name could add to the name of Hamilton upon a subject of this description, in a judicial decision pronounced by Mr. Justice Nelson, since the war closed, in a case which was tried in the southern district of New York, the learned judge said that the authority which the President had exercised in the organization of governments in the southern States by means of provisional governors with authority to call Legislatures around them was justified by virtue of the executive power with which he was clothed, and that that continued until the war terminated; that occurring, that is to say on the termination of the war, the Constitution was replaced in all its integrity, and the States where insurrection had prevailed before and which had been under the supervision of those governments were thereafter to be governed exclusively by the people under State constitutions framed by themselves. And in substance such is the result to which, logically considered, the recent decision of the Supreme Court in the case of Milligan leads us. In the opinion of the majority of the court—not to be surpassed, in my judgment, by any opinion pronounced by any judge in any former case in that tribunal—it is stated that the Constitution was made as well for war as for peace; that there was no power whatever conferred upon the Executive or upon Congress during a state of war which would authorize them to transcend any of the specific guarantees contained in that instrument of the rights of the citizen or the rights of the States. Flagrante bello it might be in the power of the military commander, whoever he might be, leading the armies or of the President of the United States, to declare martial law; but it must be confined to the necessity existing at the time and limited to the area covered by that necessity. That learned tribunal, speaking through Mr. Justice Davis, gets rid of the doctrine, as far as a judicial opinion can do so, which has been so much in vogue during the existence of the war, that Congress and the Executive obtain power during a war from necessity, independent of constitutional obligation. As well might it be contended, I think, that the judiciary of the United States could claim upon the ground of necessity a jurisdiction which the Constitution of the United States does not confer upon them.

That being the case, the President of the United States having the power to pardon, and that power from its very nature being exclusive of any authority over the same subject by Congress, or if the power to pardon is not supposed to be in words given so as to authorize its exercise by means of a proclamation or so as to authorize the President to grant by proclamation what is called an amnesty, he possesses (at least as implied under the power conferred upon him to pardon) the power to do it by proclamation or to do it in the form of an amnesty. That there is any impropriety in granting a pardon or an amnesty in that form will hardly be pretended by Congress. The very section which you propose to repeal professes to give to the President that very power. Congress, therefore, at that time, assuming as they did assume that it was with them to give the power, supposed that the exigency of the country at the moment required that the power should be exerted in the way in which they in terms authorized the President to exert it—by proclamation or by amnesty.

I would, therefore, as I said in the beginning, not for a moment question the propriety of repealing this section, if the friends of the measure supported it upon the ground that it conferred no power, because the whole power was already in the President. I have no doubt that the power is in the President, and if the Attorney General or his predecessor had listened to my opinion or advice, or if the present incumbent of the executive chair had done so, he would have exerted the power long ago. My opinion then was—and I communicated it to the President, but with no avail, although he apparently agreed to its propriety—that the true interest of the country demanded that he should declare a general amnesty, of course by proclamation, excepting, however, one or more cases as he might think proper in order to have the two questions tried which a trial of any parties who were engaged in the rebellion will necessarily present, namely: First, whether there exists in a State a right to secede; and second, if there does not, whether in the case of the particular rebellion which culminated into a gigantic war, a war of such dimensions that the United States were obliged to consider the insurrections as public enemies, to deal with them as such, to treat with them as such, to exchange prisoners with them as such, persons engaged in it did not after such recognition in all respects with reference to the offense of treason stand in the same situation in which parties would be placed if charged with that offense who were warring against the United States when they had done so as the subjects of another nation in an international war.

I thought then, and I think now, for that was my own individual opinion, that upon the first of these questions the opinion of the Supreme Court would be unanimous. I have seen no reason to change that impression. Upon the second I thought it quite doubtful what the opinion of the court might be. Some of the best jurists in the country, many of them members of the Republican party, some of the ablest jurists in England having no particular hostility to the United States of which I am aware, have expressed the opinion that the moment belligerent rights were acknowledged to belong to the confederacy the commission of treason became impossible. Some of the public men who belong to the Republican party, and who perhaps have been very instrumental in building it up, have so expressed themselves; among others, Mr. Gerritt Smith, whose honesty of purpose nobody who has considered his conduct and examined what from time to time he has given to the public can doubt, has expressed the same opinion in I believe more than one well considered and ably written letter. I am not, therefore, prepared to say what the opinion of the Supreme Court upon that question will be if it shall ever be presented to them; but upon the first question, which I deem it very desirable should be settled by the judicial determination of the highest court in the land, I entertain no doubt that that judgment will be against the right to secede as not only not reserved to the States, but as necessarily fatal to any union of States in which the right of a State to secede from it may be reserved. And the history of this bygone confederation illustrates that that must be the result of such a provision.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour having expired, it becomes the duty of the Chair to call up the unfinished business of yesterday, which is Senate bill No. 476.

Mr. JOHNSON. I am in the hands of the Senate.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. If the Senator desires to go on, I move that that bill be postponed for the present.

Mr. JOHNSON. I would rather go on. I shall not speak more than half an hour.

Mr. SUMNER. There is no objection to the postponement of the bill, which is the unfinished business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is moved that the special order of the day, being the unfinished business of yesterday, be postponed for the present.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON. But, Mr. President, from some cause, of which I know nothing, whatever I may suspect, that advice of mine was not taken. A general amnesty has not been proclaimed and nobody has been tried. The failure to proclaim the amnesty, if it be censurable at all, is to be visited upon the President. The failure to obtain a trial of any of these offenders is not to be attributed to him. He has no power to enforce a trial. The party must be indicted. That depends upon the grand jury. After indictment, he must be tried; that depends upon the court before whom the indictment is pending. If from any cause the court cannot be held, the fault is not with the President; it is either with the legislative department of the Government, or with the judicial department. But I cannot help saying here, for it has wounded my sensibility as an American citizen, that I think it is a reproach to American justice that there should have been incarcerated now for nearly two years, whatever may have been his offense, a man of a delicate frame, selected by six or seven millions of people to take charge of this rebellion, upon a charge of treason. That he should be indicted for it, invoke a trial, not only challenge but pray for a trial, and still be immured, is a reproach to American justice that if existing in any nation of Europe would call down condign punishment upon the parties concerned in it.

Mr. HOWARD. Will the honorable Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. JOHNSON. With pleasure.

Mr. HOWARD. I wish to ask the honorable Senator from Maryland whether it be not a fact that Jefferson Davis, to whom he alludes, was captured as a prisoner of war, and has, since the time of his capture, been held under the orders of the President of the United States as a prisoner of war; and if he be a mere prisoner of war, detained as such, what power has the district court of the district in which he may have committed the crime to bring him to trial without the consent and order of the President of the United States handing him over to the court which is to try him; and how could that court try him unless the proper prosecuting officer of the court was willing to undertake the task and did undertake the task?

Mr. JOHNSON. I can answer the inquiries of my honorable friend from Michigan without any great difficulty. If Mr. Davis was a prisoner of war merely, he was entitled when the war ended, by all the usages of war, to be discharged. Who ever heard of prisoners of war in any civilized country being held in prison after the war's termination? That is one of the grounds on which his immunity from trial is placed. As to the parties who should bear the blame, if any blame is to be attached, I say to the honorable member what, before he put to me his questions, I had supposed he knew, that the President of the United States from time to time has expressed his willingness to surrender the party into the custody of the civil magistrates at once, and that they have declined to receive him, not upon the ground that they were not willing to try him, but upon the ground that between getting possession of him and his trial his custody would not be insured.

Mr. HOWARD. Surrender him to whom, to what officer?

Mr. JOHNSON. Surrender him to the marshal of the district who has had placed in his hands, or should have had placed in his hands, a warrant issued upon the authority of the indictment. From time to time we have been told that he was to be tried, but from time to time the trial has been postponed, and at the latter occasion it was postponed upon the ground that Congress by changing the circuits had rendered it impossible for the Chief Justice of the United States or any circuit judge of the United States to preside at the trial.

Mr. HOWARD. Can the honorable Senator inform us whether a capias for the arrest of Davis has been actually issued and placed in the hands of the marshal at any time?

Mr. JOHNSON. Whose business was it to issue the warrant? Was it the business of the President of the United States to issue the warrant?

Mr. HOWARD. It was the business of the court.

Mr. JOHNSON. The court before whom the indictment was pending was bound to issue the warrant, and I assume that the warrant was issued.

Mr. HOWARD. Undoubtedly it was the business of the court to issue the warrant, but upon the request of Mr. Johnson's prosecuting officer, whose business it was to press the prosecution and accomplish it.

Mr. JOHNSON. Why did he not? I have told the honorable member what I suppose to have been the reason, for it is the only reason I have seen assigned, that there was no place in which he supposed the party could be safely kept; and the President has said, and said properly, "he may be kept where he is until you are ready to try him;" but I say, without reference to whoever may be the cause of the detention, it is a reproach to American justice that he should be suffered to remain in prison undried upon a charge of that description.

Sir, in the moment of a struggle which threatened to involve the English empire in ruins, when what were called revolutionary societies were filling London and filling the kingdom, the insignificant men, such as Hardy and others, were taken up, imprisoned, indicted, and tried without delay. The whole power of the Crown was exerted for the purpose of producing a conviction, but exerted in vain. The jury upon pronouncing a verdict of not guilty received the acclamations of the thousands who surrounded the tribunal, and the unsurpassed and eloquent man by whom they were defended was carried, through the enthusiastic patriotism of his fellow-subjects, into his own home in the form of an ovation. And the English Crown submitted. I am not the apologist of the President of the United States. If I had been President of the United States I would have paroled that prisoner long since or have bailed him. I would have said to the world and said to my countrymen—and I have no doubt as to what would have been the judgment of every civilized and enlightened man within our country's limits—"I will not keep in prison a man who may die under my hands unless I can bring him to trial." If an event very likely to have happened—the prisoner had died, or if he were to die now, the responsibility which would rest upon the Executive, or upon the nation if the nation is responsible, would not be less than that responsibility which was visited upon the head of Napoleon when he had executed in the dungeon the Duc d'Enghien. But willing as I am to refer all these mistakes—if mistakes they be, as I think they are—to an honest intention, what I maintain is that looking to the present condition of the country—and a few words on that subject and I shall have done—if the section which you propose to repeal does give the President a power which he is otherwise without and cannot possess without the authority of Congress, this is not a time to take it from him.

Mr. President, the apparent purpose and the one to which the country and the world will attribute the pending measure is, that in the future hard, inexorable justice is to be meted out to our southern brethren; that generosity, forgiveness, mercy, pardon are no longer to be our policy. These, the greatest virtues which adorn humanity, it will be said, a nation claiming to be magnanimous and known to be all-powerful is resolved hereafter to disregard in respect to subdued enemies notoriously in no condition to resist its authority, and universally disavowing any such design, present or prospective. That this latter is true, an incident of a recent date strikingly illustrates. At a dinner in a neighboring southern city, at which Colonel Lee, a son of the commander-in-chief of the late confederate forces, was present, some one proposed to toast "the fallen flag." Promptly placing his hand upon the glass he rose and is stated to have said: "Gentlemen, this will never do; we are paroled prisoners; we now have but one flag, and that is the flag of our whole country, the glorious old Stars and Stripes. I can recognize no other, fight for no other, and will drink to no other." These patriotic words touched the hearts of all who were present, even the one who had proposed the sentiment; and with the universal approval the toast went unpledged. Are not such men to be trusted? If not, who are? If not, may we not well even distrust ourselves? They are enemies no longer, but soliciting to be received as friends, not in a debasing, cringing spirit which would dishonor our common descent, but as brave and honorable men—men whose gallantry is attested by hundreds of hard-fought battles and whose ability and willingness to serve the country were exhibited in times past on the land and the sea, greatly contributing to our military and naval renown, winning for themselves the gratitude of the whole country, and challenging for themselves and their equally brave and skillful northern brethren the admiration of the world.

Toward such citizens is the mere power of a conqueror to be used? Are their past services to be wholly forgotten, their willing obedience to be contumeliously overlooked, all political rights to be denied them, and as long as their conquerors please are they to be the mere serfs and slaves of brethren whose equals they are by descent, manhood, and intelligence? If peace and prosperity be of value (and who can doubt it?) this is not the mode to attain them. If it is, all history will be reversed. If it is, men now are not what they have been from the first of their political associations. The dullness brought about by despotism its authors have at times fancied to be peace; but in the end they discovered the fatal mistake. Man chained is a man still. The moment the opportunity offers (and Providence sooner or later is sure to offer it) he will cast off his fetters and assert the rights which nature gives him and be free.

And such a policy is at variance with our own history. In the civil commotions which have heretofore occurred the opposite policy has been pursued, and with the happiest results. In the unprovoked rebellion in Massachusetts in 1786, after its actual suppression by force, clemency toward the offenders was shown, and all soon became peace, and the Government because of its clemency was placed upon a firmer foundation than it had before. At the termination of our Revolutionary war, while the land was filled with many dissatisfied spirits and State laws of a stringent character had been passed by most of the States, laws of confiscation, &c., Congress in January, 1784, passed a resolve "earnestly recommending to the several States to reconsider and revise all their acts and laws" so as to render them "perfectly consistent not only with justice and equality, but with that spirit of conciliation which on the return of the blessings of peace should universally prevail." The same policy was pursued by Washington in the instance of the whisky insurrection with the like happy consequence. Not an offender was executed; a few only were tried and none seriously punished.

The history of the European world furnishes even still more striking examples of the impolicy of mere force or power and of the policy of kindness and conciliation. The Netherlands in the sixteenth century were lost to Philip II by the ferocious conduct of Alva; and in that land, under him, the historian tells us that "the ax, the stake, the rack, the dungeon knew no rest." His boast was that he had executed eighteen thousand six hundred persons. But these executions, his council of blood, his devastation of the land ended as in the judgment of God such conduct has ever ended, in defeat. The invader was driven off and the country lost to the inhuman Philip.

Poland, because of a policy nearly as inhuman, is now but an expense to Russia. She dreads insurrections; she has vainly endeavored to prevent or guard against them by force. Kindness, conciliation, mercy would long since have achieved there what they have never failed to achieve everywhere.

Austria, because of a like stern policy, has lost her German possessions, and is soon, unless her treatment of Hungary is changed, to lose that country, which might be made the source of wealth and power.

All these examples should lead us to a policy of kindness, to a proclamation of peace and amnesty, to a cheerful reception into our political homestead of the brethren who having strayed from it are anxious to return. This done—and the sooner it is done the better—the desolations the war has caused will be removed, the power of the country be greatly enhanced, its prosperity enlarged, and its ability to meet the expenses the war has entailed upon us placed beyond all doubt, its credit consequently be put upon as high if not a higher footing than that of any other nation in the world, and we be again what God I trust designs us to be, brethren forever, having but one flag, "the glorious old Stars and Stripes," to fight for.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, about the question pending before the Senate I know very little and care but very little; I have given very little attention to it; but I made up my mind some time since that while I had the honor of a seat on this floor no man should arraign the Government which has been charged with the conduct of this war and which is now charged with the settlement of it with inhumanity without an attempt on my part to defend it against the accusation. I care not how often the Senator from Maryland or any other Senator entertains or instructs us by the lessons which his large reading has furnished him with of examples of generosity or of magnanimity or of humanity practised in other times and in other places and under other circumstances and by other Governments; but when study shall have enabled the ablest or the most industrious of them to bring here before the Senate the example of a Government so tried, so tempted, so wronged as this has been, and yet answering such wrongs by such magnanimity as we have answered ours with, when any such example has been produced to me I shall think better of the past history of the world than I think to-day. Of what inhumanity is this Government thought to be guilty? What is the crime with which we have had to deal? No, Mr. President, there is a question preliminary to that: have we any crime to deal with or not?

This great question in all its bearings in so often dragged before the Senate and so often debated as if we were dealing with the innocent and with the angels of the earth instead of with the guilty and with the criminals that I sometimes begin to doubt myself whether I have not been mistaken all along in supposing that rebellion was a wrong or a crime. But I do believe, if my memory has not failed me, writers on international law, writers I think on Gospel and on morals, all writers who are fit to write at all, tell us that when war is employed for the correction of any but the direst wrongs the guilt of that war and all the enormities that follow in its train rest upon the souls of those who waged the war. We have been engaged in war, have we not? This Government did not commence it, did not inaugurate it, was not guilty of one act which could provoke it. The men who made it were the men who had administered the Government, went right out of your midst, went from these seats, from your Cabinet, to make war upon the people of the United States. Were they provoked? Were they wronged? Were they outraged? Were they oppressed? Put your finger upon the statute; put your finger upon the official act that had touched the rights or the interests of any one of them.

I know, sir, the people of the United States had, in accordance with the Constitution, in 1860 elected a man to be President whom the rebels did not think was the best man for President. The rebels were not agreed among themselves as to who was the best man for President. Let history note the fact, let honest and truthful men acknowledge the fact that the only pretense there was for making this war in 1860 was the fact that the people of the United States had selected Abraham Lincoln to be President instead of another man. Was that an intolerable wrong? Was that an unendurable oppression? That was the pretense for the war. In that war I trust we have not forgotten yet how much blood was poured out, how much treasure was spent, how much life was sacrificed. You cannot go into the streets anywhere but what you are confronted with the wreck of some brother of yours and of mine whom the storms of this war have tossed out into your midst. You cannot relieve your aching sight anywhere from such spectacles as these.

I tell you the law is, the Gospel is, that the responsibility for every one of those wrecked lives still passing among us, as well as every one of those lives which have been taken in the progress of the war, the guilt of all this rests upon the souls of those men whom we are arraigned to-day for treating inhumanly. And for all this guilt what recompense have we sought; what penalties have we enforced?

A war was waged upon the people of the United States for no offense in God's world, as I tell you, but for having elected Abraham Lincoln President instead of another man. That war was prosecuted for years. It was prosecuted just as long as by purchase or by power a man could be brought into the ranks of the rebellion. And when the last vestige of force was crushed and there was nowhere an armed rebel to resist the authority of the United States, so outraged as it had been, what did we demand of them? What tortures did we inflict; what scaffolds did we erect; who were paraded upon them; what necks were broken; what throats were cut; what treasures were exhausted as a recompense for this crime?

We had laws upon our statute-book, if I am not mistaken, which did declare that the estates of those guilty men might be confiscated because of the crime they had committed. We had laws upon the statute-book which provided that their lives were forfeited by their crimes. They asked the Government to remit them their lives, and their lives were remitted. Who has been executed because of the guilt incurred in this rebellion? Nay, but they said "our lives are of no use to us unless we can have our estates also; give us back our forfeited estates;" and their estates were flung to them. Whose estate has been taken by the Government as a penalty for the guilt incurred in this rebellion? Tell me, Mr. President, where the personal freedom of any single individual has been restrained because of his guilt? I know that Jefferson Davis may be cited in answer to this demand. It is a fact, I believe, that there is one man out of millions who were engaged in this rebellion yet held in custody. It is said he has not been tried. I believe that is a fact. God knows I am not responsible for his not having been tried. I never issued a stay of proceedings in the cause; and I do not know that any responsibility rests upon any one of my friends about me for the fact that he has not been tried. But there is the fact; there is one man held in custody. If I were charged myself with the execution of the laws of the United States I am almost inclined to think that I should concur with the Senator from Maryland in the opinion that I should have had him tried long ago or I would have him out of prison. I would never have kept him there to experiment on until this time.

There is one man in custody. The Government is responsible, some portion of it. Whatever of inhumanity there is in that is justly chargeable upon the Government; but no life has been taken; no property has been sacrificed; nay, these men who have had their lives remitted to them and their estates remitted to them say, "Give us our political rights," and they have them. Every man of them is enjoying all the freedom that you do in Connecticut or that I do in Wisconsin; all the political rights that we have in the States to which we belong they have in the States in which they live. Where is the inhumanity? They have demanded some other things. They wanted not merely their forfeited lives given back to them, not merely their forfeited estates given back to them, not merely their forfeited political rights given back to them, but they wanted some exclusive privileges and prerogatives, to wit, the prerogative of exercising a certain share in the power which is delegated to the Government of the United States and the right to exercise all the power which is reserved to the several States under the Constitution of the United States. The Congress of the United States has not assented to these last two demands, and so it happens that you do not see any of them filling seats in this House or in the other. This deed is chargeable to the Congress of the United States undoubtedly.

Whatever of inhumanity there is in that rests upon the Congress of the United States. But I know of no other penalty which has yet been imposed upon them, and I think, Mr. President, they can endure life a short time longer even if they continue to be excluded from these seats. That the possession of seats here is very necessary to their comfort I do not suppose I am justified in denying; but I do think they can live if they do not fill them. They thought they could live better by resigning them, and it was their voluntary act taking themselves out of them. They found in the course of an arduous and protracted struggle that they could not live at all in the way they had chosen to themselves, and now I have no doubt they are anxious to get back here. I shall not occupy the time of the Senate in speaking this afternoon of the terms and of the times in which they may, in my judgment, properly be received back. That they are coming, or that representatives from those communities are coming very soon, I do not suffer myself to doubt. I speak this afternoon these few words simply to repudiate this and all attempts which are made here or elsewhere to arraign the Government of the United States for inhuman treatment of the men who have been engaged in the guilt of this rebellion.

Mr. CONNESS. It is said Davis may die.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, Davis may die. I do not suppose there is anything in the decrees of Providence which forbids the consolation of death to such men as Mr. Jefferson Davis. I have no doubt he may die. He may possibly die at Fortress Monroe. I think myself if I had been President of the United States he probably would have died in that neighborhood before this time, but I should not have felt that any guilt rested upon my soul because of that event even if it had happened.

Mr. President, a few years ago I read in the newspapers that there was an attempt to overthrow, not the Government of the United States, but the government of Virginia; an armed attempt. It was led by a man by the name of Brown, John Brown, who invaded that redoubtable Commonwealth at the head I think of twenty-two men. I am not sure that I am correct as to the number, but I believe at the head of twenty-two men. He was unsuccessful in that demonstration upon the government of Virginia, as Mr. Davis was unsuccessful in his demonstration upon the Government of the United States. Mr. Brown was arrested as Mr. Davis was. Mr. Brown, however, was arrested in his own proper garments and his own proper garments alone, as I believe Mr. Davis was not. All Mr. Brown's followers were arrested; I believe every man of them; the whole army of invasion was arrested, as was not the case in this rebellion. They were all thrown into prison. If I am not mistaken in my recollection, they were all tried by the government of Virginia, and, if I am not mistaken in my recollection, every man of them was executed by the government of Virginia.

Mr. Brown was held I believe to be a traitor against the government of Virginia. I suppose upon that question the judgment of the court which tried him, never having been appealed from, was final and conclusive and imports absolute verity, and therefore it does not become me to dispute it, and I guess I shall not dispute it. If I had never heard of that judgment, however, I should have supposed there was not a particle of evidence in the world to impeach Mr. Brown of any hostile design against the government, the sovereignty of Virginia. I always supposed he went down there with the desire of freeing some of their slaves, transferring them from a state of bondage to a state of freedom, undoubtedly a great crime in the judgment of that day, but after all, not the crime of treason I suspect against the State of Virginia, because the Commonwealth of Virginia would have existed even if quite a number of her slaves had been run off. But the court found him guilty of treason, and that court pronounced the penalty of treason upon him and upon his followers, and that penalty was executed.

If I am not mistaken in my recollection, Mr. Henry A. Wise was Governor of the Commonwealth of Virginia at the time. Mr. Wise I remember to have been a very active participant in the late rebellion and in the guilt of that rebellion, if there were any guilt attending it. I saw in the newspapers that the man who executed inexorably the penalty of death upon every one of those poor deluded men who moved into Virginia during his administration was in the city of Alexandria but a few months since, within five or six miles of this Capitol, and told his fellow-citizens there in Alexandria that he had asked no pardon of the Government of the United States, and would accept no pardon of the Government of the United States, and that he defied the Government of the United States still. That was the substance of it; and he has not been interfered with; he is still at large; his head is still on his shoulders; at the last accounts I had his neck was still unbroken, and no part of his estate had ever been confiscated.

Mr. WILSON. Some of his property was taken by the Government for temporary use, but it has been restored.

Mr. HOWE. It is said that his estate has by the act of the Government been restored to him. And yet this Government is the one which is arraigned before the civilized world as a model of inhumanity! Sir, the charge rests lightly upon me, lightly upon my convictions; not so lightly upon my feelings. Whenever I have heard it, I have rarely heard it with my ears; I have read it often in the prints; it has always struck me as so monstrously unjust that I certainly never expected to hear it from the lips of the Senator from Maryland; and I have rarely heard it, as I said before, anywhere. It is often urged in newspapers, but I have rarely heard it pronounced in debate.

Mr. JOHNSON. I have but a word to say, sir. I am very sorry that I have touched the feelings of the honorable member from Wisconsin, who is a great deal more sensitive than I had supposed he was from his general exhibition. He has charged me with having assailed the humanity of the Government during the war. Why, sir, that is a charge which exists for its foundation exclusively in his own very fruitful fancy. I said no such thing. What I alleged to be in my judgment hard and inhuman was the keeping in prison a man for two years without trial. During the war, permit me to say to the honorable member, the Government had no more zealous supporter, not as able as he was of course, than it found in my humble self. From the beginning to the close of it I stood by the Government and aided it in every way that I could; I do not know that the honorable member did more; of course what he did he did more effectually, because he is the member from Wisconsin, and I am only a member from Maryland, a southern State.

Now, the honorable member tells us, or rather intimates, that I may have forgotten the acts of one John Brown, which he supposed may not perhaps be fresh in the memory of the Senate. I have not forgotten John Brown; never can I forget him; nor can I forget—I do not know that the honorable member was a member of that convention—that at the convention which met at Chicago in 1860, and nominated for the Presidency Mr. Lincoln, the proceedings of John Brown and all such proceedings were in the strongest terms denounced. That convention declared in its resolutions:

"That the maintenance inviolate of the rights of the States, and especially the right of each State to order and control its own domestic institutions according to its own judgment exclusively, is essential to that balance of powers on which the perfection and endurance of our political fabric depends; and we denounce the lawless invasion by armed force of the soil of any State or Territory, no matter under what pretext, as among the gravest of crimes."

Nor have I forgotten the fact that John Brown was executed. I wish it had occurred to me when I was reciting the instances to show the impolicy of harsh measures. I would have instanced that; and permit me to say to the honorable member that Virginia never committed a greater fault against true policy, to say nothing of the mercy with which a brave man should have been treated, than she committed when she executed him and one or two of his associates. If she had spared them perhaps the war would not have occurred. It was because she pursued the inexorable course of visiting upon them what she supposed to be the judgment which the law pronounced that she lost the hold which she had upon the humanity of her sister States; and I might therefore have very well appealed to that instance for the purpose of showing that mercy, pardon, as contra-distinguished from mere power, is the true policy of men as of nations.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, I protest. The honorable Senator from Maryland has so many positive, always reliable sources in debate, that he of all men should be compelled to rest upon them; and I have a right to complain when, as in the present instance, he rises to repel a charge which has not been made against him and places his opponent in the attitude of making points entirely different from what he has made. Let me correct the honorable Senator so far as to say first, that I did not understand him at all as having arraigned the Government for inhumanity committed in the course of the war or in the prosecution of the war. I knew just as well as the Senator himself did that during all the terrible years he did sustain the Administration, did aid in the prosecution of the war, and I think it all the more marvelous and extraordinary because of that fact that he who did not agree that the rebellion was right, but who did affirm that the rebellion was a monster wrong which demanded the expenditure of all our treasure and of all our means to punish that wrong, and he who has seen the magnanimity with which the Government has treated these criminals since they have been in its power, should have stepped forward to prosecute the Government for inhumanity practiced, not during the war, but since the war toward those criminals who carried it on.

And now, Mr. President, what pretext had the Senator from Maryland for saying that I charged him with having forgotten the case of John Brown? I made no allusion to him in connection with the case of John Brown. I cited it for purposes of my own. I cited it because I thought it was pertinent to the line of remark that I was making; and in neither of these respects do I think the Senator found any warrant whatever for calling the attention of the Senate to any difference, actual or supposed, between the position on this floor of a Senator from Wisconsin and a Senator from Maryland. I thank my God that both these States have yet the right to send Senators here. I wish the State of Wisconsin were more ably represented than she is, but she is represented in accordance with the Constitution; she has sent just the men that she selected for that purpose. She consulted her own wishes, not the wishes of any other State. Maryland did the same. I do not think I shall ever be heard to taunt the State of Maryland with having sent here the honorable Senator who sits on the other side, and I hope that Senator never will again taunt the State of Wisconsin with having sent me here.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. President, in the remarks made by the honorable Senator from Maryland, he made allusion to the case of Jefferson Davis, now in confinement in Fortress Monroe; and, according to him, the Government of the United States, or some branch or officer of it, has been guilty of flagrant neglect and injustice in omitting to bring that prisoner to trial. I do not know upon whom the honorable gentleman seeks to cast the blame of this long detention of Davis without a trial. What we know about the facts, however, is this: that upon the assassination of President Lincoln, on the 14th of April, 1865, a proclamation was issued by the present incumbent of the Presidential chair offering large rewards for those who had participated in that crime, and among other accomplices naming Jefferson Davis, for whose apprehension the President offered the sum of $100,000. Before his seizure, and before any notice of this offer came to the military party who arrested Davis, that party had seized him, and Colonel Pritchard, of my own State, a very gallant and meritorious officer, had the honor of being his captor and of taking him from the State of Georgia to Fortress Monroe, under the orders of the War Department.

The Secretary of War, in a communication to this body in December a year ago, informed the Senate that Davis had been captured and was then held as a prisoner of war, and also that he was held responsible under the proclamation of President Johnson offering a reward for his apprehension as one of the parties engaged in the assassination of President Lincoln; and he has been held in confinement from that time to this, first in his capacity of a prisoner of war, and secondly as being subject to the charge of participating in that atrocious murder. I am told, but I do not know except from public rumor what the fact is, that an indictment has been found against Davis in this District charging him with treason against the United States, and that another indictment has been found against him in the district of Virginia charging him with the same offense; but I have not heard that he has been indicted for a criminal connection with the assassination of Mr. Lincoln. If he has been the fact is not within my knowledge; but that he has been held in custody on these joint charges from the time of his capture to the present time is beyond all doubt.

The honorable Senator did not see fit to allude to the fact that Davis stands charged with a participation in the murder. Other accomplices in that most heinous and flagrant crime have been brought to trial before a military commission and after undergoing a most thorough trial at the hands of a very intelligent military commission were found guilty and by the order of President Johnson were executed; and it seems for more than a year past efforts have been made by the Secretary of State and other employés of the Government to apprehend another accomplice in that great crime, John H. Surratt, who has lately been arrested in the far off and ancient country of Egypt, among the pyramids, and is in process of being brought to the United States. Does the honorable Senator from Maryland look upon it as cause of complaint that Davis has been detained in custody with a view to hold him to his responsibility as a murderer; as one of the slayers of Lincoln? If it shall turn out upon further and future investigation that he is justly amenable to the law for that murder, can the honorable Senator reproach his own Government with detaining that high prisoner for the length of time necessary to arrive at the truth of the matter?

Who then, sir, is to blame for the non-trial of Davis? He is indicted for treason in Richmond. The President has appointed a prosecuting attorney for the district where that indictment is pending whose duty it was and is without delay to take out a proper warrant for his arrest and to bring him to trial for that crime, and yet we have never heard of any effort being made to bring him before the court. Sir, he might have been tried in almost any other place in the United States legally and constitutionally for the crime of treason. I hardly think the honorable Senator from Maryland will hold that Jefferson Davis, the president of the confederate States, the commander-in-chief of all the armies and navies belonging to the confederate States during the war, has not by the very position he held made himself amenable for the crime of treason in any State or district of the United States within which any overt act of war was perpetrated during the rebellion.

Mr. JOHNSON. If the honorable member desires an answer now I can give it.

Mr. HOWARD. I will hear the honorable Senator.

Mr. JOHNSON. I certainly think that he can be; but the honorable member I suppose has not forgotten that the late Attorney General of the United States gave an opinion to the President that he could only be tried in Virginia. I think in that he was mistaken.

Mr. HOWARD. I am quite aware that the late Attorney General did give such an opinion; but what is the opinion upon that subject of the present Attorney General of the United States I do not know, and I am not sure that the honorable Senator from Maryland knows.

Mr. JOHNSON. I do not.

Mr. HOWARD. If there has been a neglect to bring Davis to trial it has, in my judgment, arisen chiefly from the mistake which has been made in regard to the doctrine of his legal presence at the commission of the acts of war. I hold, as I held at the last session, that in the case of the commander-in-chief of the rebel army, the person who held in his hands the entire control of the rebel army was as much guilty of treason, as much present at an act of war committed in the State of Ohio by John Morgan, or even in the State of Vermont by the raiders who came over the border, who were subject to his orders, as if the act of war had been committed in the district of Virginia where Davis himself, the commander-in-chief, resided at the time.

A remark fell from the learned Senator from Maryland which not a little surprised me. When I asked him whether Davis was not arrested and held as a prisoner of war I understood him to answer in the affirmative, and at the same time to add that if he were a prisoner of war he was not guilty of treason. If I misunderstood the honorable Senator I shall be glad to be corrected. He does not correct me.

Mr. JOHNSON. I said that if he was a prisoner of war in the ordinary sense of that term, he could not be held to be guilty of treason. He ought to have been handed over to the civil authorities and condemned as a traitor or hung on the spot. But, as I said before, if merely held as a prisoner of war he should not have been held after the termination of the war.

Mr. HOWARD. I understood the honorable Senator to say that if he was held as a prisoner of war he could not on account of being so held, on account of being invested with certain mysterious privileges as a prisoner of war, be held amenable for treason in a civil court. I believe that I did not misunderstand the honorable Senator. If such be the immunity of Jefferson Davis, why has not my learned friend, profound as he is in the knowledge of the law, industrious and enlightened as he confessedly is, exerted himself heretofore to relieve Davis from his imprisonment by suing out a writ of habeas corpus and testing the question whether he is amenable to the indictment found against him for treason? Why have not the learned counsel of Davis, who entertain the idea that because a man is held as a prisoner of war he cannot be convicted of treason, exerted themselves in behalf of Jefferson Davis and liberated him upon habeas corpus? If he is shielded by his character as a prisoner of war from a prosecution for treason, he has but to show that to a proper court on a proper application to be relieved from his imprisonment; or if he is tried for treason, all he has to do is to set up that defense on the trial, and he must be at once acquitted.

But, sir, the doctrine itself is entirely unfounded. I do not profess to be profoundly learned in the law, and I would not place myself in competition with the honorable Senator from Maryland in this respect; but I feel quite safe in defying him to find a warrant in any of the accredited writers upon the law of nations that a legitimate Government may not try a rebel who has been captured as a prisoner, also a traitor, and inflict upon him the penalty of treason. This doctrine leads inevitably to the conclusion (if it be sound) that none of the multitudes of rebels who have been captured and held as prisoners of war by the troops of the United States, during the whole of the recent conflict, can be held for treason upon an indictment; that the very fact that they have been captured and acknowledged as prisoners of war stands as their defense and excuse for the crime of treason they have committed. I do not wish this discussion to close and leave that point of law, pressed upon us so earnestly by the honorable Senator from Maryland, without a reply. Sir, the doctrine is entirely false. It is contradicted by Vattel, it is contradicted by Kent, it is contradicted by Grotius, and by all the accredited writers upon the law of nations and the law of war; and I believe in the end the honorable Senator will find that it is entirely unsupported by principle, as it is unsupported by authority from the books.

Now, sir, I shall not undertake to predict when Jefferson Davis will be tried either for treason or murder; I do not know; I am not in the secrets of the Cabinet; I know nothing of the undisclosed motives which may operate upon persons in authority to prevent the speedy trial of Jefferson Davis; but that he ever will be tried for treason I have not the slightest belief. That he will ultimately be liberated, and that unconditionally, by the President of the United States from all responsibility on account of the crime of treason which he has committed I entertain no doubt. Sir, will a Chief Magistrate who has pardoned rebels by wholesale, pardoned them by thousands and tens of thousands, proceed to try Davis, their chief, condemn him, and execute him? Will a Chief Magistrate who, during the last year and more, has been exerting all his official influence in favor of the rebels and of the rebel communities, taking them under his especial protection and guardianship, who treats them so tenderly and so considerably as to hold them up to the world almost as a persecuted people, be expected to punish the head and chief of that community whose favor he has been so long courted? No, sir, it is not to be thought of. Like the rest of them, Jefferson Davis, the head and front of the rebellion, who might and ought to have been tried in Pennsylvania, in Ohio, in even Vermont, and convicted, sentenced, and executed for treason, will never be tried under this Administration.

The bill immediately before us, Mr. President, proposes to repeal the thirteenth section of the confiscation act of 1862. That section authorizes the President of the United States by proclamation to extend pardon and amnesty to such persons and such portions of the rebels as he may see fit. What it extends besides pardon is amnesty. I hold that the Congress in passing the act of 1862 granted to the President some power, in the thirteenth section, beyond what he possesses under the naked Constitution; that is, the power of pardoning officers. By the thirteenth section he is authorized to grant amnesty to such portions of the rebels as he may see fit—not mere pardon, but amnesty. Amnesty is a military term. It applies to belligerent parties, operates as an eternal oblivion of all the causes of the war, and is the basis of peace; it is a burying, a putting out of mind and memory the war itself and of the causes that led to it; and it necessarily restores the belligerent parties to whom it is granted to all the rights they possessed before the war broke out; it places them, in other words, in statu quo ante bellum.

I do not believe the President of the United States under the naked Constitution authorizing him to grant pardons possessed the power of pardoning by wholesale an army of rebels and all those who had aided and assisted them. The power of granting this amnesty is a power which cannot be exercised by the President in virtue of his executive functions merely, nor in virtue of his capacity as Commander-in-Chief of the Army, because in its very nature it must rest upon the sovereign power of the nation that grants it. Amnesty is peace, and the President of the United States, whether in case of rebellion and insurrection within our own limits or of foreign war, has no power to grant a permanent amnesty, which is peace, without an act of Congress. He is not vested with authority to declare and establish peace between this nation and a foreign nation when war has once supervened. That peace can only take place by the consent and by the legislation of Congress. It requires the legislation of the two Houses in order to change the condition of the country from a state of war to a state of peace. The power of making war belongs to Congress, and the power of making peace belongs to Congress and not to the President.

If this view be correct, it follows that we did grant to the President in 1862 a power which he had not under the Constitution, to wit: the power of granting amnesty, and it is that power which I think, so far as I have been able to inform myself, has been greatly abused by the present Executive that we now seek to take from him by the bill before us. I hope, sir, the bill may pass.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, when I offered the pending amendment it was not my intention to say a word in reference to the propriety of its adoption. When the confiscation bill was before the Senate in 1862 I took occasión to present, as fully as I deemed proper, my views in reference to it, and to state my objections to its enactment as a law. Those objections were twofold; first, arising out of what I conceived to be certain unconstitutional provisions in the bill; and second, because, in my judgment, the measure as a measure of policy was unwise. I have seen no occasion since, although I do not now intend to discuss the question, to change the opinions then formed. Although it was very unpopular then, as I doubt not it is very unpopular now, to express the opinion which I then expressed, and which I still entertain, yet the unpopularity of the utterance will not prevent its repetition. I deny as a question of law that this doctrine which has been asserted here to-day is true, or that it has any warrant of authority in the history or example of nations situated or circumstanced as we were during the late civil war. I asserted then, and I maintain now, that the duties of allegiance and protection were reciprocal, and that a Government, however rightful it might be, has no right to punish any one of its citizens for disobedience to its authority unless that Government at the same time affords to that individual protection; and that where an individual is so circumstanced that he is subject to a Government de facto having power to punish him for disobedience to its commands and to protect him against the consequences of his obedience to its commands, and another Government, claiming to be the Government de jure over him, has not the power to protect him against the consequences of disobedience to it, or is unwilling to afford him that protection, that individual commits no crime and is guilty of no treason.

In my judgment this original act of confiscation was misnamed. The title it bore upon its face was "An act to punish treason," and it was applied to the whole mass of the southern people of this country. Will you tell me, sir, that you can frame a bill of indictment like this against eight million people? Such a thing is unknown in the history of the world. When our revolutionary fathers assumed to secede, if you please, from the Government of Great Britain and to establish an independent government for themselves, the House of Commons rang with the cry of "rebels" and "traitors," just as the Halls of Congress have rung with the cry of "rebels" and "traitors" since; but what said the master minds of the British Parliament then? They proclaimed the very doctrine which I proclaim here to-day, that you could not indict a whole people, millions of men, for the crime of treason when they were acting under the power and authority of a government which had been erected over them—a government having the power to protect them, and where Great Britain could not afford protection in case they disobeyed the American governments which had been set up over them. And, sir, however mad and foolish it was—and I have always considered it to have been madness and foolishness—on the part of the southern people to have entered upon the recent struggle, I say that the great mass of them did not incur thereby the crime of treason nor subject themselves to its penalties; and I assert no new doctrine. I assert a doctrine which has been maintained in the Federal courts of the United States. I assert a doctrine which your revolutionary fathers asserted, and which the tribunals of the country which they established asserted and maintained.

Why, sir, any one who will take the trouble to look into Dallas's Reports will find a number of cases. I will refer to a single one, the case of Republica vs. Samuel Chapman, to be found in 1 Dallas, where this very doctrine was judicially decided; and there cannot be found in any American authority since that day a single dictum, much less a decision, overruling that authority. What was that case? Pennsylvania had established an independent government for itself, and in less than six months after the establishment of that government a man by the name of Chapman, an adherent of King George, did an act which was, in the judgment of the courts of Pennsylvania, treason against that government. He was a subject of King George, as all our fathers were, but he committed the act after the people of Pennsylvania had established for themselves an independent government. He was brought to trial, not, to be sure, in a Federal court, because there was not then any such tribunal, but in the courts of Pennsylvania, charged with the crime of being guilty of treason against that State; and, after a long and able trial, was convicted and executed. There, sir, is judicial precedent, showing that when a government de facto is established an individual citizen not yielding his obedience to it, but attempting to make war upon it, has, within the limits of this country and by the judgment of a learned legal tribunal, been found guilty and executed for the crime of treason against that government, although he claimed protection on account of what he asserted to be his superior allegiance to the Crown of Great Britain.

But, sir, the doctrine which I maintain is older than the case in Dallas. It is the recognized doctrine of England, and has been for hundreds of years. The student even of Blackstone is at no loss to know what is the true doctrine on this subject. Turn, sir, if you please, to the fourth volume of Blackstone, page 221, and you will find the following:

"A usurper who has got possession of the throne is a king within the meaning of the statute, as there is a temporary allegiance due to him for his administration of the Government and temporary protection of the public; and therefore treasons committed against Henry VI were punished under Edward IV, though all the line of Lancaster had been previously declared usurpers by act of Parliament. When, therefore, a usurper is in possession the subject is excused and justified in obeying and giving his assistance. Otherwise, under a usurpation no man would be safe if the lawful prince had a right to hang him for obedience to the powers in being, as the usurper would certainly do for disobedience."

And, sir, the doctrine is found in a principle of common justice which must ever regulate the relation of the citizen to the Government. It is utterly impossible, where there are two Governments claiming obedience from the individual citizen, that he shall be liable to be hanged by the one for disobedience and liable to be hanged by the other for obedience. It is contrary to reason; it is contrary to justice; it is contrary to that reason which Coke says is the perfection of the law, not such reason as every individual man hath, but such a reason as if all the heads of the world were put together they could not form more perfect reason.

But, sir, there is authority for this doctrine from him who has been called the father of the Constitution. I refer to Mr. Madison. I presume it will not be contended by any one that a citizen of any State of this Union owes any higher or more paramount allegiance to the Government of the United States than did an inhabitant of one of the thirteen colonies of King George to the Government of Great Britain. That our fathers owed allegiance to the Crown and King of Great Britain no one questions now, or ever did question; but how did they owe it? What was the doctrine of the fathers on this subject? They did not owe it on account of that old doctrine of allegiance, which has no application at all to this Government. I speak now of allegiance in the principles in which it exists and in reference to the circumstances out of which it grew. What is the origin of this doctrine of allegiance? It was founded upon the land and had reference to nothing else. When the conqueror won the land by his sword, he parceled it out among his followers, and in consideration of this parceling out the lands among his followers they became his liege subjects, and by virtue of that bestowal of lands, and nothing else, they came to owe him personal allegiance. But, sir, that is not the doctrine of American allegiance; it is not the doctrine that has ever been contended for in this country; it is not the basis of the American doctrine of allegiance. That arises, not from any distribution of the domain, the territory, but simply and solely from citizenship; it springs from citizenship and nothing else. When a man becomes a citizen then his duty as a citizen imposes upon him the obligation of discharging with fidelity every office incumbent upon him as such citizen. In the sense, therefore, of citizenship we owe allegiance to the Federal Government.

But, sir, you must recollect that our system of government is very complex indeed, however simple it may appear to be to some. Here is a Federal Government; and what is it? A Government of limited, delegated powers; a Government owing its existence to whom? I know it has been contended by some that "we, the people of the United States" made this Government, and that the people of the whole United States are the authors and founders of the Federal Constitution. Not so, sir; they are no such people; in a strict sense they are the people of the several States united together for common, specified objects; and within the scope of the power thus delegated to the Federal Government by, not the whole people of the United States, but by the people of the States respectively, the authority of the Federal Government is supreme. But, sir, that same Constitution, which is the evidence of delegated authority by the States to the Federal Government, also recognizes the existence of those States and reserves to those States or to the people thereof every power not by the Constitution delegated. Now, here is a State. You, sir, are a citizen of the State of Connecticut; I of Delaware. How did you ever come to owe allegiance to this Federal Government, or how did I ever come to owe allegiance to the Federal Government? By virtue of any act of the whole American people? No, sir. Born on the soil of my State, I owe allegiance to her, and through her act, and through her act alone, I owe fidelity, citizenship, allegiance, if you please to call it so, to the Federal Government within the scope and to the extent of its limited and delegated powers; and I owe it in no other wise, by no other means, and to no other extent.

Then, sir, I assert the doctrine of Mr. Madison to have been, and I assert that to have been the settled doctrine of this country until a very recent period, that when the authority of the particular government to which the citizen owes allegiance and the authority of the Federal Government shall become antagonistic, irreconcilable, if the citizen, in obedience to the command of the particular Government to which he owed primary allegiance yields to that authority, and the Federal Government has not the power and will not protect him, he does not incur the crime of treason and is not subject to its penalties.

Now, sir, although I did not intend to say anything on this subject to-day, inasmuch as I have referred to it I cite you the authority of Mr. Madison; and it is to be found in no obscure, out-of-the-way place, in no private letter. They were his utterances in the first Congress of the United States, and received the action of the House of Representatives of that Congress in approval of them; and they would have continued, in my judgment, to be the doctrine of the present day had not madness and frenzy seized the hour: had not the southern people, yielding to the counsels, the advice, aye, sir, and to the power of many of the leading men among them, fired upon Fort Sumter and thus incensed the whole nation. But for that, reason would never have so far forgotten the American people as to have charged the whole mass of them as guilty of crime because they yielded obedience to authority that they could not resist.

I stated that I supposed it would not be contended by any one that the allegiance which a citizen of any State in this Union owes to the Federal Government is any greater or any more binding than the allegiance which our fathers, as subjects of Great Britain, owed to the Crown and Government of Great Britain. Assuming that to be the fact, I call your attention to a case which occurred in the early history of this Government and cite to you the opinion of Mr. Madison, whose opinions are authority with the American people and have always been so considered.

Before the Revolutionary war broke out, before the Declaration of Independence, there was a young man who had not arrived at the age of twenty-one in South Carolina, by the name of William Smith, who was sent to England and the Continent to be educated. The Declaration of Independence was proclaimed. War was raging in the country. Mr. Smith desired to return to South Carolina and share the fortunes of her people. He made an attempt, but was taken upon the ocean and carried back to Great Britain. About the close of the war, however, he returned to South Carolina and was elected to the House of Representatives as a member from that State and was sworn in, and he became one of the most distinguished members of that body. In a short time afterward a Dr. Mitchell, of South Carolina, presented a petition to Congress praying them to eject Mr. Smith from his seat as a member of Congress, on the ground that he had not been a citizen of the United States for seven years, as the Constitution of the United States required, and it was in the discussion upon that subject that Mr. Madison uttered the following opinions. As the portion I desire to read is short, I will read the whole of it:

"What was the situation of the people of America when the dissolution of their allegiance took place by the Declaration of Independence? I conceive that every person who owed this primary allegiance to the particular community in which he has been born retained his right of birth as a member of a new community; that he was consequently absolved from the secondary allegiance he had owed to the British sovereign. If he was not a minor he became bound by his own act as a member of the society who separated with him from a submission to a foreign country. If he was a minor, his consent was involved in the decision of that society to which he belonged by the ties of nature. What was the allegiance as a citizen of South Carolina he owed to the king of Great Britain? He owed his allegiance to him as a king of that society to which as a society he owed his primary allegiance. When that society separated from Great Britain he was bound by that act and his allegiance transferred to that society or the sovereign which that society should set up, because it was through his membership of the society of South Carolina that he owed allegiance to Great Britain."

This reasoning will hold good, unless it is supposed that the separation which took place between these States and Great Britain, not only dissolved the union between these countries, but dissolved the union among the citizens themselves; that the original compact which made them altogether one society being dissolved, they could not fall into pieces, each part making an independent society, but must individually revert into a state of nature; but I do not conceive that this was of necessity to be the case. I believe such a revolution did not absolutely take place. But in supposing that this was the case lies the error of the memorialist. I conceive the colonies remained as a political society, detached from their former connection with another society, without dissolving into a state of nature; but capable of substituting a new form of government in the place of the old one, which they had for special consideration abolished. Suppose the State of South Carolina should think proper to revise her constitution, abolish that which now exists, and establish another form of government: surely this would not dissolve the social compact? It would not throw them back into a state of nature? It would not dissolve the union between the individual members of that society? It would leave them in perfect society, changing only the mode of action, which they are always at liberty to arrange. Mr. Smith being then, at the Declaration of Independence, a minor, but being a member of that particular society, he became, in my opinion, bound by the decision of the society with respect to the question of independence and change of Government; and if afterward he had taken part with the enemies of his country, he would have been guilty of treason against that Government to which he owed allegiance, and would have been liable to be prosecuted as a traitor."

Sir, there has been no friend of the much-derided doctrine of State rights that has ever uttered language stronger than that to show that their citizens in following the fortunes of the State, especially that portion of their citizens who only yielded obedience to a power which they were incapable of resisting, and yielded obedience to a power against whose authority there was no Government able or willing to protect them—I say there has been no authority cited anywhere stronger than this to show that such men have not incurred the crime of treason; and, sir, I thank God it is so. I thank God that I do not believe in my heart that there are eight million American people that to-day have the sin and stain of treason upon their souls. I know that a large portion of my countrymen have acted madly and unwisely and raised the standard of revolution; but, sir, the noblest spirits to which the world ever gave birth have done so in times before. Men may act unwisely, men may act madly, but they may act conscientiously; and though they may act unwisely and madly it does not follow that thereby they have incurred the guilt of the greatest crime known among men. There may be, and there are, bad men and bad citizens in every State of the Union, but they are not confined to any one State nor to any one section of this country. Tell me not, sir, that north of the Potomac and the Ohio there resides all the love of country and all the spirit of patriotism to which this country has given birth. Tell me not that north of those streams all are perfect angels in purity and the devoted admirers and lovers of civil and constitutional liberty, and that south of those streams, down to the Rio Grande and the Gulf, there are none but traitors. Sir, I believe in no such inhuman doctrine; neither does the law countenance any such doctrine; neither do the teachings of the fathers support any such doctrine. That in that struggle there may have been individual men who incurred the guilt of treason I am not going to question; but that the great mass of the people over whom these governments de facto were established, by yielding obedience to the authority of the particular government under which they lived incurred the guilt of treason I never have believed, and I do not believe to-day.

I regret as much as any man the attempt they made to sever their connection with the Federal Government. It not only brought ruin and wretchedness upon themselves; it not only wasted and desolated their fair habitations, depriving them of the comforts, to say nothing of the elegancies of life, but, sir, to us of the border States, who did not follow their example, but who remained true and firm to the old Government, it brought distress and misery. It gave the pretexts to a party which had lately come into power to invoke necessity as the great law of government, to arrest by the strong arm of power, and to drag into forts and bastilles innocent and unoffending men for the gratification of party spirit and to perpetuate the political party in power. But, sir, though it brought more distress upon the people of my State than it did upon the States of gentlemen further removed, yet I should be ashamed of myself if I could on that account harbor any resentment or any indulgence of malice, charging millions of my countrymen with the crime of treason. It is true they have no representative on this floor to speak for them. I come, it is true, from my own State to join in the public councils; but when I cast my eye across yonder stream and know that there are not only brave and honest men, but women and innocent children inhabiting its soil, I will not remain silent when I hear the whole mass of that people, or any great portion of them, charged with being guilty of treason.

Mr. President, it is time, high time, that wholesale accusations like these had ceased to be made. They can subserve no public good. They will not rekindle and renew the warmth of affection which ought to exist between the people of this whole country. God knows we have had strife enough, suffering enough, misery enough, wretchedness enough. And now, when the country is dissevered by your acts, or kept dissevered at least, I hope that the utterances of such wholesale denunciation will cease. No, sir; rather throw open your legislative halls to the representatives of a people who are anxious to get back under the protection of the old national flag and in communion with their brethren of other States. Instead of these denunciations let it go forth, "You are not to be taxed without representation, but taxing you we open our doors to your people," and one shout of joy will go up throughout the length and breadth of this land from every true Union and conservative man. Even the little children will join with their fathers and mothers in invoking the blessings of Almighty God upon your heads. Do it, sir, and where the war has caused desolation there shall spring up flowers of loveliness and beauty; the aching heart shall be made glad; the desponding soul will take hope; and hereafter we will march on together to a common destiny of national glory and renown, a united, prosperous, and happy people. Thus united we need fear no enemy from without, and if we be true to ourselves we shall have no enemy from within.

Mr. President, I have made these remarks more extended than I intended, because I offered the amendment proposing to repeal the whole bill of 1862. That bill treats the whole of these people as traitors, and proposes to confiscate the property of every man among them on the ground that he is a traitor from having been engaged either actively or submissively in the late civil war. Entertaining the opinion as I do, that such is not the fact, that such is not their condition, I have offered the amendment. I refer to no individual cases; I refer not to the case of Mr. Jefferson Davis, because I have always held that the mention of his case in the Senate of the United States, he being under arrest, and subject to trial, is improper, that he ought to have an opportunity, if he should be brought to trial, to go before a jury of his own country without prejudice, and without the jury and the judge being told beforehand what the legislative department of the Government expects them to do in the case. I have confined my remarks to the great mass of the southern people. I say that law, justice, humanity, every noble consideration which can promote or control the action of wise legislators should lead to the repeal of this act.

Mr. HENDRICKS. When this bill was first brought to the attention of the Senate the Senator from Michigan [Mr. CHANDLER] demanded its passage upon a charge which he made against the executive department of selling pardons in this city, and he expressed himself very strongly indeed upon that subject. He said:

"Mr. President, it is a notorious fact, as notorious as the records of a court, that pardons have been for sale around this town, for sale by women, and more than one woman. The records of your court in the District of Columbia show this."

And he then went on to say that he spoke upon the authority of one of the judges of the court in this District. After that statement had been so deliberately made by him the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. DIXON] gave it a very emphatic and square denial. The Senator from Michigan stated that it was necessary to repeal the section in order to take away from the President the power of pardon, and thus to remove a reproach from our Government. I could not see in the law the reason for his position. I could not see, after the denial of the statement made by him and on the question of his authority that the facts justified him. But certainly he owed it to himself, he owed it to the judges of the court, to say precisely upon what authority he made the statement, for it was a very grave one.

This section only authorized a pardon by proclamation. Now, I think, when the Senator reflects a moment, he will not assume that any pardon by proclamation has been procured by any improper means. I suppose he referred to individual pardons, and meant to suggest that persons had received compensation for their services in procuring the pardon of individuals. I hardly suppose that the Senator intended to be understood as charging that any proclamation had been procured by bribery. I never heard anything of the sort intimated, and I never heard that any question of the kind was before any court in the District of Columbia. If any such question was before the court, then, sir, I think we ought to know in what case, upon what record, upon what evidence it is stated that the President of the United States, under this thirteenth section, ever issued a proclamation upon improper and corrupt considerations. This section simply provides for pardon by proclamation, with a view to the adjustment of the troubles in the country, so as to hold out to the southern people an inducement to return to their allegiance to the Government and their obedience to the laws, certainly a very proper purpose, justifying the action of Congress in its enactment; but what bribery can be charged as having been committed under this section? I think it is due to the other judges of the court that we should know what judge has undertaken to make such a charge against the executive department of the Government. But, sir, I am not going to discuss that at length. I had supposed the Senator would have produced the evidence, and I think it would fail—I cannot but believe it would fail—to establish that under this section of the law any improper motive had ever governed the President of the United States.

I object to the repeal of this section for but one reason. It will be understood in the country as an expression by Congress against a conciliatory course toward the southern States. It will be understood as an expression by Congress of its opinion that there ought not to be pardon extended to the people of the South, and that the policy which was understood to have been adopted by Mr. Lincoln before his death, and the policy which was subsequently pursued by Mr. Johnson as President of the United States in extending pardons was an improper policy. I do not wish to have it understood that Congress shall express any such opinion. My judgment is, that amnesty is the proper course and policy to be pursued with a view to the permanent restoration of the Union and of the relation of the States to the Union.

What is accomplished by repealing this section? Nothing in law. The Senator from Illinois, able as he is, has been unable to show that in law anything is accomplished by the repeal of this section, for the simple reason that the section does not enlarge the powers of the President. As has been so elaborately and so ably shown by the Senator from Maryland, the President possesses the pardoning power generally, and can exercise this power by such means as to him may seem proper, not inconsistent with the other provisions of the Constitution. He has the power to pardon generally, whether by a special grant to an individual, or by proclamation, if, in his judgment, the circumstances of the country shall require such a proclamation. I do not understand the Senator from Illinois to question now the power of the President to pardon by proclamation; and is it not the better way? Is it not better that the President shall pardon by classes rather than that the executive office shall be besieged by individuals who seek special pardons?

Mr. TRUMBULL. As it is not my intention to speak upon this subject, and an inference might be drawn from the remarks of the Senator from Indiana, that I conceded the authority of the President to pardon by general proclamation, I desire simply to say that I do not concede it. I did not intend entering upon the discussion to-day of that question; I had previously said all I desired to say upon it; but the Senator from Indiana is not warranted in assuming that I do not question the authority of the President in that regard to the same extent which I questioned it the other day. I have heard nothing to change the views which I expressed when this bill was called up some days since.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I did not hear all that the Senator said the other day on this subject, but I had understood him not to dispute the power. Perhaps I stated his position too strongly. I think it cannot well be questioned, as one of law, that the President does possess the power to pardon classes of citizens by proclamation. If that be conceded—and I will not undertake to add to the argument of the Senator from Maryland on that subject—then why repeal this section? The repeal of the section will not take from the President any power which he possesses under the Constitution. His power under the Constitution we cannot in any way impair. Then the only effect of the repeal will be an expression, as it may be understood by the country, of the will of Congress against the policy that is pursued by the Executive. I think that policy is the wise one, and therefore I shall regret to have any expression made by Congress against that policy, or any expression which may be so construed.

A singular subject has been introduced into the debate, Mr. President: the responsibility for the failure to bring Mr. Jefferson Davis to trial. I am not able to see exactly how it connects itself with this bill. The President of the United States has not pardoned him. I understand the Senator from Michigan, who addressed the Senate a few minutes ago, [Mr. HOWARD,] to lay any responsibility there may be upon that subject to the charge of the President of the United States. I am not able to see in what way the President of the United States can control the action of the courts. The Senator suggested that he had undertaken at a former time to prove that Mr. Jefferson Davis could be tried in any of the States into which the war was carried. I do not propose to discuss that question now. I understand that the late Attorney General of the United States, Mr. Speed, gave an opinion adverse to that view. But, sir, suppose that Mr. Jefferson Davis could be tried in the State of Pennsylvania because of the invasion of that State by one of the southern armies, is it within the power of the President of the United States to bring him to trial within the State of Pennsylvania? If in fact he can be tried there, how, and what power of the Government is to bring him to that trial? Has the grand jury of either of the districts in Pennsylvania preferred an indictment against him? Is there a pending case in Pennsylvania which would justify the President of the United States in sending him into that State for trial? Although the position of the Senator were conceded, how does that show any fault as against the Executive on this question? If the judiciary in Pennsylvania have taken no steps to bring him to trial, how can the Executive bring him to trial in that State?

As I understand, an indictment has been found against him in but one court, and that is in the circuit court of the United States for the district of Virginia. The Chief Justice of the United States presides in that court. Is he responsible for the failure to bring Mr. Davis to trial? I do not choose to discuss that. The Chief Justice has given to the country the reasons which have governed him in not bringing him to trial in Richmond. I think his reason a year ago or more was that martial law prevailed in the State of Virginia, and therefore he would not undertake to hold a civil court where the power was divided between the military and the civil authorities; that he would not be justified in trying him in a civil court while the military courts had any authority in the State. Whether that was a sufficient reason or not I do not choose to discuss. That was the reason assigned by him. I do not understand that the Chief Justice said that the fault was with the President or that there was any fault about it, but simply that at that time martial law prevailed in Virginia and it was not proper for him to hold a court there. I do not know authoritatively from himself what reason governs him now. There is no pretext that martial law divides the sway with the civil authority in that State. For months past the civil authority has been supreme in the State of Virginia. Why is Jefferson Davis not brought to trial upon an indictment the finding of which is known to all the country? I understand, as has been suggested by the Senator from Maryland, the last reason assigned is that under the adjustment of the districts and circuits by the law of the last session the judges cannot hold their courts in the circuits.

Mr. JOHNSON. Until there is an assignment.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Yes, until there is an assignment of the judges by legislative authority. I am not able to see how that will apply to the circuit in Virginia for the reason, as I understand, that the limits and number of that circuit have not been changed by the legislation, but that the number of the circuit and its extent is now what it was before the legislation spoken of.

Mr. JOHNSON. The circuit is extended in its jurisdiction.

Mr. HENDRICKS. The Senator from Maryland informs me that the circuit is extended in its jurisdiction; but I will ask the Senator whether the number of the circuit has been changed; whether the number is not the same?

Mr. JOHNSON. The number is the same, I suppose. If the Senator will permit me, I will say in justification, if it requires justification, of the opinion of the Chief Justice, that the change of the circuits takes from the judges the authority to hold courts in the circuits that they before presided over. That view was concurred in by nearly all the judges of the court. They supposed that that must be the state of things until the judges themselves, as they are authorized to do under the old law, shall assign the circuits over again. There are one or two judges who think differently; but they all think that so far as the districts are concerned in the circuits the district judge should hold the court, and that the district judge is also competent to hold the circuit court. The case, therefore, of Mr. Davis in the circuit court of Virginia might be tried by the district judge; but I suppose that the Chief Justice and the counsel for the prisoner, too, would be unwilling to have the case tried before a district judge, because there is some doubt whether in a capital case a district judge is competent to try the cause without the presence of the circuit judge. That was the opinion of the late Chief Justice of the United States. My impression at the time was, and still is, that it was an erroneous opinion; but still the opinion of such a man as Mr. Taney was entitled to all weight, and certainly entitled to more weight than any opinion I could give; and our district judge does decline and has always declined to try any cases the punishment of which is death.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I do not suppose any considerable sentiment in the country would desire the trial of Mr. Davis by any judge other than the judge of the Supreme Court assigned to that circuit, so that the questions of law, when they come to be decided on that trial, shall have weight and influence in the country. I was not myself able to see why the circuits should require a new assignment when the number of the circuit itself had not been changed. But I care nothing about that. It is a question—

Mr. TRUMBULL. If the Senator from Indiana will permit me, while he is on that question, I should like to inquire if there is any difficulty under the law as it stands in the Supreme Court assigning themselves to the respective circuits.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I believe not; until recently they have not been in session since the passage of the law. I believe the law that changed the circuits was approved since the adjournment of the court last spring. Therefore since its passage they have not been in session till recently. Whether they have made a reassignment I do not know.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The Senator from Indiana will pardon me for interrupting him; but I should like to inquire—I have not looked at the law—if it is not in the power of the judges to assign themselves? Is it done by an order of the court? My impression was that the judges possessed authority under the law to assign themselves to the respective circuits. I have not looked at the law; but it seems to me there can be no doubt about that.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I do not intend to enter upon a question like that in this debate. I know that the judge of the circuit in which I practice, who is a very able man indeed, Judge Davis, hesitated to hold the circuit court until there was a reassignment by the Supreme Court in banc. He did not understand that he could hold the court in his circuit at the last term because of this difficulty. If that is a sufficient excuse for the Chief Justice, let it be so. I shall be very much gratified if it is; but it is not right, it is not fair to charge upon the Executive that which is exclusively under the control of the judiciary. Is there any Senator who would desire to see the Executive undertake to control the action of the judiciary, to say what causes shall be tried and when they shall be tried?

But, Mr. President, I rose simply to say that my objection to this bill is not that it would take from the President any power which I think he possesses under the Constitution, but that it will be made to be understood in the country as the expression of Congress against the policy which I think for the good of the country.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, the Senator from Indiana has erected a windmill, and then leveled his lance and charged Don Quixote like upon it. I made no charge against the President of the United States; none whatever. I neither charged him with selling individual pardons nor with selling proclamations of pardon. I made no charge at all. I will read what I did say:

"Mr. President, it is a notorious fact, as notorious as the records of a court, that pardons have been for sale around this town, for sale by women, and more than one woman. The records of your court in the District of Columbia show this."

Again, I said:

"This is a matter of public record, a matter that every man knows who has read the newspapers or examined the records of your courts, and I have it from one of the judges of the court of this District that such is the fact."

I made no charge that the President had sold pardons or even knew that pardons were sold; but I stated the fact that they were sold and gave the authority on which I made the statement. Again, I said:

"If the President has these powers under the Constitution let him exercise them; but in God's name give him no greater power than he possesses under the Constitution."

I did not say that the section which this bill proposes to repeal either diminished or increased his powers; but if it did increase his powers I desired to restrict him to his constitutional powers. But I will now say, sir, that when these disgraceful facts were brought to the knowledge of the President he denounced the man who brought them to his knowledge, and the nefarious business went on for months afterward; and the intimacy of those individuals who had been selling pardons continued at the White House for months after it had been brought to his knowledge that pardons were being sold. I did not make this statement before, but I make it now.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I am glad to hear the Senator disclaim an intention to make the charge against the President. I had not been able to understand his language otherwise, but I am glad now of his statement upon the subject. He said:

"The records of your court in the District of Columbia show this. Any Senator who desires that disgraceful business to go on, of course desires that this clause shall remain; any Senator who desires to stop that disgraceful business, desires that the clause shall be instantly repealed."

That was the Senator's language. The only authority given in this section was to issue a proclamation of pardon, and I was not able therefore to understand the Senator's language, and I am very glad of his explanation on this occasion.

Mr. CHANDLER. If the Senator will look at the remarks made by me a few moments before he will find this language which I just now read:

"If the President has these powers under the Constitution, let him exercise them; but in God's name give him no greater power than he possesses under the Constitution," which is of itself a sufficient explanation of my position.

Mr. TRUMBULL. As something has been said about the question of the allotment of judges, and an impression seems to have prevailed in some quarters that there was an inadvertence on the part of Congress in not providing at the last session for an allotment of the judges of the Supreme Court so that the circuit courts could be held, I desire to say that it seems to me that the law is very specific on that point, and I beg leave to read it.

"That on every appointment which shall be hereafter made of a chief justice or associate justice, the said chief justice and associate justices shall allot themselves among the aforesaid circuits as they shall think fit, and shall enter such allotment on record. And in case no such allotment shall be made by them at their session next succeeding such appointment, and also after the appointment of any judge, as aforesaid, and before any allotment shall have been made, it shall and may be lawful for the President of the United States to make such allotment as he shall deem proper, which allotment made in either case shall be binding until another allotment shall be made."

Then a subsequent section provides that the attendance of two justices of the Supreme Court may be required to hold a circuit court by an order of the court. It seems that the court would have to be together and enter upon the record their allotment, but in case no allotment is made then the President of the United States has authority to allot the judges, which holds good until a new allotment is made by the court. It seems to me that there is no obstacle whatever in the way of the judges assigning themselves to the respective circuits under the law as it stands, and in case of a failure of the judges to do it, the authority in the President to do it is ample.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Delaware as a substitute for the bill. The amendment was rejected.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, and was read the third time.

Mr. JOHNSON. Upon the passage of the bill I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 27, nays 7; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Cattell, Chandler, Conness, Cragin, Creswell, Edmunds, Fessenden, Foster, Fowler, Henderson, Howard, Howe, Kirkwood, Lane, Morgan, Morrill, Poland, Ramsey, Ross, Sherman, Stewart, Sumner, Trumbull, Wade, Willey, Williams, and Wilson—27.

NAYS—Messrs. Dixon, Doolittle, Hendricks, Johnson, Noron, Patterson, and Saulsbury—7.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Buckalew, Cowan, Davis, Fogg, Frelinghuysen, Grimes, Guthrie, Harris, McDougall, Nesmith, Nye, Pomeroy, Riddle, Sprague, Van Winkle, and Yates—18.

So the bill was passed.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

On the motion of Mr. RAMSEY, it was Ordered, That when the Senate adjourns to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The joint resolution (H. R. No. 227) authorizing the Secretary of War to transfer certain property to the National Asylum for Disabled Volunteers, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

PRINTING OF BANKRUPT BILL.

Mr. ROSS, from the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred a resolution yesterday submitted by Mr. POLAND, reported it without amendment, and it was agreed to as follows:

Resolved, That five hundred additional copies of House bill No. 598, and the amendments thereto proposed by the Committee on the Judiciary, be printed for the use of the Senate.

THE TENURE OF OFFICE.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move to postpone the present, if there is a present order, as I believe there is, and all prior orders, to proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 453, to regulate the tenure of offices.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It is not designed, I understand, to go on with the bill to-night; I therefore move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. WADE. Will you withdraw that motion for a moment?

Mr. TRUMBULL. Certainly.

Mr. WADE. I believe that the Committee on the Judiciary have charge of the House bill fixing the time for the holding of the sessions of the next Congress.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It has been reported to the Senate.

Mr. WADE. It seems to me that it is important that that bill should be taken up and disposed of at a very early day, so that some of the States that do not ordinarily elect in time to participate in the proposed first session of the next Congress may have an opportunity to change, if necessary, their ordinary time of electing so as to conform to our new law. I barely now wish to call attention to it so that it may not be overlooked. It seems to me it is important to act upon it at an early day.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I can say in reply to the Senator from Ohio that the bill was reported back by the committee before the recess, and it is in the Senate, subject to be taken up at any time. It was in the particular charge of the Senator from New York, [Mr. HARRIS,] who is not in his seat to-day.

Mr. WADE. Very well; I only wished to call attention to it.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I renew the motion to adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, January 4, 1867.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. B. BOYNTON.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

POST OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. KASSON. I desire to make a report from the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I thought that no business was to be done to-day.

The SPEAKER. No vote is to be taken to-day.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. No vote on any subject?

The SPEAKER. The unanimous order of the House was that no vote should be taken to-day.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. On any subject?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the report is on order.

Mr. KASSON, from the Committee on Appropriations, then reported a bill making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1868; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, made the special order for Monday next, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I desire to reserve the right to raise points of order on that bill in Committee of the Whole as in the House.

The SPEAKER. That right is reserved.

FORTIFICATION BILL.

Mr. STEVENS, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported a bill making appropriations for the construction, preservation, and repair of certain fortifications and other works of defense for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1868; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and made the special order for Wednesday next.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I reserve the right to raise points of order on that bill as in the House.

The SPEAKER. The right will be reserved.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I would like to have a definite understanding about this matter of business, as some gentlemen seem to have been misled. The report in the Globe, which certainly misled me, says that by unanimous consent a proposition was submitted by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ASHLEY] that tomorrow and the next day be devoted to debate, and that no vote be taken on those days.

The SPEAKER. The Chair supposes that the report in the Globe is taken from two propositions made: one proposition was that nothing but debate should be in order; afterward the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ASHLEY] suggested that the agreement be that no vote should be taken.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. As I understand the agreement, no vote is to be taken on the reconstruction bill before the House or upon any important measure. We have probably no quorum here. But I understood that resolutions and bills could be introduced.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I think we had better have the understanding made more clear, that no business shall be done except of a formal character.

Mr. SCHENCK. I must object to any such understanding, for I am about to ask the unanimous consent of the House to pass a bill to-day, the necessity of which the gentleman from Illinois will at once see.

The SPEAKER. If any gentleman objects, the Chair will decide that the gentleman's proposition cannot be entertained.

ELECTION OF SENATORS IN CONGRESS.

Mr. SCHENCK. I ask unanimous consent to offer a bill, which I send to the desk. Senators have advised me that they will be prepared to act upon it if they get it to-day. I ask leave to offer the bill now and that it be read.

The bill was read. It provides that the act to regulate the times and manner of holding elections for Senators in Congress, approved July 25, 1866, shall be so construed that when the meeting and organization of the Legislature of any State takes place on a Tuesday, then the second Tuesday after such meeting and organization shall be held to be the fourteenth day thereafter.

Mr. NIBLACK. I object.

PAYMENT OF PUBLIC DEBT.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Connecticut, by unanimous consent, submitted the following preamble and resolution; which were referred to the Committee of Ways and Means:

Whereas the people of the United States have paid more than $200,000,000 of the public debt during the last fifteen months and are now toiling under an unprecedented burden of taxation; and whereas the population of the country duplicates in twenty-one years, after the lapse of which term there will be two men to contribute to the public debt as often as there is one now; and whereas the credit of the Government is so firmly established that its securities are eagerly sought for in every part of the world: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the people ought not for the present to be further or any longer taxed to raise money for the reduction of the principal of the public debt.

FIRST COLLECTION DISTRICT OF ILLINOIS.

Mr. WENTWORTH, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be requested to communicate to this House the amount of internal revenue collected in the first collection district of Illinois for each month in the year 1866, and the amount of penalties assessed against any one person or firm or company in such district, with the amount remitted by the Department at Washington in each case, specifying the instances where the remittance has been made upon the recommendation of any particular officer or officers in said district.

TREATMENT OF FREEDMEN.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, by unanimous consent, presented a paper containing statements of officers of the Bureau of Refugees, Freedmen, and Abandoned Lands, concerning the treatment of freedmen in Arkansas and the Indian Territory; which was referred to the joint committee on reconstruction, and ordered to be printed.

DUTIES ON SUGAR, MOLASSES, ETC.

Mr. JULIAN, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to inquire into the expediency of so arranging the tariff duties on sugar, molasses, coffee, and other articles as to discriminate in favor of the free-grown and against the slave-grown products.

SWAMPS AND OVERFLOWED LANDS.

Mr. McCLURG, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill in addition to and amendatory of the several acts of Congress relative to swamp and overflowed lands; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

RESERVATION NO. 17, WASHINGTON.

Mr. INGERSOLL, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill in relation to reservation No. 17, in the City of Washington; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

COURT OF CLAIMS.

Mr. HILL, by unanimous consent, introduced a joint resolution extending the provisions of section two of an act entitled "An act to extend the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims;" which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

ARMY AND NAVY PENSIONS.

Mr. SCHENCK, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to continue to Army and Navy pensioners their pensions notwithstanding their appointments to civil office; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM GILL.

Mr. ARNELL, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill for the relief of William Gill, of Maury county, Tennessee, a veteran of the war of 1812; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

NATIONAL MILITARY AND NAVAL ASYLUM.

Mr. SCHENCK. I ask unanimous consent to introduce for the consideration of the House at this time a joint resolution, which I will send to the Clerk's desk to be read; and then I will explain why it is important that it should be passed now.

The joint resolution was read. It provides that the National Asylum for Disabled Volunteers, not having obtained title to land at Point Lookout, in Maryland, as contemplated by the twelfth section of the act approved March 21, 1866, establishing that institution, the Secretary of War is authorized at his discretion to transfer to the said National Asylum any property of the United States still remaining at Point Lookout which may be considered appropriate and useful for the objects of that corporation.

Mr. SCHENCK. I will explain the necessity for the action of Congress at this time upon this subject. By the twelfth section of the act which established the National Military and Naval Asylum it was provided that all the property of the United States now at Point Lookout, St. Mary's county, Maryland, shall be and become the property of the asylum so soon as a title to the satisfaction of the board of managers shall be made to the asylum of at least three hundred acres of land, including that on which said property of the United States is now built and maintained or held.

At the time it was thought that probably the managers of the asylum would select Point Lookout as one of the places for establishing a branch asylum. They have, however, declined to do so, but have located one of the branches at the North or Northeast, in Maine, another in Wisconsin, and another to be established somewhere in the West, probably in Ohio or in Indiana.

There is, however, on that private property a good deal of property now or lately belonging to the United States, consisting of barracks, a laundry, a bakery, &c. The Government has advertised and sold a portion of this property, and a part yet remains on hand. This, the Secretary of War says, will, if offered in the market, be sacrificed—sold for a mere song.

He is willing, if Congress will grant the necessary authority, to transfer to the National Asylum for a consideration of $1,200 such portion of this property as can be used for the benefit of the disabled soldiers. This resolution proposes to authorize the Secretary of War to make the transfer. It is believed that it is not worth while for the Government to buy from itself, or to require a corporation created by itself for public purposes—the care of the soldiers—to buy from the Government. This property, which might be used for the benefit of the soldiers, will be immediately sold, and sold at a very great sacrifice unless we adopt some measure of the kind now proposed.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was introduced, read a first and second time, and ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SCHENCK moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

EXTRA PAY OF TREASURY CLERKS.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, in reply to a resolution of the House of December 10, 1866, a report of the disbursement of the fund of $160,000 among the clerks in the Treasury Department; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

MAJOR OTIS A. WHITEHEAD.

Mr. DODGE, by unanimous consent, introduced an act to release the sureties of Major Otis A. Whitehead; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

RECONSTRUCTION.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I now call for the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. The first business in order is the consideration of House bill No. 543, to provide for restoring to the States lately in insurrection their full political rights, on which the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BINGHAM] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Speaker, when I took the floor yesterday it was with the intention of arguing this question before the House. When I yielded the floor the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] moved to go into the Committee of the Whole for general debate. I did not desire to debate this important question in the Committee of the Whole. My purpose was to discuss it in the presence of the House, aided by such suggestions as in a full House members interested in this great question might be likely to give me. I therefore beg leave to defer what I have to say until this bill shall come up in its regular order on next Monday.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Ohio that next Monday, after the morning hour, has been assigned for the consideration of one of the regular appropriation bills in the Committee of the Whole. Therefore this bill may possibly not be reached on that day.

Mr. BINGHAM. All I desire is to submit my remarks whenever the bill shall again come up in the House.

The SPEAKER. The bill is still before the House for discussion.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, (after a pause.) If no gentleman desires to take the floor, I move that the House adjourn.

Mr. SCHENCK. I ask the gentleman to withdraw his motion, that some petitions, which have been improperly referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, may be sent to appropriate committees.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I withdraw the motion for that purpose alone.

FREDERICK SCHADE AND OTHERS.

On motion of Mr. SCHENCK, by unanimous consent, the Committee on Military Affairs was discharged from the further consideration of the petition of Frederick Schade, of Tennessee, and various others, claiming compensation for a church destroyed by General Burnside's army; and the same was referred to the Committee of Claims.

DANIEL COLE.

On motion of Mr. SCHENCK, by unanimous consent the Committee on Military Affairs was discharged from the further consideration of the petition of Daniel Cole, of Hampshire county, Virginia, for a pension; and the same was referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

BAR BEHYMER.

Mr. SCHENCK, from the Committee on Military Affairs, by unanimous consent, submitted an adverse report on the petition of Bar Behymer, asking pay for military services rendered the Government in 1864; which was laid on the table.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate, by Mr. FORNEY, its Secretary, notifying the House that that body had passed Senate joint resolution No. 102, construing and giving effect to joint resolution entitled "Joint resolution for the survey of the State of Wisconsin," approved July 1, 1864, in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House.

MAIL ROUTE TO CALIFORNIA.

Mr. BIDWELL, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be, and hereby are, instructed to inquire into the reasons why service has not been put on the mail route from Springfield, Missouri, to San Francisco, California; and if any further legislation is necessary to establish a daily line of stages between those points, then to report by bill or otherwise.

SESSION TO-MORROW.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. I move when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I thought the understanding was there was to be no vote taken to-day. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. A vote on the motion to adjourn over can be taken.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 26, noes 28; no quorum voting.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I hope it will be the understanding that the House shall meet to-morrow for debate only.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I have no objection to that.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. I withdraw my motion on that understanding.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is not aware of any gentleman who is desirous to go on to-morrow in the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. There is no quorum present in the city, notice having gone out that no business would be done until Monday next.

Mr. WENTWORTH. If it requires unanimous consent to do anything, I do not see why we should not act upon business to which there is no objection.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I learn there are three or four gentlemen who wish to speak to-morrow, and I hope the House will not adjourn over.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection it will be the understanding that the session to-morrow will be devoted exclusively to debate in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the President's message.

There was no objection; and it was ordered accordingly.

REPORT OF REVENUE COMMISSIONER.

Mr. GARFIELD, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That there be printed for the use of the House twenty thousand copies of the report of the special commissioner of the revenue, and two thousand copies of the form of bill accompanying the same; and for the use of the Treasury Department one thousand copies of the report, and five hundred copies of the form of bill.

COTTON CLAIMS.

Mr. WENTWORTH, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be requested to communicate the amount of each cotton claim presented to his Department for payment, with the names of the claimants, with the amount allowed upon each claim, stating what ones have been rejected, what ones are still under examination, and the total amount already paid upon all the cotton claims allowed.

Mr. WENTWORTH moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

TENNESSEE AGRICULTURAL COLLEGE.

Mr. BIDWELL. I ask unanimous consent to take up and put on its passage House joint resolution No. 213, to extend the provisions of the act in regard to agricultural colleges to the State of Tennessee.

Mr. ALLISON. I object.

PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

Mr. GARFIELD moved that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the President's annual message.

The motion was agreed to.

So the rules were suspended; and the House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. GARFIELD in the chair,) and proceeded to the consideration of the President's annual message, on which Mr. MERCUR was entitled to the floor.

Mr. MERCUR. I am not prepared to go on to-day, and will yield the floor to any gentleman who is.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. I propose to discuss House bill No. 684, to repeal certain parts of the act approved April 30, 1790, entitled "An act for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States."

By the act approved April 30, 1790, it is provided:

"SEC. 1. That if any person or persons owing allegiance to the United States of America shall levy war against them, or shall adhere to their enemies, giving them aid and comfort within the United States or elsewhere, and shall be thereof convicted on confession in open court or on the testimony of two witnesses to the same overt act of the treason whereof he or they shall stand indicted, such person or persons shall be adjudged guilty of treason against the United States and shall suffer death."—1 United States Statutes-at-Large, 112.

The same act provides as follows:

"SEC. 32. That no person or persons shall be prosecuted, tried, or punished for treason or other capital offense aforesaid, willful murder or forgery excepted, unless the indictment for the same shall be found by a grand jury within three years next after the treason or capital offense aforesaid shall be done or committed, nor shall any person be prosecuted, tried, or punished for any offense not capital, nor for any fine or forfeiture under any penal statute, unless the indictment or information for the same shall be found or instituted within two years from the time of committing the offense or incurring the fine or forfeiture aforesaid: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall extend to any person or persons fleeing from justice."—1 United States Statutes, 119.

That act created four capital offenses—treason, murder, piracy, and forgery.

There is not in the act, and never has been, any limitations as to prosecutions for murder and forgery, but forgery has ceased to be a capital offense.

The act therefore limits prosecutions now to three years in cases of treason and piracy.

The act approved July 17, 1862, provides—

"SEC. 1. That every person who shall hereafter commit the crime of treason against the United States and shall be adjudged guilty thereof shall suffer death" or be imprisoned for not less than five years and fined." &c.

"SEC. 2. That if any person shall hereafter incite, set on foot, assist, or engage in any rebellion or insurrection against the authority of the United States or the laws thereof, or shall give aid and comfort thereto, or shall engage in or give aid and comfort to any such existing rebellion or insurrection, and be convicted thereof, such person shall be punished by imprisonment for a period not exceeding ten years, or by a fine not exceeding $10,000, and by the liberation of all his slaves, if any he have; or by both of said punishments at the discretion of the court."—12 United States Statutes, 589.

There is no repeal in terms of the act of 1790.

The act approved July 31, 1861, makes it a fineable offense for two or more persons to conspire together to overthrow, put down, or destroy by force the Government of the United States, or to levy war against the United States, or to oppose by force the authority of the Government, &c. (12 Statutes, 284.)

The actual hostilities which opened the war of the rebellion commenced in April, 1861, so that there were many "overt acts of treason" prior to the acts of July, 1861, and July, 1862, and prosecutions for which are now barred under the act of 1790. The act of 1790 also limits prosecutions for treason under the act of July 17, 1862, since the limitation of three years in the former act applies to all cases of treason, whether defined by that or any subsequent statute.

The bill now under consideration (H. R. No. 684) declares:

That so much of section thirty-two of an act for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States, approved April 30, 1790, as provides that no person or persons shall be prosecuted, tried, or punished for treason or other capital offense unless the indictment for the same shall be found by a grand jury within three years next after the treason or capital offense shall be done or committed, shall be, and is hereby, repealed. And all persons who have been or may be guilty of treason or other capital offense may at any time be indicted, tried, and punished therefor.

I am instructed by the Committee on the Judiciary to report this bill to the House with an amendment to come in at the end of it, as follows:

Provided, That nothing herein shall apply to crimes the prosecution of which is already barred by the provision herein repealed.

If this amendment shall be adopted and the bill passed and approved the effect will be that in all cases of treason and piracy, in which prosecutions are already barred by the act of 1790, no prosecution shall ever be commenced, and of course the guilty offenders will forever escape all punishment. That is, every act of piracy and every overt act of treason committed three years ago or more will escape prosecution and punishment.

If the amendment shall not be adopted, but if the bill be passed and approved in its original shape, assuming it to be valid, then pirates and traitors will simply stand upon the same footing with willful murderers under the statute; that is, they may be prosecuted and punished at any time when the evidence can be procured and the population of the rebel States shall be sufficiently loyal to render the administration of the law practicable.

The Judiciary Committee have not instructed me to recommend this amendment, but only to report it, to test the sense of the House.

Two questions therefore are presented for determination:

1. Shall the three years' bar against prosecutions be removed as to piracy and treason already fully barred, or if it shall not, then,

2. Shall the bar of three years be repealed as to acts of piracy and treason where the limitation is running, but is not yet run out.

I will present my views on these questions briefly and in the order stated.

Questions of expediency and of constitutional power are involved in the proposition to restore the right of prosecution in cases already barred.

Under ordinary circumstances no one perhaps would desire to interfere in such cases, for it is undoubtedly correct, as a general proposition, that even the errors of existing laws should be remedied by changes prospective in their operation.

No one now desires many sacrifices of life, even for the treason and piracy of that greatest of all great crimes, the late rebellion.

But Jefferson Davis at least should not escape the punishment due to his great crime. I agree, in part at least, with the late Attorney General Speed that—"It is the plain duty of the President to cause criminal prosecutions to be instituted before the proper [civil] tribunals, and at all proper times against some of those who were mainly instrumental in inaugurating and most conspicuous in conducting the late hostilities. I should regard it as a direful calamity if many [some few at least] whom the sword has spared, the law should spare also."—Letter to President, January 4, 1866.

No traitor has ever yet been punished in the United States. The opinion has become quite prevalent that it is only a political offense, indulged in by respectable gentlemen, and should be exempt from punishment, which is only designed for more humble offenders. If this be so, then abolish your treason statutes forever, and let your books no longer emblazon the lie that treason is a crime, when your practice says it is none. Ours is the only country where treason is made respectable by exemption from all punishment. I maintain that it is expedient, that it is alike the dictate of justice and sound policy to restore the right of prosecution, even in cases already barred, for many reasons, and among them these:

1. It is against the general policy of the law, universally maintained by all publicists, that any right of the Government, either in the prosecution of great criminals or in the assertion of civil rights, should be speedily defeated, thus giving immunity to crime in its worst forms.

2. The rebellion took possession of eleven States and rendered prosecutions impossible until its suppression; and even since then the disloyal condition of the people in most of those States has in fact made it impracticable to prosecute. The act of 1790 only contemplated in its general spirit and purpose a limitation of three years, when all the courts were open and trials were practicable.

3. Unless the right of prosecution is restored most if not all the traitors will be exempt from the death penalty for treason, and will only be liable to a fine not exceeding $10,000 and imprisonment for ten years, because it has been solemnly decided that for every act of treason since July 17, 1862, which consists in assisting or engaging in the rebellion or giving aid thereto, no punishment but fine and imprisonment can be inflicted. And, as every act of treason prior to that time and for more than a year and a half later is already barred by the three years' limitation, no traitor can be punished except by fine and imprisonment, as the law now stands, if the decision to which I have referred be sustained. In support of these propositions I will present some authorities.

Every statute of limitations which defeats a right of the Government is against the policy and the wisdom of the common law. It was long ago ruled—"That the king has a prerogative quod nullum tempus occurrit regi, and therefore the general acts of limitation, or of pendency, shall not extend to him."—11 Co., 68-74 b.; S. C., 1 Roll. R., 157.

And Angel, in his work on Limitations, says:

"It has been considered, that in all representative governments" "the reason for this doctrine is at least equally cogent here as in England."

And in People vs. Gilbert, 18 Johnson Reports, 228, Woodworth, Judge, declared that, on the ground of expediency and public convenience, it was a necessary principle, and that hence the rights of the Government could not be barred, even by a statute, unless specially named.

Then again the right of prosecution must be restored or Jefferson Davis and all his coconspirators may, and under the ruling of one of the judges of the Supreme Court probably will, escape only with fine and imprisonment.

In the case of The United States vs. Chapman, tried October, 1863, in the United States circuit court for the northern district of California, before Justices Field and Hoffman, the defendants were indicted under the second section of the act of July 17, 1862. The indictment charged that defendants did traitorously engage in and give aid and comfort to the rebellion by fitting out an armed schooner with intent that it should be employed in the service of the rebellion to cruise on the high seas and commit hostilities upon the citizens, property, and vessels of the United States.

Mr. Justice Field, in his charge to the jury, said:

"In 1790 Congress passed an act fixing to the offense the penalty of death. By the first section of the act of July, 1862, Congress gave a discretionary power to the courts to inflict the penalty of death or fine and imprisonment, providing that in either case the slaves of the party convicted, if any he have, shall be liberated. The second section of the act declares 'that if any person shall hereafter incite, set on foot, assist, or engage in any rebellion or insurrection against the authority of the United States or the laws thereof, or shall give aid and comfort to any such existing rebellion or insurrection and be convicted thereof, such person shall be punished by imprisonment for a period not exceeding ten years, or by a fine not exceeding $10,000, and by the liberation of all his slaves, if any he have, or by both said punishments, at the discretion of the court.'"

"There would seem upon a first examination to be an inconsistency between the first and second sections of this act—the first section declaring a particular punishment for treason, and the second declaring, for acts which may constitute treason, a different punishment. It appears from the debate in the Senate of the United States, when the second section was under consideration, that it was the opinion of several Senators that the commission of the acts which it designates might, under some circumstances, constitute an offense less than treason."

"But we are unable to conceive of any act designated in the second section which would not constitute treason, except perhaps that of inciting to a rebellion. If we lay aside the discussion in the Senate, and read the several sections of the act together, the apparent inconsistency disappears. Looking at the act alone we conclude that Congress intended—

1. To preserve the act of 1790, which prescribes the penalty of death in force for the prosecution and punishment of offenses committed previous to July 17, 1862, unless the parties convicted are accused under the act of the latter date for subsequent offenses.

2. To punish treason thereafter committed with death, or fine and imprisonment, in the discretion of the court, unless the treason consist in engaging in or assisting a rebellion or insurrection against the authority of the United States, or the laws thereof, in which event the death penalty is to be abandoned, and a less penalty inflicted. By this construction the apparent inconsistency in the provisions of the different sections is avoided and effect given to each clause of the act. The defendants are therefore in fact on trial for treason without being liable in case of conviction to the penalty which all other civilized nations have awarded to this the highest of crimes known to the law."

And the court say that the acts charged in the indictment constitute a "levying of war," and are therefore "treason" in fact; though as the second section of the act of 1862 uses other words, it is sufficient if the indictment follows the words of the act without specifically using the terms "levying war."

I do not wish to be understood as indorsing the opinion of the learned justice, that if treason consists in "engaging in rebellion" it is only punishable under the second section of the act of 1862.

It is the duty of courts to give effect to the legislative intent, and it is conceded that the opinion of Senators when the second section of the act of 1862 was under consideration was—

"That the commission of the acts which it designates might under some circumstances constitute an offense less than treason."

I am equally well aware that the legislative intent, where it is palpably manifest from the letter, spirit, and general purpose of the statute, cannot be controlled by evidence aliunde, either from the debates or otherwise.

But, inasmuch as every case of treason was made punishable by the act of 1790, and by section one of the act of July, 1862, without subtraction or diminution, it would seem to me that it is unreasonable to suppose that section two of the latter act covered any case of treason, and this section should therefore be construed as applicable only to "offenses less than treason," as the Senators enacting it declared. I must be permitted to say, with the most profound respect for and deference to the opinion of a justice so distinguished, that it seems to me much more reasonable to hold that whenever the act of "engaging in rebellion" amounts to "treason" it is punishable as treason, rather than to hold, as the distinguished Justice Field has done, that if admitted "treason" consists in "engaging in rebellion" it can only be held criminal as rebellion.

It is the duty of the court by a well-known rule of interpretation to give effect to all parts of a statute; but in doing this there is no reason why "treason" should be merged and lost in the less crime of rebellion than that rebellion when it consists of admitted treason should not be held and punished as treason.

And if the same criminal acts palpably constitute both "treason" and "rebellion" the Government may have an "election of remedies;" the right to prosecute for either according to the character, position, legal and moral criminality of the offender, and the necessities of the case. The law-making power may prescribe cumulative punishments, giving the Government an election to pursue some one of them.

The most philosophical and learned writer on American criminal law asserts on high authority that—

"If a new statute creates an offense with aggravations not embraced in the old law, and creates a higher penalty, or omits some aggravating quality and provides a lower penalty, or if it is applicable to a particular class only of persons who owe particular duties in the matter, the new punishment does not supersede the old."—1 Bishop, Criminal Law, 99, 208.

And again, he says:

"There may be several concurrent remedies 'of a different nature' for one offense, carrying with them their respective penalties, and each may stand, penalty and all, without conflicting with the others."—1 Bishop, Criminal Law, 97.

But the fact that a justice of the Supreme Court has made the ruling to which I refer should admonish us that it is possible, if not probable, as the Supreme Court is constituted, that the greatest of all great criminals now will be held only subject to fine and imprisonment. For this reason we should restore the right of prosecution for overt acts of treason committed prior to July 17, 1862, so that adequate punishment may be inflicted on the chief conspirators of the great rebellion. The constitutional power to restore the right of prosecution after it is barred I regard as entirely clear.

In the hurried examination I have given this subject I do not find that this precise question has ever been made or decided by the courts. But on principle and by way of analogy it must be so.

The same traitors who planned the assassination of the late lamented President Lincoln might in one or all of the judicial districts assassinate the judges, or by violence or terror, as now in the rebel States, intimidate grand and petit juries and defeat all prosecutions for more than three years. Yet shall this peril be invited by a concession of legislative impotency to restore the right of prosecution?

In principle and independently of the Constitution there can be no difference between the effect of the bar of a statute of limitations in civil and criminal cases. The inhabitants of a State in rebellion may owe a hundred millions to creditors in a loyal State, and yet if the rebellion should obstruct the courts and the collection of debts until the limitation had expired is the law powerless to restore the remedy?

All the authorities agree that there is a distinction between the right of action and the remedy to enforce it; between the crime and the public right of redress by prosecution.

A right of civil action may exist, as, for instance, the debt evidenced by a promissory note, and yet there may be no remedy to recover it, either because the law has provided no court in which to sue, or because the time has passed by within which by a statute of limitations an action may be brought. Now, in either of these cases the debt may still exist long after the remedy is lost. A party having committed murder or treason still continues guilty of the crime, even after the statute has declared that no prosecution shall be had therefor.

Story, in his Conflict of Laws, says:

"It may be important, then, carefully to distinguish between cases where the statute of limitations is strictly a mere bar to the remedy and cases where it goes directly to the extinguishment of the debt, claim, or right."

And Angel says:

"The difference between the obligation of a contract and the remedy to enforce it is that they originate at different times."—Limitations, page 18, section 11, chapter 2.

There is no such thing as a vested right in any particular remedy."—1 Bishop Criminal Law, section 104; Commonwealth vs. Commissioners, 6 Peck, 501.

Now I concede that the law-making power could, in the absence of any restraining constitutional provision, provide in a limitation statute that, after a given length of time, a right of action or a right to property in the claimant should cease and vest in the debtor or occupant. This has been done by statute. (So in Jamaica, Story, Conflict of Laws, section 582; 17 Vesey, Jr., 87, note; Lincoln vs. Battle, 6 Wend., 475. So Connecticut, Act of 1822, Digest R. I. Laws, pages 363, 364, edition 1822; Ersk. Inst., B. 3, title 7, sec. 1; Newby vs. Blakeley, 3 Hen. & Mun. R., 57; Brent vs. Chapman, 5 Cranch, 358; Shelby vs. Grey, 11 Wheaton, 361, 372; 11 Pick., 86; Dudley vs. Ward, Ambler's R., 118; 3 Johns. Ch. R., 190, 218; Gallis R., 371, 372; 2 Mason R., 151; 5 Clark & Fennell R., 1, 17.) And I will not say that a similar effect might not be given to the limitation of prosecutions for crime by declaring that after a time the act previously criminal should cease to be so, thus giving an effect equal to that of a pardon. But here there is no such question. The act of 1790 does not undertake to wipe out the crime, but only to say that after three years no person shall be prosecuted; that the remedy shall not be pursued. The very fact that the Congress of 1790 did not exercise the high power they held of declaring that after three years the overt acts constituting treason through that limited period should thereafter cease to constitute crime is high evidence that there is a reserved power to restore the remedy while the overt acts continue criminal. In all such cases the suspended remedy is within the control of the law-making power and may be restored.

A question analogous to this came before the supreme court of Ohio in Johnson vs. Bentley, 16 Ohio Reports, 100. By a statute of 1816 unincorporated persons are prohibited from banking, but their notes issued are not void. A statute of 1824 enacted that courts should not entertain any action upon bank notes issued by unincorporated bankers, but this was repealed in 1840.

Between 1816 and 1824 Bentley and others, unincorporated bankers, issued bank notes, and in 1846 the plaintiff sued to recover on such notes. The opinion of the court was delivered by Judge Read, who said:

"After the passage of the act of 1824 there was a liability without a right of action to enforce it. The remedy was denied; it has been restored by a repeal of the act denying it. This is, then, a case of mere suspended remedy, and the Legislature has the full power to restore it."

(See Lewis vs. McElvain, 16 Ohio Reports, 347; Trustees vs. McCaughey, 2 Ohio State Reports, 152.)

Retrospective laws were not then prohibited by the constitution of Ohio. Congress has repeatedly sanctioned such laws. (Satterlee vs. Matthewson, 2 Peters, 380; Charles River Bridge vs. Warren Bridge, 11 Peters, 420; Webb vs. Den, 17 Howard, 576; Wilkinson vs. Leland, 2 Peters, 627, 16 Peters, 294; Watson vs. Mercer, 8 Peters, 38. See Woart vs. Winnich, 3 New Hampshire, 473.)

There is another class of cases which, by way of analogy, establishes the power to restore the remedy.

In Bulger vs. Roche, 11 Pickering Reports, 36, the remedy on a cause of action was barred by the local law of Nova Scotia, where both parties resided during the whole period of the running of the statute of limitations.

"The supreme court of Massachusetts held that the right of action after a change of domicile of the defendant by a removal to Massachusetts was not thereby extinguished in the State tribunals; but might be pursued within the period by the statute of limitations of Massachusetts."

In other words, that the lex fori governed without regard to the lex loci contractus, and the foreign limitation only operated on the remedy, and that not extra territorially. (Byrne vs. Crowninshield, 17 Mass. R., 55; LeRoy vs. Crowninshield, 2 Mason R., 151; 10 Barn. & Cres., 903; 2 Bing. N. C., 209; 3 Johns. Ch. R., 219; 9 Mart. R., 526; 3 Bing. Comm. on Col. and For. Law, part 2, chap. 10, sec. 5, p. 124; Story, Conf. Laws, sec. 581; Dudley vs. Warde, Ambler R., 113; McElmoyle vs. Cohen, 13 Peters R., 327; Angel on Limitation, 62, chap. 8; 1 Cowan, N. Y. R., 402; Andrews vs. Heriot, 4 Cowan, 528. But see Don vs. Lippman, 5 Clark & Fennell R., 117; Story on Conf. Laws, sec. 582; Beckford vs. Wade, 17 Vesey, Jr., note; 22 Alabama, 631; 5 Maryland, 256; Newby vs. Blakeley, 3 Hexn. & Müm. R., 57; Brent vs. Chapman, 5 Cranch R., 358; Shelley vs. Grey, 11 Wheaton R., 372; Huber vs. Steiner, 2 Bing. N. C., 211.) This question is now before the Supreme Court of the United States.

Now all this proceeds upon the idea that the remedy is subject to the legislative power at the time an action or prosecution may be instituted, notwithstanding the right of action may have been previously barred.

But now I come to a class of cases more directly in point and more conclusive in their character. The statute of limitations may take away the right to prosecute for crime. In such case it is taken away by law. On principle and in effect it can make no difference whether a right of prosecution is taken away by a limitation law or any other law. Yet it has been again and again solemnly decided that a right of prosecution utterly taken away and extinguished by law may be restored by law, and that the restoring law is not ex post facto.

The repeal of a criminal statute without any saving prevents all future prosecutions under the repealed law, including crimes committed prior to the repeal. (1 Bishop, 103.) But in such case, says Bishop in his excellent work on Criminal Law, (volume I, section 105:)

"Where after the old law has been repealed the Legislature by subsequent act authorizes the proceedings, as by repealing the repealing statute, in every such case, and though the right to prosecute should have once lapsed a conviction may be had. The statute that repeals the law under which a prisoner committed an offense 'operates, in the language of Wilde, J., 'only as a suspension of his liability and not in the nature of a pardon.'—Commonwealth vs. Getchell, 16 Pickering, 452, (contra Roberts vs. State, 2 Overt, 423.) Com. vs. Mott, 21 Pick., 492; see Van Valkenburg vs. Torrey, 7 Cowan, 252, 255; State vs. Dunkley, 3 Iredell, 116; Dawson vs. State, 6 Texas, 347; McMullen vs. Guest, 6 Texas, 275.

"A statute creating a new court or giving jurisdiction to an existing one to try offenses previously committed is not ex post facto."—Commonwealth vs. Phillips, 11 Pick., 28; Perry vs. Commonwealth, 3 Gratt., 632; Baughner vs. Nelson, 9 Gill., 299.

This authority is conclusive and unanswerable as applied to the question now under consideration. But it is supported by still other analogies. The constitutional prohibition against laws "impairing the obligation of contracts" is no less sacred than that against ex post facto laws. The remedy is as completely within legislative control in reference to the one class of laws as the other. Yet the Supreme Court of the United States, in discussing the constitutional prohibition against laws "impairing the obligation of contracts," used this language:

"Undoubtedly a State may regulate at pleasure the modes of proceeding in its courts in relation to its past contracts as well as future. It may, for example, shorten the period of time within which claims shall be barred by the statute of limitations."

"Whatever belongs merely to the remedy may be altered according to the will of the State, provided the alteration does not impair the obligation of the contract."

(Per Tancy, C. J., Bronson vs. Kinzie, 1 Howard, 315; Sedgwick on Statutory Law, 133, 192, 200, 643, 650, and cases collected.)

It may with equal propriety be said of laws affecting the remedy for crime, that—

"Whatever belongs merely to the remedy may be altered according to the will of the State."

And when we come to consider the definition of an ex post facto law it will be found that no definition ever given excludes the legislative right to restore the remedy by prosecution in cases where it is already barred.

An ex post facto law is defined by Blackstone thus:

"When after an action [indifferent in itself] is committed, the Legislature then for the first time declares it to have been a crime and inflicts a punishment upon the person who has committed it."—Com., 46.

This was the definition referred to in the debates which framed the national Constitution. (3 Madison Papers, 1399, 1450, 1579. Carpenter vs. Pa., 17 Howard R., 463.)

In Colder vs. Bull, 3 Dallas, 390, Chase, J., discusses the question, what is an ex post facto law? and he remarks:

"Literally, it is only that a law shall not be passed concerning and after the fact or thing done or action committed."

"I will state what laws I consider ex post facto within the words and intent of the prohibition:

"1. Every law that makes an action done before the passing of the law, and which was innocent when done, criminal, and punishes such action.

"2. Every law that aggravates a crime, or makes it greater than it was when committed.

"3. Every law that changes the punishment and inflicts a greater punishment than the law annexed to the crime when committed.

"4. Every law that alters the legal rules of evidence and receives less or different testimony than the law required at the time of the commission of the offense, in order to convict the offender.

"All these and similar laws are manifestly unjust and oppressive."

In that case it appeared that the Legislature of Connecticut passed a law in May, 1795, which set aside a decree of the court of probate for Hartford and granted a new hearing by the court.

The court held that the constitutional prohibition against the enactment of ex post facto laws had reference only to crimes.

But the justice delivering the opinion makes a remark which shows that a law to be ex post facto must relate to or affect the criminal act at the time of its commission. He says:

"In the present case there is no fact done by Bull and wife, plaintiffs in error, that is in any manner affected by the law or resolution of Connecticut; it does not concern or relate to any act done by them. The decree is the only fact on which the law operates."

This definition of Mr. Justice Chase is the most comprehensive, exhaustive, and complete ever given. It is adopted by Story and Kent and every author and jurist of any repute in this country.

If I am correct in the position that the remedy may be restored after it has been once barred, it will follow of course that while the statute is running the period of limitation may be enlarged or altogether taken away. Of this there can be no doubt whatever. The only pretext for denying the power of the Legislature to interfere with the remedy is, that it cannot create a right or reinvest a right already completely extinguished. (Bulger vs. Roche, 11 Peck, 36.) But no right is extinguished or lost while the statute is running.

The right to change the limitation in such case is fully recognized in the authorities collected in a note to section twenty-two of the recent edition of Angel on Limitations, which I will read, as follows:

"A statute of limitation may well apply to contracts in existence at the time of its passage, provided a reasonable time be allowed before the statute takes effect or the debt is barred within which creditors may institute their actions. (Pierce vs. Toby, 5 Met. (Mass.), 168; Patterson vs. Gaines, 6 How. (U. S.), 550; Pearce vs. Patton, 7 B. Mon. (Ken.), 172; Sleeth vs. Murphy, 1 Morris, (Iowa), 321; West Fel. Railroad Co. vs. Stockett, 13 S. & M. (Miss.), 375; Beal vs. Nason, 2 Shep. (Me.) 344; Bank of Alabama vs. Dutton, 9 How. (U. S.), 522; Webster vs. Cooper, 14 How. (U. S.), 488; Winston vs. McCormick, 1 Carter, (Ind.), 56; Pritchard vs. Spencer, 2 id., 436; De Cordova vs. Galveston, 4 Texas, 470; Gilman vs. Cutts, 3 Foster, (N. H.), 376; Willard vs. Harvey, 4 id., 344; Slater vs. Cave, 3 Ohio, (N. S.), 30; Briscoe vs. Anketell, 28 Miss., 6 (Cush.); 36; State vs. Clark, 7 Ind., 468.) It has been held, however, in Arkansas that the statute of 1844 does not apply to causes of action which had accrued at the time of its passage. (Calvert vs. Lowell, 5 Eng. (Ark.), 147; Morse vs. McLendon, id., 512.) So also in Kentucky, as to the effect of the revised statutes where the right of action had accrued previous to their passage. (Ashbrook vs. Quarle's Heirs, 15 B. Mon. (Ken.), 20; and see also Didier vs. Davidson, 2 Barb. (N. Y.) Ch., 477; Williamson vs. Field, 2 Sand. (N. Y.) Ch., 533; Thompson vs. Alexander, 11 Ill., 54; Brown vs. Wilcox, 14 S. & M. (Miss.), 127; Boyd vs. Baringer, 23 Miss., (1 Cush.), 269; Paddleford vs. Dana, 14 Miss., 517; Clemens vs. Wilkinson, 10 id., 97; Gordon vs. Mounts, 2 Greene, (Iowa), 343; Hinch vs. Weatherford, id., 244; Dickerson vs. Morrison, 1 Eng. (Ark.), 264; Lucas vs. Tunstall, id., 443.)

"But a statute extending the time of limitation will not revive cause of action already barred under pre-existing statutes. (Wright vs. Oakley, 5 Met. (Mass.), 400; Joy vs. Thompson, 1 Dory, (Mich.), 373; Hawkins vs. Campbell, 1 Eng. (Ark.), 512; Couch vs. McKee, id., 384; Walker vs. Bank of Mississippi, 2 id., 561; Clark vs. Bank of Mississippi, 5 id., 512; Bobb vs. Harlan, 7 Barr, (Penn.), 292; Forsyth vs. Ripley, 2 Greene, (Iowa), 181; McKinney vs. Springer, 8 Blackf. (Ind.), 506; Davis vs. Miner, 1 How. (Miss.), 180; Stopp vs. Brown, 2 Carter, (Ind.), 647; Wires vs. Farr, 25 Vt., 41.) If, however, the cause of action be not already barred, the statute extending the time will apply. (Winston vs. McCormack, 1 Smith, (Ind.), 9. And see Royce vs. Hardy, 24 Vt., (1 Deane), 620; Henry vs. Thorpe, 14 Ala., 103; Cox vs. Davis, 17 id., 714.) In Louisiana it is held that where there is a change in the limitation the time prior to the change is reckoned according to the law then in force, and the subsequent time according to the new statute. (Deaf vs. Patterson, 12 La. Ann. R., 728.)"

And now I submit to the House that the constitutional power to restore the right of prosecution already barred and the expediency of its exercise is established beyond controversy.

It will have a salutary effect if it shall be understood that this is one of the latent powers of Congress.

One of the great errors, not to say one of the great crimes of Andrew Johnson, has been and is that he has encouraged the rebels to believe that they are already restored to all their rights and have no sins for which they should atone.

The consequence has been and is, that the leading spirits of the rebellion, feeling the restraints of punishment removed, are defiant and insolent. Aided by the President, they have organized the forms of State governments in defiance of law, without consulting Congress, the only competent authority.

They have gone through the forms of electing rebels, who assume to be Senators and Representatives entitled to seats in Congress, in utter disregard of the law prescribing a "test oath." (Statute United States, page 502; act of July 2, 1862.)

These aspirants insolently demanded admission to these Halls while their hands are yet red and dripping with the blood of their victims, our murdered brethren. The spirit of rebellion and disobedience is as rife to-day in most of the rebel States as it was when the last rebel army surrendered. If some few of the great leaders can be made to understand that they are yet liable to the penalties of treason and that they may be candidates for these rather than for positions to make laws for loyal men, it will have a salutary effect in the way of inspiring respect for the law and obedience to its requirements.

The learned gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. JENCKES] has said that—"If there is any offense for punishment or prosecution to which a statute of limitation should be passed it is of that class denominated political offenses, of which treason is the highest."—Speech, December 12, 1866.

Rebellions have generally been against despots, to relieve people ground down by tyranny and to secure the rights of men. For such political offenses every generous impulse demands clemency and repose. But for the political offense of treason in a Government of the people like ours there ought to be no such generous humanity, for it is without excuse when the ballot is a sure corrective for all grievances.

I know, sir, that from the very necessity of the case a great rebellion must be followed by a general amnesty. The President has not only issued his proclamation of amnesty for most of those engaged in rebellion, but he has by pardons relieved most of those excepted from the amnesty from all punishments, if his pardons indeed be legal.

The reasons which existed at common law for regarding treason as a political offense, which should escape punishment whenever possible, do not exist here.

"By the ancient common law (says Story) it was left very much to discretion to determine what acts were and were not treason; and the judges" * * * "became but too often instruments" * * * "of injustice." * * * "They had abundant opportunities to create constructive treasons."—2 Story, Const., sec. 1797.

But if a mistaken zeal has perverted the law in aid of tyranny in other countries and so induced charity for the oppressed, it is no reason why bad men should have the same charity now in an effort to overthrow a "Government guilty of no wrong." To put all rebellion on the same footing is to disparage the moral heroism that combats tyranny and to dignify into respectability the criminal attempt to subvert a free Republic.

A good government here should not fail to execute salutary laws against bad men, because elsewhere bad men have perverted the laws to repress patriotic efforts to establish good government.

But now even in England treason is by act of Parliament a well defined crime. (Stat. 25 Edward III, chap. 2, 1 Hale P. C., 259.)

Our Constitution has expressly limited it to two species and thus "cut off all chances of arbitrary constructions." It can only be proved by "two witnesses to the same overt act or a confession in open court," and the "trial shall be held in the State" where the treason was committed. With these limitations on treason the public security is left vastly more in jeopardy by giving traitors perfect immunity from punishment than by a faithful execution of the law in a few of the most conspicuous and aggravated cases.

The question therefore for us to determine now is, whether all traitors shall escape the punishment awarded to great leaders of conspiracy in every other civilized country of the globe. The gentleman has cited cases of conviction for treason long years after the crimes committed. He might have cited similar cases of convictions for murder; for there is no limitation as to this either in the acts of Congress or in the States of the Union. I know no reason why an humble murderer should continue liable, and a great traitor, the leader of a conspiracy which counts its murders by hundreds of thousands, should escape. If, when we have vindicated the law by making an example, it shall be deemed expedient to prosecute no more, let it be so declared by authorizing amnesty for all, or by a statute of repose.

But as the law now stands, and with the construction given to it, not even one example can be made of any great offender.

And surely if three years limitation was proper when the courts were open and trials practicable, there ought to be three years for prosecution after trials shall become practicable.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] with his accustomed ingenuity, but not with his usual fairness, spoke of this bill by saying:

"I do not believe that it becomes this nation; I do not believe it is safe for us to undertake to pass laws by which we can or may be able to punish men, however guilty, who could not be punished under the law existing when the crimes were committed."—Speech, December 11.

It is enough to say, in answer to this, that the object of this bill is to restore the right to punish traitors "under the law existing when their crimes were committed."

It does not propose to administer any law different from that which existed when the crime was committed. But it simply provides that inasmuch as trials were then and ever since impossible by reason of the continuance of the rebellion, by reason of the continued wrong of the rebels, that they shall not now take advantage of that wrong to escape all punishment.

But the gentleman further—we may suppose for want of any real objection to the bill—sets up a man of straw to combat, and of course demolishes him. He said:

"The Constitution and our laws provide very carefully that especially in the case of treason the party charged with that crime must be tried at the place where the overt act was committed, in a district previously ascertained by law, and by a jury from that bailiwick. Now any law which professes to change that in any respect looks to me so much like an attempt to commit judicial murder that I have always been afraid to attempt it."—Stevens's speech, December 11.

I was quite as well aware of the constitutional provision referred to as my distinguished and venerable friend, [Mr. STEVENS,] but as this bill does not relate to the place of trial, which he finds so amply protected by the Constitution, his remarks which I have just read have no relation to the subject under consideration.

Again, the gentleman used this language:

"I am aware that the traitors in the South, if tried under our existing Constitution and laws, will not one of them be convicted. I should never attempt to try them for treason; I would try them as belligerents, under the law of nations and the laws of war."

I am happy to find the gentleman agreeing with me that a few at least of the traitors have been guilty of something for which they should be tried.

As he is in favor of a trial by court-martial "under the law of nations and the laws of war," I take it for granted he is in favor of punishment. He does not indulge the humane sentimentality that punishment should be meted out to small offenders and that great traitors should go unpunished.

But in courts-martial there is no venue, and traitors, if triable as belligerents under the laws of nations and the laws of war, could be tried out of the district or State where the crime was committed. Whether that would look like an "attempt to commit judicial murder" I leave the gentleman's speech to answer for itself.

But the gentleman's plan of trial is impracticable.

No one knows better than he that Andrew Johnson will neither authorize nor permit it, and on this question his decision is final.

The late Attorney General Speed, in an able opinion dated January 4, 1865, decided that military tribunals can not—

"exist except in time of war, and cannot then take cognizance of offenders or offenses." * * * "except offenders and offenses against the laws of war." (See Lawrence's speech in Congress, February 5, 1866.)

Such tribunals cannot punish for treason at all, but only for military offenses during "actual hostilities" or during that "state of war" which may exist afterward. During a great rebellion the Government by its military power may crush conspiracy and execute conspirators wherever found where the "salus populi" imperatively demands it, and no decision of the Supreme Court will ever in practice arrest the exercise of this power. (See ex parte Milligan, Supreme Court United States, December, 1866.) The war power will not wait until conspiracy has subverted the civil authorities to see if it is prudent to interfere.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] further said to the House:

"Now, it does not follow that every traitor will escape who is not prosecuted within three years of the time of the commission of the offense. The statute of limitations never runs in any case unless it is possible to enforce the remedy; it only runs from the time when it was possible to enforce it."

I must be permitted to differ with my venerable friend, learned as I know him to be in the law, but in this instance I fear his law is even worse than his logic.

Section thirty-two of the act of 1790 affixes a limitation of three years on prosecutions, but there is this proviso:

"Provided, That nothing herein contained shall extend to any person or persons fleeing from justice."

It so happens that John C. Breckinridge and others did not flee the country until long after the act of July 17, 1862, nor until all treason prior to that date was barred.

As to treason not barred, he and other fugitives would be liable to indictment and to fine and imprisonment only, if the ruling of Mr. Justice Field be correct.

But there is no statute and no principle of the common law which announces the general principle stated by the veteran statesman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS.]

Again, the gentleman said in the same connection:

"But whether that be so or not, still during the time of war, during the prosecution of the war, the crime continued; it was a continuing offense, and the offense continued up to the time when peace shall be proclaimed, which it never yet has been."

Certainly, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman could not have considered the words he used. He is too much of a lawyer to assert that overt acts of treason committed five years ago are not barred by the three years limitation of the act of 1790, because the rebellion was continuous.

The authorities are against the position. (Wharton's Precedents, 1117; 2 Chitty's Criminal Law, 67; Bishop's Criminal Procedure, sec. 978, 982.)

"An overt act must be alleged and proved."—3 Greenleaf's Evidence, sec. 240.

"Laying several overt acts in a count for high treason is not duplicity."—Archbold's Criminal Pleadings and Evidence, 13, London edition, 54; 1 Bishop's Criminal Procedure.

"The evidence must be confined to the overt act or acts laid in the indictment."—3 Greenleaf's Evidence, sec. 241.

And Bishop in his Criminal Procedure says:

"From this principle it might seem to follow that if taking the time alleged in the indictment to be the true time, the offense is barred by the statute of limitations, the indictment will be adjudged insufficient."—Section 256.

Traitors and their sympathisers would not favor this bill. It may find opponents in the ranks of loyal men. But I warn gentlemen that the time for universal amnesty has not yet come. This House expressed that opinion on the first day of the session. This bill alone can prevent the speedy coming of what is equivalent to universal pardon and amnesty—the end of all prosecutions.

Let the country take notice that he who votes against this bill or to modify it votes against merited punishment for the great leaders of the rebellion. Such ill-timed clemency is a crime against the Constitution, the majesty of the law, and the matured judgment of the loyal people of this Republic.

Mr. NEWELL. Mr. Speaker, I propose to submit a few remarks for the consideration of the House upon the annual message of the President of the United States.

In doing so allow me to call attention to the importance of the issues decided in the great political contest which agitated and almost convulsed the northern States during the recess of the present Congress. Those issues were not less momentous than the war itself. That, indeed, decided a question of mere physical superiority; those decided questions of political principle, which are to be the bases of our future prosperity. Whatever we may say of the prowess and perseverance of our people during the war, (and they were such as to attract the admiration of the world to our gallant armies,) we must admit that their conduct all through the late trying political campaign was so admirable as to extract unwilling praises even from the enemies of the country. That political contest was the most trying test ever imposed upon the principle of self-government; and so well did the people endure it that the most devoted worshippers of monarchical or despotic systems of government have been compelled to acknowledge that the strain was not too much for our institutions. Indeed, one of these gentlemen, on a visit to this country, in a speech delivered in this city a few weeks since, is reported to have put off the trying period of our institutions for at least a century. We thank him for his long respite, and only hope his descendants will do us a similar favor, and as graciously, when they find his promised period of dissolution is as far off as ever.

The military contest, I remarked, only decided a question of military superiority or inferiority; but the political, a question of social and material well-being. Consequently the importance of the latter cannot be overrated. Let me call attention to a few points bearing upon that importance.

Previous to the late war and the political contest just terminated, questions regarding rights of the States as opposed to those of the General Government were constant sources of dispute, which time and again threatened the existence of the Government. Those contests continued from the formation of the Government to the present day. Their results were as generally unfavorable to the continuance of such a degree of authority in the central Government as was compatible with its existence in case of the secession of one or more of the States. The gentleman who occupied the executive seat at the outbreak of the rebellion even questioned the right of the General Government to provide for its own safety in case of such secession. In this view he was sustained by many able men in his own party, who subsequently took part with the Union in the armed conflict, and by nearly all that party in both sections of the country. So far as political force availed, the victory at that dark and doubtful period was with the enemies of the General Government and in favor of the so-called rights of the States. Many leaders of both political parties wavered. The politicians apparently had been so indoctrinated with the prevailing heresy of State rights that it became a question with them whether we really were a nation or a mere confederacy of States, liable to be dissolved at any moment through the ambition of some powerful sectional politician acting upon the prejudices of the people under his immediate influence.

We were almost in that condition which marked the period of the dissolution of all republics, and indeed of all nations. We were about to be resolved into our original elements. Then what saved us from such a frightful catastrophe? Simply the instinct of national preservation in the great heart of the American people. That instinct was superior to the situation. It rose above the doubts and fears of politicians; as if the will of the Almighty himself was behind it urging it on to save the country from destruction it rushed to the rescue of the Government. It not only appalled the enemy but it strengthened the friends of the Union. In the darkest hour of disaster it never once flinched from its original purpose. It was the people that saved the Government during the war. It was the people also that saved it during the late political contest. As they determined by the war that this country should be a nation, so they determined by the late political contest that no party chicanery, that no dictation of men in power, even supposed to be originally for the Union could snatch the fruits of the war from their hands.

This much was so emphatically decided that he must be a madman or a traitor who doubts it. Look at the influences brought to bear against the people in the late contest! The whole executive power and patronage of the Government, now swelled to appalling proportions, were thrown into the hands of the enemy, so lately humbled and subdued on the field of battle. Every artifice that a long acquaintance with political management and an unscrupulous use of political corrupting influences could bring to bear to swerve the people from their purpose was resorted to. The Executive himself, with unblushing effrontery and a total disregard of the amenities and requirements of his high station, descended into the political arena and sought to bully the masses of the people into submission to his autocratic will. Such an exhibition of political violence as was displayed in that pretended monumental tour never before disgraced the country, and for the honor of human nature and the credit of republican institutions I pray God never will again. In the mean time, in every department of the Government the political ax was descending upon the heads of men too honest to be corrupted and too patriotic to sell their principles for place. A reign of political terror swept the land from one end to the other, in the midst of which the Executive, by his free pardons to rebels and more by promises of what he would do in the future, was paving the way for the return of the lately defeated rebels to all the political power and to a higher than the political status they had so lately forfeited.

But in the midst of all this the people proceeded quietly to discharge their duties as citizens who were determined to preserve to themselves a country; and, as during the late war they proved their prowess upon the battle-field by the bayonet, so in the late political contest they asserted their supremacy by the mightier weapon of the ballot. By the bayonet they saved us a nation on many a bloody battle-field; by the ballot, in one great and glorious political contest, they preserved that nation for themselves and their posterity forever. American nationality was the all-important question decided by the people in the late contest for political power. The period of that contest will mark the time when the United States entered into the great family of nations, with power equal to if not greater than any other of them all, to make herself feared and respected both at home and abroad. In that contest the Congress of the United States submitted to the people certain propositions for their acceptance, which propositions it considered essential to the future welfare, if not the very existence, of the Republic. After a contest to which, as I have stated, the annals of our political history afford no parallel, the people accepted these propositions, while the opponents of them retired ignominiously from the field. The Executive may yet make a show of resistance to them; but he must now see (and if he does not it is time he should) that such resistance betokens not only a spirit of factious opposition, but a desire to cater to the prejudices and passions of a section of the country whose patriotism must at least for some years to come be looked upon with a considerable degree of distrust. After such a political verdict as that lately rendered by the people, opposition to it takes the form of opposition to the country itself. If any belief remains in the hearts of the opponents of the loyal masses of the ability of the people to govern themselves, they must surely see that in the late elections a higher authority than that of any human law asserted itself—the will of God speaking through His chosen instrument—the voice of the people. Let those in power heed it ere it be too late.

As to the terms of the propositions submitted to and indorsed by the people, they are such as the lately rebellious States should be glad to accept. They are magnanimous on the part of the victors and not humiliating to the vanquished. They deprive but a few leading spirits of the rebellion of their rights, and in their cases the deprivation is confined to rights more nearly approaching the character of privileges than any other enjoyed in a republican form of government. In fact, these terms thus offered to rebels lately in arms tend to elevate rather than depress the people of that section of the country; as they open a way for the gradual incorporation into its body-politic of a class of persons who, under proper instruction and encouragement, may become hereafter as politically as they have heretofore been socially and materially useful. But even in this instance no force is used. The elevation of the subject-class of the South to political rights is virtually left in the hands of those who at present wield sovereign sway. It is left for the latter to say whether they are ready to admit the former to association with them. All the loyal people of the country ask for is security for the future. And is it too much to expect this? In treaties with foreign Powers at the close of the war the victors in all cases ask not only for security for the future, but for indemnity for the past.

The loyal people of the United States magnanimously concede the indemnity; but let not the late rebels be mistaken, for as magnanimously as they concede it so as religiously and determinately will they exact the security. There can be no alternative. If the security is not obtained in the way indicated in the amendments as proposed by Congress, it will be obtained in another, and I am free to say one more in accordance with my own individual ideas of justice and propriety. That other I indicated as long since as the 15th of February, 1866, and consists in the assumption of the right by Congress, by a declaratory act, to pronounce citizenship and suffrage synonymous; in other words, to assert the axiom that every man born on American soil is an American citizen, and as such heir to all the rights, privileges, and immunities of all other American citizens. So that if the rebel States are not willing to concede to the loyal people of the country the least measure of justice to which the latter are entitled, that is, security for the future, the loyal people themselves will seize that security by simply declaring that universal suffrage shall henceforth be the shibboleth of American political brotherhood.

Let these men, then, who by their causeless rebellion have forfeited all their rights of citizenship choose whom they will serve, for there are and can be but few alternatives open to them. These alternatives are, the acceptance of the constitutional amendments, the creation of provisional governments, or the acknowledgment of the God-given right of all men to govern themselves according to the dictates of their own consciences, uncontrolled by any external influences whatever. Either one of these is eminently just. Indeed, if a preference is to be given on the score of justice, it is to that one which is founded on the principles which are the corner-stone of our political edifice. That edifice was erected by the people for the people and their posterity; not by a portion of the people for the benefit of themselves exclusively. Read every word of the Declaration of Independence, and every article of the Constitution, and you will find no distinction or reservation as to the application of the rights there secured to any portion of the people. And this was at a time even when nearly every State held a certain class of its people in bondage.

That fact was ignored to the extent that even when these people were no longer slaves in several of the States they became entitled to the suffrage; they were elevated in all respects, civil and political, to the status of the people among whom they resided. It was only when Judge Taney invented the dogma that by the universal consent and practice of the world at the time the Constitution was formed these persons had no rights that white men were bound to respect, that it was discovered, (because of the existence of slavery in several of the States and for the sake of its security,) it was necessary that these people should be declared citizens by a change in the organic act itself. But that change has been effected, and now there are no subjects in these United States. All are sovereigns, and entitled to sovereign rights. If this were not so, where is the article or articles in the Constitution which provides for the creation of sovereign rights in any person heretofore a subject? There is no such provision. And why? Simply because the Constitution recognizes every man born in the United States as already possessing the rights of sovereignty. There is, to be sure, a provision for naturalization; but that is wholly in the case of subjects or sovereigns of other nationalities. It has no application to our own people. Judge Taney in the Dred Scott decision says:

"The Constitution upon its adoption obviously took from the States all power by any subsequent legislation to introduce as a citizen into the political family of the United States any one, no matter where he was born or what might be his character or condition."

Now, then, if the States have no power to elevate any man to citizenship, and Congress has no power to do so except exclusively in the case of aliens, does it not follow that citizenship is the natural, inherent right of every man born on the soil, and that to deprive him of it would be, not only to violate his inherent rights of humanity, but to sap the foundations of the Government itself? Citizenship in the United States is a right, not a privilege. In monarchical or despotic countries it may be the latter, because the king or the emperor claims to rule by divine right, and thus to dispense laws by favor of his gracious will. But in this country all are sovereigns; all are supposed to be governed by laws founded on the principles of eternal justice. No man can give to another any right as by favor. No man can receive from another any privilege as by right.

The moment he does, the nature of the Government becomes perverted and the principles of the Constitution violated.

"In the extract above quoted, Judge Taney speaks of the 'political family of the United States.' Note, he does not say the civil family. It is the political family to which he alludes. His position would not be tenable in any other sense. Now, the question arises, what constitutes that family? The answer is, those born on the soil; those who are taxed for the support of the Government; those who are liable to be called upon to bear arms in its defense; in fine, those who, in every material, moral, and religious sense, are its constituent parts—the units of its aggregate manhood. Every man, then, who is not an alien and who thus refuses allegiance to the Government on the sole ground that he owes it to another, comes within the above category. To deny to him altogether, or to abridge his rights of citizenship, is to violate the Constitution of the United States in its most sacred and solemn characteristics.

"But," say the State-rights interpreters of the Constitution, "a State can make or unmake a citizen of the United States; can limit his rights, privileges, or immunities, or deny them altogether." I deny this assumption in toto. A State has no right to deprive a citizen of the United States of any rights he enjoys as such. On the contrary, it is expressly provided in the Constitution that the citizens of every State are entitled to the rights, privileges, and immunities of the citizens of all the States. Hear what Judge Taney says upon this important point in the decision from which I have heretofore quoted:

"And if persons of the African race are citizens of a State and of the United States they would be entitled to all those privileges and immunities in every State, and the State could not restrict them, for they would hold these privileges and immunities under the paramount authority of the Federal Government; and its courts would be bound to maintain and enforce them, the constitution and the laws of the State to the contrary notwithstanding. And if the States could limit or restrict them, or place the party in an inferior grade, this clause of the Constitution would be unmeaning, and could have no operation, and would give no rights to the citizen when in another State. He would have none but what the State itself chose to allow him."

Now, let us look at the Constitution itself. After reciting in the preamble that, "we, the people for ourselves and our posterity" enact certain provisions of law, the first article reads:

"The House of Representatives shall be elected by the people of the several States."

Let our strict constructionists ponder upon this. Can the question of suffrage be delegated to the several States in face of such a positive provision as this? But let us see who are the people of the United States. And here I must again refer my Democratic friends to the Dred Scott decision, in which Judge Taney says:

"The words 'people of the United States,' and 'citizens' are synonymous terms, and mean the same thing."

But I have already shown that a citizen is not made by Congress nor by the States, but is such by his own inherent right of manhood. I have also shown by the Dred Scott decision, and by the Constitution itself, that the citizen of each State cannot be deprived of any right, privilege, or immunity inhering in him in his capacity of citizen of the United States. How, then, can a State limit him in those rights, much less deprive him of them altogether? It can only be done by a misconception and misinterpretation of the organic act, superinduced by devotion to slavery and fostered by monarchical and despotic ideas and prejudices.

But some persons may answer that suffrage is not a right. If it is not a right, I ask what it is? I have shown that there are really no privileges in the United States; but, as if to cover the whole ground and deprive the opponents of the sovereign power of the central Government of all ability to cavil, Judge Taney declares not only that a State has no right to deprive a citizen of the United States of any rights inhering in him as such, but that it has no right to deprive him of any of the privileges or immunities of a citizen. What can be broader than this language? Does it not cover every ground? Does it not stamp in ineffaceable characters as treason to the Constitution any attempt of any State to deprive a single citizen of the United States of any rights, privileges, and immunities inhering in him as such.

The first article of the Constitution expressly says that the House of Representatives shall be elected by the people of the several States. Now, if a State can step in and say that one of the people within its jurisdiction shall not vote for members of the House of Representatives it has power to say that many or all of them shall not so vote; it has power to say that a citizen shall not vote unless he is worth $1,000 or $10,000; that he shall not vote unless he owns a certain quantity of real estate; that he shall not vote unless he owns a certain amount of railroad stock; that he shall not vote unless he can read or write; that he shall not vote unless he can speak French or Spanish or German; that he shall not vote unless he is a Protestant; that he shall not vote because he is a Jew or a Catholic; that he shall not vote because he is black; that he shall not vote because he is white; in fine that he shall not vote on account of any negative or positive characteristic it may be in the power of the State Legislature to enact to be a bar to the exercise of the franchise. How would such legislation comport with the first article of the Constitution? Would it not virtually nullify, if not expunge it from the organic act? Would it not place this House at the mercy of State Legislatures, who at any time might desire to limit its powers or to confine its jurisdiction to such legislation as the said Legislatures, and they alone, might deem to come within the scope of its authority?

But, on the other hand, what is the obvious meaning of the first article of the Constitution? Is it not that the House of Representatives shall be a body entirely independent of the State Legislatures, not deriving any authority from them, nor acknowledging any jurisdiction of them over either its acts or the rights of the people in selecting its members? Congress has no right itself to prescribe the qualifications of those whom it represents. The Constitution does this. Surely it is not the intent of the Constitution to cede away that right to Legislatures elected for mere local and State purposes; to foreign bodies having no authority over its deliberations, and even no right (except the right of enjoying in common with each individual citizen) to question its acts. I contend that State Legislatures have no right to limit the jurisdiction or scope of Congress. Who will contend that they have? But would not the power to limit its constituency or to obstruct it by laws depriving it of any rights enjoyed by that constituency have this effect? It most undoubtedly would. Consequently, admitting the right of the States to limit or virtually to annihilate our constituency, and we admit their right to wipe us out of existence or to narrow down our constituency to limits which would make us the representatives of a mere oligarchy or aristocracy—an oligarchy founded upon race or color, or an aristocracy founded upon wealth or intelligence.

Supposing one of our great railroad monopolies were to obtain control of one of the States, an entirely supposable case, could not its organic act be so altered as to prescribe qualifications for our constituents which would make it impossible to have the great mass of that particular State fairly represented on this floor? In the same manner, suppose other great corporations should combine in other States, and steal away the rights of the people, what would be the result? Why, that this body would be turned into an assembly not representing the people of the United States, but a comparatively few privileged persons, who would be able, for all time to come, to ride booted and spurred upon the backs of the late sovereign people. Is this the consummation that my Democratic friends so ardently desire to see brought about?

The truth is, every nation, every political family has a right in its organic act to fix the status of its component units in a free Government; indeed, this status is fixed by the irreversible laws of justice and right, and cannot be changed. It was regarded as so fixed by the framers of the Constitution. It would have continued to be so regarded by their posterity but for the pestilent heresy of State rights, through which it was sought to enslave a portion of the body-politic for the special benefit of another portion.

In what article of the Constitution is conceded the right of any particular State to limit or abridge the suffrage as respects the constituency of Congress, the people? In no one. On the contrary, the Constitution provides that that suffrage shall be placed on the very broadest basis; nor does it anywhere deny to Congress the right to regulate the manner of the expression of that suffrage within the bounds of the Constitution itself, of course, but totally regardless of the laws of the several States. The States are not represented here but the people; therefore it is to the people under the United States Constitution, not to the States under their constitutions, that we are responsible for our acts. What justice would there then be in handing over the control of the expression of the will of the people whom we here represent to State Legislatures which are created for altogether local and State purposes and necessarily limited in their jurisdiction and prescribed in their action? There would be none whatever. On the contrary, in so acting we would constitute our system of government an anomaly, leaving no foundation in reason or experience, and so obstructive of necessary legislation as to render it incapable of successful working.

I have shown that no State can restrict the rights, privileges, and immunities of a citizen of the United States. Suffrage, instead of being the least, is the most important of these; and why? Because it guards and protects all the rest. It is in fact the covering that overshadows like the wings of the angels of the covenant all other rights. Take it away, and in no despotic Government is a man so bereft of right as in that republic which thus deprives its citizens of the only means by which they can render their servants accountable for their actions. In fact such deprivation reduces the citizen to the necessity of taking up arms in order to reassert his manhood. Thus you prepare the way for revolution hereafter; and revolution which we ourselves have always justified in other nations, on the ground that the fact of their having no voice in their Governments gave them the right to resort to that ultima ratio of nations and men which has decided so many political contests, but not without an appalling loss of both blood and treasure. Indeed, the ground of our own revolution was that we were denied a voice in making our own laws; we were compelled to submit to taxation without representation. Can we compel peaceably on the part of others that which we resisted to the shedding of blood ourselves?

But some may say that it is dangerous to extend the suffrage to a race illy prepared to exercise it. Is not the foreigner who comes to our shores totally unacquainted with our manners and customs, our political and social characteristics, after a short probation admitted into full fellowship with the political family? Will my colleague, Mr. ROGERS, the leader of the Democratic side of the House, who is very ready to pronounce a particular race as unfit to exercise the rights of freemen, dare pronounce the same ban upon the foreigner? But this ability to exercise the suffrage on the part of this large class of persons must be looked upon in the light of expediency if we once drop down from the position of equal and exact justice to all men. And what will expediency teach us on the subject? Simply that though there may be great evils in extending the suffrage to the lately enslaved race there may be still greater in excluding them altogether and for all time from it. By so doing you raise up a class of persons alien and foreign to the Commonwealth; you create a governing and a governed class in the United States; you give the power of life and death to the former over the latter; you place the property and liberty of one man at the control of another; you create castes and distinctions in society; you raise up a class of tyrannical task-masters to reign over a mass of outcasts, and between both you place a gulf over which no man can pass. Think you that under such a condition of things republicanism would be possible? Think you that the evils of an extended suffrage would not be altogether less than the evils of a condition of society, for a parallel to which we must only look to misgoverned Ireland or to the oppressed and exhausted Provinces of the British empire of India?

Yes, gentlemen, suffrage is a delusion and a snare if it cannot be extended to every man created in the image and likeness of his Maker, then is our whole system of government an error of such gigantic proportions as to involve our country in ruin and destruction. For good or evil we are committed to the doctrine of equal rights to all men. For good or evil we are bound to follow it to its legitimate conclusions. Where it may lead us no human eye may be able to see, but where the opposite principle would ultimately leave us, a stranded and hopeless wreck upon the shores of time, any ordinary mind can foresee. But we know that while following the lead of universal suffrage we are carrying out the principles of justice and humanity, which are the eternal verities of God himself; and where these point it is certainly more safe to presume is the path most likely to conduct us to unity, peace, and prosperity.

Some persons indeed favor universal suffrage, but couple it with a general amnesty. By this they propose to set off justice to a wronged and oppressed race against an act of unmerited mercy to their oppressors, who have been at the same time rebels against national authority. I am opposed to any such bartering of right for wrong; of justice for mistaken mercy. I look upon such a bargain as jeopardizing the safety of the nation, which has already cost such fearful sacrifices of life and treasure. Salus populi suprema est lex is my motto in this and every case relating to public affairs. And I religiously believe that the safety of the Republic requires that the leading spirits of the late rebellion should be deprived of the power, by simple exclusion from office, of again experimenting upon the life of the nation. At the South public sentiment more than at the North is created by the governing class. This arises from the absence of wide-spread educational facilities; from the fact that political discussions take the form rather of oral communications in mass-meetings than of printed arguments in the press. Consequently the leaders of the South always speak from their hearts to the hearts of the masses. In the North, on the other hand, the leaders more generally speak to the reason. Thus at the South, while the leaders have almost supreme at the North they have but a limited control over the masses, the effect of which is easily set aside by argument and discussion. To give these southern leaders, then, during the present generation another opportunity to "fire the southern heart" is a scheme to which I am unalterably opposed. And especially am I opposed to it when it is linked with a proposition to do that which the Constitution makes it peremptory on us to perform; that is, to render equal and exact justice to every member of the political family of these United States.

I have spoken in strong terms of the course of the Executive in the late political contest. I was for a long time loth to believe that he had really and for good or evil linked himself with the political enemies of his country. But the fact was forced upon me at length by repeated acts of usurpation on his part, which have called down upon his head the indignation of a deceived and outraged people. It is now evident that the Executive, almost immediately upon the death of the late lamented President, linked himself with that party which had all through the war, by every means short of actual aid in the field, allied itself with the enemies of the country. Upon his accession to his present place he and that party inaugurated a plan of restoration designed to bring back the rebels to power, and when thus brought back in alliance with the Democracy they were again to rule the country in the interests of the South and its institutions. The doctrine of State rights was once more to become the ruling policy of the country. The States were to be restored to that commanding position which made them the arbiters of the fate of the General Government; rebel debts were to be acknowledged; rebel claims were to be paid.

It is patent to all that Mr. Johnson lent himself to all the schemes of the most violent partisan Democratic and rebel politicians. They loudly boasted that he was with them, and that what he did to-day was but a foretaste of what he would do to-morrow when the public mind had been properly prepared for some new outrage or usurpation. Instead of allying himself with Union men in Congress, he consorted and counseled with rebels, traitors, and bitter partisan Democrats. Every act of his administration has been inspired by the counsels of such persons. Every attack upon the Government was applauded by their claquers. In fine, if the late president of the so-called confederacy had been in the Executive chair, he could not more zealously have espoused the cause of his late associates than has Mr. Johnson. The only difference would be that he would have carried on his crusade against the people of the North with more tact and discretion because of his greater ability, superior educational advantages, and more extensive acquaintance with the courtesies and amenities of civilized life.

No wonder that the public clamor for his impeachment when they reflect on the long list of offenses he has committed against the party and the principles which placed him in power. What are a few of these offenses?

We find him immediately upon entering upon the duties of his office, without consultation with the law-making power, legislating for the southern States in the most autocratic manner.

We find him assuming powers which Congress only can exercise.

We find him laying down laws for whole sections of the country; in fact, making and unmaking statutes for the people of the United States.

We find him assuming to decide who are and who are not citizens of the United States.

We find him excluding loyal men from the right of suffrage.

We find him authorizing unpardoned rebels to exercise the same right.

We find him thus handing over the rebel States to disloyal men, and putting the loyal under their tyrannical sway.

We find him thus elevating rebels who had fought to destroy the Union, and putting down loyal men who had fought to preserve it.

We find him appointing men governors of States whose hands were yet red with the blood of slaughtered Union citizens and soldiers.

We find him letting loose the rebel bloodhounds in New Orleans upon a legal and peaceable assembly of loyal men. The result was a massacre such as froze the heart of the North with horror and dismay, and caused every loyal southern heart to utterly despair of his country.

We find him afterward shaking the bloody hands of those murderers in the reception-room of the Presidential Mansion, while he complimented them upon the manner in which they had executed his programme for wiping out loyalty at the South.

We find him denouncing this body as an usurpation.

We find him not satisfied with exciting the passions of the mob against the lawful authority of Congress through the press by the fulminations of himself and satellites, but descending to the arena of stump oratory in this and other cities, and delivering harangues calculated not only to excite a breach of the peace, but a revolution of the Government itself.

We find him, on pretense of laying the corner-stone of a monument to a deceased statesman, repeating those harangues at every point on his route, the only object of which was to bring the Congress of the United States into contempt and derision.

Such a catalogue of high crimes and misdemeanors was never before presented against any executive officer in the whole range of history as can be presented by the present Congress against Andrew Johnson, President of these United States.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, let me again impress upon the House the importance of the questions decided in the late political contest. They cannot, indeed, be overrated. But that one which is really the most important of all, and which includes all the others in the scope and bearing of its almost measureless influences, is that once and forever the United States is a nation, not a simple confederacy of States. From that day the country takes a new departure in its progress toward its final destiny. From that day it stands forth a nation in the family of nations, and has a mission to fulfill which was impossible before the war.

Why, sir, who cannot see that the American continent was created to be the abode of one people, and that the artificial incidents of its settlement by its present inhabitants intensify and make more self-evident the original destiny of the country. There are on the North American continent no great national barriers between the different parts of the country. The only really gigantic barrier, the Rocky mountain chain, running north and south, is easily pierced by the artificial highways essential to modern civilization. In a few short years the whistle of the locomotive will wake the echoes of its snow-capped peaks, and the Atlantic and Pacific will be indissolubly united by those iron bands which will be as hooks of steel binding East and West in eternal amity. The slopes of the continent, from north to south and from west to east, are gradual and almost unbroken. Its rivers are navigable for great distances inward. Its productions—mineral, vegetable, and animal—are almost similar in character and species, save the natural characteristic features created by isothermal distinctions, which are, however, gradual and not abrupt, as is the case in other continents. As to artificial causes that create and foster similarity, our people are of one language; and if there are varieties of race these latter are so blended and harmonized by contact and accretion that the marked features of distinction which characterize other quarters of the globe are in this, if not wholly absent, almost entirely erased.

In fine, while Europe presents the aspect of variety in unity, both as regards natural and artificial features, America presents the aspect of unity with little variety. And this is one great reason that great revolutionary movements in politics, literature, and religion appear to sweep over the country from one end to the other with a resistless power and effect which are often even appalling by the very force and depth of their movement. Such a revolution was our late war and such the late political contest which succeeded it. Let us ponder upon their consequences and effects; but above all let us not forget that both settled the question of America's nationality in spite of the opposition of not only the rebels in the field and their sympathizers at the ballot-box, but of the President bringing to bear all the power and patronage of the Government to thwart the will of the people.

Mr. Speaker, it is a source of extreme mortification and regret that my congressional district cannot claim a full share of the honor achieved in the contest from which we have just emerged, but it must not be inferred that any portion of my Republican constituents have deserted their principles. The result was effected by a combination of influences mainly foreign to the great issue; by the aid of corporations and lavish expenditure of money, which it was impossible successfully to combat. The fullest force of the Federal Administration was turned against me; secret circulars containing unscrupulous misrepresentations of my acts and sentiments, supposititious extracts from a speech, not one word of which did I ever utter; garbled extracts from my public papers, a base and ungenerous appeal to the passions and prejudices of a large class of voters, by misrepresenting my motives and action in the discharge of a solemn and painful executive duty years gone by, were circulated without limit. In a district of uncertain political character, oftentimes Democratic, these and other less important causes, together with an unfounded confidence in our success, have conspired to deprive us of an additional Representative. But, whilst an individual has fallen, and his ripple will soon subside, our lofty and sacred principles are imperishable and will never fade away. It rejoices me to remember that I have been their early and earnest advocate, and I shall never cease to cherish and defend them.

MR. WENTWORTH. Mr. Chairman, a few days ago I offered a resolution calling upon the President for information in respect to the pardon of the Chicago conspirators, as they are generally called. I understand they have all been pardoned but one. I understand with reference to that one the usual course is being resorted to for the purpose of getting him pardoned, namely: first a number of quasi rebels, men too old to go to the war themselves, but who sent their sons and grandsons and therefore claim to be loyal, sign a petition. Then they get a leading clergyman, a bishop of some diocese perhaps, to sign the petition. Then they go to a few weak-backed Republicans and get their signatures, and finally take the usual course through the well-known claim agents or pardon brokers, male or female, in this city. But to give strength to their efforts in this case I hear that they have finally got the Legislature of Florida to pass a joint resolution asking for the pardon of the only remaining one of these Chicago conspirators.

No information from the President has come to this House touching this conspirator. Since I introduced the resolution on this subject I have received a letter from one of the most gallant colonels of all our Illinois regiments, which I will send to the Clerk to be read in order that the people of this country may know what class of persons they are who are seeking and getting pardons from the President.

The Clerk read as follows:

OTTAWA, December 20, 1866.

SIR: I have just read in the papers your remarks respecting the application of Florida for the restoration of Grenfel from the Dry Tortugas.

I had the misfortune to fall into the hands of this infamous rebel as a prisoner of war when he was the adjutant general of John Morgan's brigades.

He is in my opinion one of the very worst men that lives on the face of the earth, and was known as a robber and murderer and the most conspicuous guerilla in all the rebellion. He should have been hung. Never allow him to be released; keep him on the Tortugas until he rots, is my desire for the scourge of the land.

Yours very truly,
A. B. MOORE,
Late Colonel One Hundred and Fourth Illinois Infantry.

Hon. JOHN WENTWORTH, Member of Congress.

That, sir, is the way the mass of our soldiers feel respecting these men, and soldiers generally talk as they feel. Whether this man has been pardoned I cannot say, but this we do know: that men as bad as he is (and there can be none worse) have been pardoned.

Under the late decision of the Supreme Court I understand that all such criminals are to be liberated by writ of habeas corpus. I have read both the majority and minority opinions of the court, and I find that for the most part they are both based upon the law of 1863. I have been looking over the law more particularly this morning and I cannot well see how respectable lawyers can attack that decision of the Supreme Court after having read this law. I refer to the points where both the majority and minority agree. I do not see how they could have done any less than give that decision under that law. In view of that fact, I introduced a resolution yesterday calling upon the Judiciary Committee of this House to report whether any measure was necessary to retain the assassins of President Lincoln and the conspirators who attempted to burn the city of Chicago where they are and where they belong.

Now, let me state the facts in the Chicago case. This man Grenfel was an Englishman. Fighting and robbing seemed to be his profession. He was sent out by the Jefferson-Davis government to liberate the prisoners at Camp Douglas and afterward to burn the city. Had he succeeded, there is every probability that the Davis government would have employed him as one of the assassins of Mr. Lincoln.

Now, this conspiracy was not discovered until the night but one before the election. At that time, of course, the most of the male citizens were engaged in matters incident to the election. The intention was to commence their work on Monday night preceding the election. On Sunday night all these men were arrested. What chance for civil tribunals then? Many of them were citizens of our own State. In regard to others who escaped before arrest we do not know what States they were citizens of. Now, under the decision of the Supreme Court, based unanimously upon the law of 1863, all those who were citizens of a State where the processes of the courts were not interrupted were liable to be tried only by civil tribunals. In that view of the case it was only necessary to employ citizens of free States (and God knows we have in the loyal States as many rebels as can be found in the southern States) to do their fiendish work, and the military tribunals were estopped from trying them.

In view of these facts, I shall on the earliest occasion introduce a bill and have it referred to the Committee on the Judiciary to repeal the law of 1863; and I hope when it shall be so referred that the able lawyers on that committee will sift the good (if there is any) from the bad in that law, and report back something to this House that will keep the assassins of the President, Chicago conspirators, and all others equally base where they belong.

I know nothing about the passage of this law (as I was not then in Congress) and especially do I know nothing of the causes that led to the limitations that are placed in it making one provision for traitors, conspirators, and assassins in some States, and another for those in others; and I make these remarks on this occasion expressly to call the attention of the many soldiers and able lawyers of this House to it, and also that the public may place the responsibility of the origin of this law, upon the effect of which the opinion of the court is unanimous, where it properly belongs.

MR. GRINNELL. Mr. Chairman, the President of the United States did not in his late message commend the proposed constitutional amendments to the rebel States, nor did he promise that on their adoption they should have a representation in Congress. Such a pledge would have been made without authority, and have been an untrue reflection of the spirit of the radical governing power of this country.

Congress is committed to the amendments as proper—a first installment—but has made no promise that being complied with the millions late in arms against the Government shall be permitted to take their place in the family again. Prudence and statesmanship will ask what is the spirit and the sentiment, what the local laws, of the people we would endow with political rights and equal privileges. The newer States of the Northwest gave their hundred thousand majority and returned an almost united Union delegation, not in pledge or concurring in the opinion that justice would restore States where a sordid motive only was presented in security for impartial justice. The returned soldiers and the people in great masses, in conventions, and at public discussions, declared that they who fought our battles and were our tried friends should never be left to the caprices and cruelties of their late rebel masters unprotected with a ballot.

I see before me the gentleman from Illinois, the Nestor of this House from the Northwest, who comes back here endorsed by a majority of near ten thousand, to whom I might safely appeal in corroboration of the understanding of our people.

MR. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. If the gentleman from Iowa refers to me, I will state frankly that I made no such pledge. On the other hand, I stood to the doctrine enunciated in the report which he holds in his hand. I hold it to yet, and if I had been in my seat—and I was detained from it by indisposition—when the vote was taken for the admission of Tennessee, I desire to state here that I should have voted with the minority; I should have voted as my friend would have voted if he had been here, against the admission.

MR. GRINNELL. That conforms entirely to the sentiment entertained by the State of Iowa, that gave 37,000 Union majority, where the loyal press seem to be unanimous as to our having made a bargain. Not one of them ever held that they were bound to receive these States upon the mere adoption of the constitutional amendment, and I am thankful to my friend for this testimony, and the report of this minority will stand as a permanent document as developing the truth in regard to this question. It demands as a condition the incorporation of impartial suffrage in the constitution of every State desiring admission.

The waves of public opinion, rolling higher day by day and week by week, proclaim it is no settlement. Millions of freedmen know that their civil rights cannot be assured without suffrage in States now ruled by the spirit of barbarism. Tried loyalists who fled for their lives, learned judges, ex-governors, and legislators, who have come back to their homes, from which they were driven by this war of traitors, now ask, "Shall it be said of the American people that, after fighting for four years at the sacrifice of hundreds of thousands of precious lives, they are now ready to surrender to conquered enemies who, having in vain tried to destroy the Constitution, now claim its protection?" They have "rebel State governments in each, rebel Legislatures, rebel parish officers, a rebel police, a rebel public sentiment, which sustains a rebel press, a rebel church, and a rebel bar, and swarms of ex-rebel soldiers ready, when the proper time arrives," to precipitate the southern States into another revolution.

The unwilling testimony of our enemies is proof of this. Their press publishes their shame of selling men into slavery. By the court records the late lords of the lash go unpunished for the murder of men struck down wearing the scars of the valiant sable soldiery, and even their Moses—"they wot not what has become of him"—who has changed his Israelites. discharges the criminal held for trial. In Texas, the remotest State, where thousands just freed died by violence the last year, General Sheridan testifies that "the trial of a white man for the murder of a freedman would be a farce." A nearer State illustrates the same spirit, where the light from the torch of the incendiary almost illumines the dome of this Capitol. It must be said by that Christian patriot, Judge Bond, in reply to the persecuted poor, "When we think that all the outrages of which you complain, and the burning of twelve churches and school-houses could take place, and all the pulpits remain as silent as if the millennium had dawned, it is marvelous." Not only refusing to provide schools for those whose fathers have cleared away their forests and reaped down their fields, they are intolerant of the purest beneficence of the teachers who come to the victims of slavery, delivered by the valor and blood of our soldiers, to brighten the future of the downcast and rescue them from ignorance and crime. They even doom to the cell and to wearing the ball and chain a devoted instructor on charge of vagrancy.

Small homesteads in numerous cases have been taken away from their happy occupants by the greed of pardoned rebels, and a border State, that availed itself of the military service of thirty thousand of the colored race, imposes a fine by law of five dollars, and takes from its owner his gun, though he bought it of the Government, and bore it during the war. That State, which is the adopted home of the now royal prisoner at Fortress Monroe, forbids, by statute, negroes from purchasing or leasing real-estate except in corporate cities and towns; and thus in various forms do the States fill up the measure of iniquity. That neither of the States have cheerfully modified their laws; that the murderers of the colored race by thousands go unpunished, and that the more than savage butcheries at Memphis and New Orleans attest the spirit of the people; what have we to do but to hear the call of God, that we now lay the foundations deep and strong, subjecting the conquered neither to banishment nor to execution, but to laws which are impartial, and their execution to our friends rather than to our enemies?

Happily for our country, the rebel States spurn the provisions of the constitutional amendment, which relieves the Government from an obligation to keep open the implied conditions, if ever made. It spares us the dangers which would attach to the return of rebels in spirit so early, and the shame of being a party to giving the rights of millions of a proscribed race into the keeping of traitors to their country with that motive only to enact impartial justice, which is found in a promised increase of political power.

Had their evil spirit been exorcised by a sense of their poverty, a consideration of their crimes and the clemency of the Government, the great party of freedom might have been divided in counsel and a restoration possible on a basis of white suffrage and rebel rule; but now, thanks to the Almighty Ruler, who causes the wrath of man to praise him, and who from the revelation of human passion brings the greatest deliverance, the way for radical methods is open and the duty of Congress made plain and the demand for action imperative.

Congress has not yet breathed political vitality into those States in rebellion. Their political chaos is as complete as their rebellious deeds were methodical and infernal. Brutality, chicanery, and a mysterious inspiration drawn from the dispensary of power, exalts treason and treads loyalty under foot, and the first duty of Congress, and one which can no longer be delayed, is to give an impartial, just, and constitutional government to the people lately in revolt. It is no mean or light work overturning these State bastilles "that not one stone shall be left upon another." It involves that reorganization spoken of by President Johnson "when the old leaders must be put aside and new men brought forward." It summons the spirit which inspired the martyred Lincoln at the cemetery of Gettysburg to counsel "that we here highly resolve that the dead shall not have died in vain; that the nation shall under God have a new birth of freedom, and that the government of the people by the people and for the people shall not perish from the earth."

Too long have we delayed in establishing governments for those leaders, the greatest of criminals, and for those who surrendered unconditionally as prisoners of war. Our now proposed leniency two years since would have been regarded with gratitude and astonishment. Now we are cautioned not to fire the southern heart, and the Constitution is cited as in the way of that just policy of reconstruction which every true patriot desires, and who but their timid confederates in crime and political associates will doubt the power of the Congress to protect its own citizens in the right of suffrage? Mr. Madison said:

"Should the people of any State by any means be deprived of the right of suffrage, it was judged proper that it should be remedied by the General Government."

We apply the remedy most proper by the testimony of Justice Story, who in his Commentary declares—

"That a perfect equality of rights, privileges, and rank was contemplated by the Constitution among all citizens."

In the opinion of the martyred Lincoln the laws and partialities growing out of slavery and caste were alien to the spirit of the Constitution; and it can be no secret that our present Chief Justice holds that those States which had disfranchised a majority of the people never had a republican form of government. We have then the highest authority for striking at the center of these aristocracies which have been the nurseries of treason, and are bound by every consideration of honor to see that there is meted out impartial justice, and full political rights are assured to our friends who now stand before us as the loyal but defenseless victims of the master spirits of the late rebellion. This is our opportunity. We are summoned to the work of "appropriate legislation" which was to enforce the emancipation proclamation and to make haste as we remember the late court decisions, and hear the supplications of imperiled friends, witnesses of the carnival of cruelty and blood in unconstructed States.

Nothing being more plainly decreed in the book of fate than that the bondman was to be free, is it less plain that having shown the patience of a philosopher, intelligent sympathy for our cause, and heroic devotion in the field, that he is to have the rights of a freeman and means for their protection? Dare we intrust this work to those who feel "since I have wronged you I have hated you?" Can we be a party to holding millions in a condition of serfdom while regarding the inference of our enemies that it is less safe to intrust a loyal black man with a ballot than a late disloyal white man? No, the cure for evils in southern society is not the whipping-post nor a remanding into partial slavery, but the going forth of the citizen with the responsibilities of a man, having a recognition by his Government, with the means for mental and moral improvement, and a ballot which both awakens respect and becomes a weapon of defense.

"Let us alone," they cry. That has been the criminal's supplication in all time. "Give us peace and guano," they ask. No, that is not their great want, but the humility which is one of the first evidences of sorrow for crime and the humanity which will raise up the lowly who have been the victims of their despotism. To become coequal members of our political family they must open their eyes upon the party wrecks, the strewn and broken timbers which tell of the ignorant conservatism of captain and pilot. Conservatism! That of to-day offers neither a retreat for the man nor a pledge for the growth and virtue of his party. The idolators of fossils who on all occasions and with prolonged speech shout Constitution are akin to that class described by the Virginian who declared unwittingly that when they said Union they meant nigger three times. They propose to save nothing good which is really endangered; and having intrusted their locomotion and progress to that very conservative steed, with eyes turned backward to his load and a facility for brithching labor rather than with the collar makes only such down-hill strides as are easy and convenient to that memorable abode of the chief conservatives of our time, the slough of despond. All compassionate generals sparing of ammunition, fearful of the temper of their sword; neutral States and political constitutional saviors have their day, and are to sleep with the Bourbons of all nations.

These lessons cannot be lost upon the radical governing power of the nation. Its mission is to reform, to preserve, evoking into being a freer, nobler life. Yielding a principle and refusing to demand impartial justice through fear it becomes occupied with sordid plans, disgusts the moralist, and dampens the ardor of the young and heroic whose service has been determined by the nature of our boldness, constancy, and trust in the Almighty Ruler. It is a party only worthy of success, as represented by the opposite of effete conservatism in the bold and poetic imagery of Job, who has in his war horse pictured the worthy leaders in a holy cause: "He paveth the valley and rejoiceth in his strength. He goeth on to meet the armed men. He mocketh at fear and is not affrighted, neither turneth he back from the sword. He saith among the trumpets Ha! ha! and he smelleth the battle afar off, the thunder of the captains, and the shouting."

Sir, we are acting in sublime concert with the peoples of the world now overturning the wrong and remodeling institutions as never before to insure popular rights. The plea and demand for suffrage has the charm of an inspiration and is in alliance with the power of Omnipotence. It gives that charmed eloquence to England's great reformer which sways multitudes like the forests bent by storms, and rocks the chief power of Europe to its base. The victorious arms of Prussia have enlarged the sympathies of her nobility, and the liberal ideas of King Frederick William have given universal suffrage to his Germanic dominions. Spain, in preparation for this boon, assures a free education. Alexander of Russia, more considerate than the late "patriarchal masters" of our Republic, builds school-houses for those born in slavery and gives them a homestead, and bold and timely action in behalf of our States will send cheer to millions in the Old World; while a deferring of impartial suffrage will leave our people of the boasted "free Republic" beneath the subjects of king or autocrat.

Our war, with the revulsion of parties and the exemplary conduct of those who are the wards of the nation, have brought us most unlooked-for collaborators, represented, as examples, by the Boston Post, that embodiment of hunkerism, which declares "that to give suffrage to the negroes on the same terms as is given to the whites is wise, just, and politic." The Chicago Times, in the past unequalled for fervor in a bad cause, if making no atonement at least evinces its sagacity in this language:

"Is not negro suffrage inevitable, and is not the quickest way to get the negro question out of the way at once to concede the suffrage, making issue only on the degree to which it shall be conceded? We know that many Democrats have not reached this advanced view of the case and that such still feel inclined to revolt at the proposition of negro suffrage in any degree; but let us tell them that it is always wise to accept the inevitable when the inevitable comes."

The Herald, deemed inveterate and more truly the indicator of the winds than the king thereof, steps from the ranks of the laggards in its old age to outstrip its juniors, asserting: "The question of negro suffrage, which entered largely into this debate, is one that forces itself so prominently upon public consideration as to have become a political necessity, and will have to be settled in favor of impartial male suffrage, restricted within certain limits of intelligence." Have these wails no significance to the timid? Will the party that has, amid the throes of civil war, become strong, heed the prejudices of ignorance, fearing its vinous inspiration, and dare to be unjust by neglect of those now imperiled, who, in great numbers, without the hope of promotion, went from under the lash and stole away from the slave-pen, or broke from the coffin-gang, to nurse our sick, pilot our armies, or take their place in the ranks of our brave soldiery? Then it will be denied the pleasure of gleaming from these fields "where the red rain makes the grass grow;" then the humble laborers who have made our majorities at the polls, remembering that the royal arms of Lilliput were an angel lifting a lame beggar from the earth, will retire in sadness and abjure your party creed. Those religious denominations, representing the conviction and zeal of millions, have, in their late annual gatherings, spoken with united voice for that comprehensive justice which no constitutional amendment now proposed will assure; and the conditions of their future cooperation must be our adherence to principle and the recognition of a God in our history.

Mr. Chairman, I do not despair of the adoption of a safe and radical policy. Our long marches and decisive battles have a parallel in mighty civic victories, which have a voice for the timid.

"Lowly faithful, banish fear,
Right onward drive unharm'd;
The port, well worth the cruise, is near,
And every wave is charmed."

That clemency of the conqueror to rebels, as shown by President and Congress, has brought out a timely development of the proud unsubdued spirit, which would dictate the terms of restoration. I regard it as related to a wonderful chain in God's providences. Our first Bull Run defeat, which menaced this capital, awakened the moral sense of the nation to its crimes, and pointed out our dangers and duties. It was preparatory to the warning proclamation of President Lincoln in September, 1862, which traitors in arms would not heed, and was followed by the loss of slavery, that for which they began the war. And now when they scorn the mildest terms of conciliation ever made to rebellious spirits, the question of rights and ballots for the long degraded and defenseless, need not be committed to the caprice or love of power reigning with the dominant class. Let history speak with her trumpet tongue from the graves of nations that consented to the degradation of its meanest subjects, and, if wise, we shall be warned by the fatal compromises made by our fathers; and, now about to shape the destinies of millions, shall not forget His paternal care of those who survived the slavery of Egypt, the perils of the sea, and wanderings in the wilderness, in giving them homes, protection from enemies, and wise and devoted friends.

I regard it as a delusion that representation here by the rebel States will strengthen or assimilate the nation. Congeniality of spirit is a prerequisite. Let the disloyal spirit just evinced at a fair held in this city be exorcised, where the ballots for the rebel General Lee were as six to one for our great captain, General Grant; let rebel airs no longer on festive occasions drown our national song; and if there be a loyal pulsation let it bring out the stars and stripes, so long overlain with the rattle-snake flag; unlock the cemetery gates closed against the sable patriots, who would strew the flowers of affection on the graves of their comrades; bid the Lone Star State desist in her demands for the removal of our dead from their graveyards, that the dust of "hiring soldiers" mingle not with that of her "noble and heroic dead;" make political preferment in city and county possible to a Unionist, and for the time penitents should detain their sons from the college lectures on moral philosophy by expirate Semmes,

—"the mildest mannered man
That ever scuttled ship or cut a human throat;"
and at least, when safe and convenient, arrest defiant murderers at large, that the cry "I am a loyal American citizen" be no more the signal for a visitation of cruelty if he be an American citizen of African descent.

Demons stood aghast at the cruelties unatoned for endured by our prisoners, and hell doubtless waits for the coming of those leaders in rebellion whom we seem to have no laws to punish. Strange that they should desire a return on any terms, and more strange our leniency, and that we have not met the expectations of the country and made impartial suffrage a condition. This withheld by the supplicants, my vote for their return will not be given. Never, never!

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. As no other gentleman desires to address the committee to-day, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. GARFIELD reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, having had under consideration the President's annual message, had come to the resolution thereon.

SOLDIERS' BOUNTY.

Mr. HILL, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill supplemental to an act entitled "An act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1867, and for other purposes."

The bill proposes to extend the bounty provided by the act of July 28, 1866, to soldiers discharged on account of disease contracted in the line of duty.

The bill was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I am aware that the House has made an understanding that there shall be no business done here to-morrow and nothing but speaking, but I am told that there is no gentleman who desires to speak to-morrow, and therefore there is no necessity for our holding a session.

The SPEAKER. If any gentleman desires to speak to-morrow he will manifest it. [Laughter.]

Mr. SPALDING. I desire to speak to-morrow if no one else does.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Then I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and thereupon (at two o'clock p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS.

The following petitions were presented under the rule, and referred to the appropriate committees:

By the SPEAKER: The petition of Dr. William Boyd, of Washington City, in regard to the sale of persons of color in Maryland.

By Mr. BUNDY: The petition of Hiram Campbell, and 31 others, citizens of Ironton, Lawrence county, Ohio, protesting against any further reduction of the national currency.

By Mr. COBB: The petition of citizens of Lancaster, Grant county, Wisconsin, that the currency question be let alone.

By Mr. HOLMES: The resolutions of Board of Trade of Oswego, New York.

Also, the petition of Charles T. Radcliff, for American register for schooner or brig New York.

By Mr. MOULTON: The petition of 100 citizens of Clay county, Illinois, praying for the impeachment of the President of the United States for his misdemeanor and malfeasance in office.

Also, the petition of sundry citizens of Cherokee county, Georgia, praying for an amendment to the Constitution of the United States so as to secure equality of rights among all citizens.

Also, the petition of sundry citizens of Christian county, Illinois, against the curtailment of the currency.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, January 5, 1867.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. B. BOXTON.

The Journal of yesterday was read.

CORRECTION OF THE JOURNAL.

Mr. HILL. I desire to correct the Journal. I introduced yesterday a joint resolution extending the provisions of section two of an act entitled "An act to extend the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims, and for other purposes." The Journal records that it was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. My motion was to refer it to the Committee on Military Affairs. I move that the Journal be so corrected.

The motion was agreed to.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. STEVENS. I rise to a privileged question. Mr. Blow, of Missouri, is detained from the House by sickness. I move that he be excused from attendance here indefinitely.

The motion was agreed to.

PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

Mr. NEWELL. I ask leave to offer a resolution.

The SPEAKER. No business can be transacted to-day. The Chair even doubted if a gentleman could be granted leave of absence. The House has determined that no business shall be in order to-day, except debate as in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the President's message, and upon that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SPALDING] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. SPALDING. When I suggested last evening the expediency of holding a session to-day, and intimated that I would like to speak, it was more for the purpose of affording an opportunity to those members of the House who had prepared themselves with speeches, in writing or in print, which they wish to pronounce, than to speak myself. I would now very cheerfully yield the floor to any gentleman of that character; but as I have not been able to discover any such present, I shall ask liberty to occupy the attention of the House for a few moments in making some remarks, perhaps of a rambling character, but such as shall not be inapt, in the consideration of the Executive message. But first, I desire to give attention for a moment to my respected friend from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] my only senior in this House, and a gentleman for whom I can entertain nothing but kind regard, and for whose opinions I most commonly have profound respect. But it so happens, unfortunately for me, that whenever I am called upon to make any remarks on this floor—and I do not do it often—I am subjected to the caustic criticism of the learned gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS.]

Now, sir, on the last day of the session of this House, before the adjournment over for the holidays, I undertook, in the most innocent manner, to explain my sentiments in respect to the validity of the State organizations in the lately rebellious States, and to show that injustice was done me in one or two of the journals of the day when they said that a resolution of inquiry, which I offered some weeks ago, signified that I supposed that the action of those Legislatures, or a portion of them, was necessary to the ratification of the proposed amendment to the Constitution of the United States. I called the attention of the House to an article found in the Washington Chronicle of the day before I spoke, in which the editor represented me as entertaining that opinion, and as running the proceedings of Congress into an absurdity if we were to ask these Legislatures to ratify the amendment to the Constitution, and then afterward seek to displace them and set up other governments in their stead.

Now, sir, in making my remarks on that occasion I expressly declared—and my friend [Mr. STEVENS] could not have heard me or else he would not have made this criticism upon me—I expressly declared that I never supposed that the amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which emanated from his committee, the joint committee on reconstruction, and which has been submitted to the Legislatures of the several States—I never supposed for a moment that it could receive any validity from the action of any one of those outstanding States. I said expressly that I believed the ratification of that amendment by three fourths of the loyal States was sufficient to make it a part of the Constitution of the United States. And in that I agreed exactly with the editor of the paper upon which I was then commenting.

Now, Mr. Speaker, my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] says—I read from the Globe of the next day:

"Mr. Speaker, had I got the floor at the time when the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SPALDING] sat down, I had intended, perhaps irregularly, to have said one word in regard to his position. I will only now say, however, that I think the argument of the editor is altogether the better of the two, and perfectly conclusive."

The editor and myself had run together; and at the same time "the argument of the editor is altogether the better of the two, and perfectly conclusive;" and the gentleman proceeds: "And that, while I do not charge the gentleman to be the author of it, the doctrine implied in his resolution is the most pernicious which can possibly be brought to obstruct the final reconstruction of this Government."

What! the doctrine contained in that resolution of inquiry the most pernicious that could be offered in this matter of reconstructing the Government? Why, sir, what was that resolution of inquiry? I will read it:

Resolved, That the Committee on reconstruction be requested to inquire into the expediency of passing a joint resolution declaratory of the purpose of Congress in the reception of Senators and Representatives from the rebellious States, respectively, upon the ratification by them of the constitutional amendment and the establishment of republican forms of government not inconsistent with the Constitution of the United States."

Now, sir, that resolution only calls upon the joint committee on reconstruction; if they deem it expedient, to offer for the consideration of Congress a joint resolution declaratory of the purpose of that amendment. I do not say what that purpose was; I do not undertake to say, in this resolution of inquiry, what that purpose was. I leave it for the committee who framed that amendment to tell us what they intended by it. Is there anything wrong in this? But I am impugned as the author of this resolution, and as being the author of a resolution pregnant with mischief. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] continues:

"But I am not going into the argument, as it might look out of place after the gentleman has left the floor. I have only thought it proper to say this much in favor of the argument of one who cannot appear here himself, and which I deem conclusive and entirely more satisfactory than that of the gentleman from Ohio."

Now, sir, the article from the Daily Morning Chronicle is set forth in the Daily Globe of the 21st of December last; and in that article there is nothing found, if I have read it and construed it correctly, but what I concurred in, and even went beyond, and expressed an opinion even more decisive than that expressed in the paper, that the ratification to be made by those rebellious Legislatures would signify nothing but their submission, and their disposition hereafter to be loyal to our Government; nothing more. And I said expressly that, even if this amendment was to be ratified and become a part of the Constitution, I should then exact from those States—those peoples, if you please, not calling them States—a republican form of government in all respects, before I would vote to receive their Representatives into this House.

I make these remarks, Mr. Speaker, as much to set myself right in the judgment of my friend from Pennsylvania as for any other purpose whatever—perhaps more so, for I think that when the gentleman reads the remarks in the paper and my explanation he will see that he did me injustice when he said I was at variance with the paper, and still further injustice when he said that my resolution looked to evil consequences.

My friend once made at me a good-humored fling when I happened to differ with him in regard to some one of his propositions by saying that "there was a vacant judgeship somewhere up in northern Ohio." Well, sir, I acknowledge the hit. But it so happens that I am not and have not been a candidate for that judgeship. Some twenty years ago I might have been pleased to occupy that honorable position if I had had the requisite ability; but under present circumstances I have no aspiration that way; none at all. But my friend will pardon me if I call to his attention a very eulogistic notice of himself in this very Chronicle in connection with a seat in the United States Senate, which is to become vacant in a short time. We will let one offset the other; and let it be understood that neither of us is under very much temptation in consequence of the offices which are presented to the public view as being those in which we are especially interested.

So much in all kindness toward my friend from Pennsylvania; and I hope that now we shall part fair friends and go on together, helping to do this great work of reconstructing this great Government which is intended for a great people and for a great time to come.

So far as regards the understanding had of the effect of this constitutional amendment by the people during the late canvass I have a word to say. In the first place, my individual understanding, when we voted with so much unanimity to put that amendment before the people for their ratification, was, that it was to be taken as a measure of conciliation, to some extent, between the loyal States and the disaffected or disloyal States, and that the latter should be admitted to representation in Congress when they should have signified their approbation of these amendments to the Constitution, and should have framed their State governments so as to pass the ordeal of Congress—not otherwise; for I here protest again that, since the rebellion opened, I have never seen the hour when I supposed these States had the right to a representation in the Senate or House of Representatives of the United States. And I say further, that no man can come to a logical conclusion on this subject unless, in claiming that those States now have the right to representation in Congress, he maintains that they had the right of representation during every hour of the war. We must meet this question openly and boldly. I say to you, sir, that from the moment when these rebellious States swung loose from the Congress and the Government of the United States, and unsheathed the sword of rebellion, and attempted to strike down the Constitution of our common country, from that moment they became severed from the law-making power of this Government, and cannot be restored except by the action of Congress. Of this I have no manner of doubt, and upon this subject I have never doubted.

I have already given my understanding in regard to the effect of the constitutional amendment when Congress adjourned last July. I say further, that the canvass or campaign in the State of Ohio was carried on upon the basis of the constitutional amendment alone, and I will state my warrant for saying so. The Republican State convention of Ohio adopted the constitutional amendment presented by Congress as the height and breadth and length and depth of their platform. They had not another line in their platform; the constitutional amendment was the whole of it. The Republican party went into the canvass upon the strength of that amendment, and in every district, in every county, in every township, we argued the merits of this constitutional amendment before the people, and upon it obtained their votes. I believe I represent upon this floor as radical a district as any one of my colleagues from Ohio, and I say to my colleagues and to the members of this House generally that in every speech I made in my district in the three counties composing it—and those speeches were not a few—I advocated this constitutional amendment in all its aspects, and uniformly declared to the people that when that amendment should become a part of the Constitution, and those refractory States should exhibit to us satisfactory republican forms of government, I should vote to receive their Representatives; and on this question I never yet heard a dissenting voice in my district.

The National Republican committee, if I am correctly informed, held forth to the country the fact that the great turning point of the readmission of these outstanding States was the adoption of this amendment to the Constitution. The State convention of New York declared the same thing, and their election took place on that hypothesis. So that I claim that those members of Congress who now say that the amendment to the Constitution, if adopted, settles nothing, are in this respect in error. It may not settle everything, but will go a great way toward pacification and reconstruction.

Again, sir, if the substitute for House bill No. 543, introduced by my learned friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] the other day, should obtain the assent of this House and of the other branch of Congress and become a law, as it may probably, I do not say to my friend now that I shall not vote for this proposition. I like many of its features well. I have not much to say against any part of it; but I say this: if this should be adopted and if those outstanding communities should be reconstructed upon this basis and this plan, even then I hold that this amendment to the Constitution of the United States ought by no means to have the "go by." We want the security of the guarantee contained in that amendment to the Constitution for all time to come, (no man can doubt that,) even if these States be reconstructed upon the plan submitted by the learned gentleman from Pennsylvania. Hence, I do most earnestly advise the loyal States, all of the loyal States that will do so, to adopt that amendment to the Constitution; and, as I said the other day, I would earnestly advise the Legislatures of the so-called States of the South to do the same thing, not because they make it a part of the Constitution by doing so, but because they express their own sense of the utility of the measure and their accordance in sentiment with it.

Mr. Speaker, I am satisfied that the opposition made in the southern States to this amendment to the Constitution arises mainly from the provision contained in the third section. I was informed not many days ago in the town of Petersburg, Virginia—where I went during the holidays to view some of the landmarks made conspicuous during the recent war—I was informed by some of the gentlemen residents there that they wanted this difficulty settled. I said to them, "Here is the constitutional amendment and you repudiate it." They replied, "If you can put that constitutional amendment in force without our aid then do it and we will submit to it. We do not so much complain of the provision itself as that we are called into action to vote on it as a part of the Constitution of the United States." Upon the hypothesis that their action on it only goes to show their submission to the terms we are trying to impose, they will permit the loyal States to make this a part of the Constitution of the United States by a three-fourths vote, and then come in and express their acceptance of it.

Mr. KELLEY. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment for a confirmation of what he has expressed?

Mr. SPALDING. Certainly.

Mr. KELLEY. I have letters from North and South Carolina, from very able lawyers, from men who served as soldiers and officers in the confederate army, arguing the view the gentleman from Ohio has so clearly expressed. They say as the result of the war: "We have lost; our States have lost: as individuals we have our rights. Our States were overthrown; as States alone could we act upon the constitutional amendment; but States we are not. We cannot adopt the constitutional amendment constitutionally; we could not sustain it personally in striking down our leaders for having participated in a common crime. You exercise your constitutional rights and adopt the amendment, and you will find no resistance to it in the South." In almost the language I have given, from strangers to each other, some in South Carolina and others in North Carolina, I have received these letters.

Mr. SPALDING. I do not know how extensively this sentiment may prevail in the late rebel States; I have no question that the sentiment does prevail to some considerable extent; but I would not claim that Congress should rest content upon any such assurance. We must have some tangible evidence that shall satisfy us that this work of reconstruction is perfect and enduring. If the amendment to the Constitution should be ratified, we then may require something from those States which have incurred so fearful a penalty at the hands of this Government by their long-continued rebellion. When we come to that subject—for I confess it is only a work of time with me—we will act upon it. My opinion is that, inasmuch as we have put this amendment to the Constitution before the people, and inasmuch as the people of these States have given it their approbation by their votes at the late elections, we ought to suffer a reasonable period of time to elapse before we adopt other ulterior and more violent measures.

Now what I would suggest very respectfully would be this: that we let the constitutional amendment be in the train of adoption where it now is, until perhaps the 4th of March next, when the Fortieth Congress will meet, and if at that time we find that this measure is repudiated by the southern States and flung back with contempt in our faces, then let the gentleman from Pennsylvania call up his reconstruction bill, and I will be one of the foremost to go with him in any practicable measure of reconstruction after the fashion which he indicates; and in doing that I should carry out the wishes of my constituents as well as consult my own feelings in the matter.

But I must be permitted to remark that we seem to have fallen on strange times. Heretofore independence of thought and action has been permitted in this honorable body on the part of its members; but now it seems as if every difference of opinion amounted to a desertion of the Republican ranks in the opinion of some. I am bold to say that it will take some time and no little trouble to get me out of the Republican ranks, for I was in at the inception of the Republican party, and was a Republican, in fact, long before. I left the State of Ohio a proudly dominant party in 1848, one which ruled in that State by 40,000 majority, and one in which I had served for twenty-five years. I left it, too, when I laid down the honors of the highest judicial office in the State, because I ventured to differ with the Democratic party of my State on the subject of the rendition of fugitive slaves. Soon after that the notorious fugitive slave law was enacted. From that time to the present I have, in all my votes and all my actions, contributed, so far as in me lay, to the downfall of slavery and all the despotic institutions of the country. That, sir, has become with me a habit, and I cannot readily abandon it.

But unfortunately we are misapplying just now the favorite term "radical." Why, sir, I have often been called at home "the great Radical of Ohio." And yet in this House I am to-day charged with being somewhat conservative. The gentleman from Pennsylvania told us the other day, I believe, that he had come here a conservative at the present session. Now, what is the meaning of this term "radicalism?" It certainly does not mean despotism. Does it mean anarchy? For in avoiding the one we may run into the other. Are we prepared at the sound of the bugle blast to run into the ground all the cherished institutions of this popular form of Government? Are we, without a moment's consideration, to be made to follow our great leader and throw into the condition of provinces or territories old Commonwealths which entered into the glorious constellation of the thirteen States that gave this Government birth?

Having this great subject upon our hands—the overthrow of these different State governments, which it would seem it might be enough for us to grapple with at one time—are we to be called forward again and rallied at the sound of the trumpet to charge with impeachment the Chief Executive officer of the Government? Are we to do this at once, without any time for reflection or consideration? Mr. Speaker, I do not question that the President of the United States has said and done a great many wrong things. I might perhaps say that some of them approach the "very verge" of what would form a ground of impeachment. I do not stand here for the purpose of applauding, much less excusing, in any degree, the conduct of the Chief Magistrate while he was traversing the country last summer, nor at any time since. But I do stand here, sir, to vindicate our popular institutions, our free institutions of government, against the rudeness of all these assaults at one and the same time.

I am not given to fear without a cause. I am commonly reckoned as reckless as the most reckless man; but my age is such that I must be permitted to listen rather to the counsels of reason than the impulses of passion: and I do say it will be wise in this House and in the other branch of Congress to proceed in these matters with some degree of caution.

Sometimes it is said, sir, that we should go into these matters with decision, with firmness, and without delay, because the perpetuity of our great party rests upon the adoption of radical measures. Sir, I have been a partisan long enough to know that extreme measures will not always promote the interests of a party. Suppose that we should in this House, at this moment, prefer articles of impeachment against the President of the United States, we have a measure pending at the same time to establish governments by the exercise of the elective franchise by all the freedmen of the South in those States. What will our people at home think of these rank and radical measures? We have not yet had their vote upon this subject. But, sir, if Congress be not content with exerting and exercising its constitutional powers, and passing laws by a two-third vote over the Executive veto; if we are not content to rest ourselves upon the exercise of this power, but at the same time seek violently to throw the President from his seat, and dispossess these so-called State governments of the South, what are we to expect from our constituents at home? Will not these matters react; and will not the President, by and by, beget a sympathy with the masses, which may do far more toward throwing the great Union party at the next election out of power than anything else? I only throw out this suggestion for the consideration of my friends—those who have far more interest in this subject than I possibly can have.

Again, sir, there is the test of radicalism held out to us upon the subject of revenue or tariff upon foreign importations, and upon the subject of the currency. It would seem that no man can come fully up in these days to the standard of radicalism unless he be prepared to put a tariff upon foreign goods that shall amount to prohibition, and to open and extend the paper circulation of the country without any limitation. That I understand to be radicalism in the State of Pennsylvania. While I advocate a reasonable tariff to protect our own industry at home, I am not prepared to denounce every officer of the Government who says that we must still derive a portion of our revenue from duties on imports. While I would disapprove any curtailment of the currency so as injuriously to affect the legitimate business interests of the country, I am with the Secretary of the Treasury when he says that we should gradually feel our way to specie payment.

Mr. KELLEY. Does the gentleman think that an assurance to the world that we can resume specie payment in less than two years is a proposition to do it gradually?

Mr. SPALDING. It occurs to me that that would be a proposition to do it within two years, and if that is not gradual enough for the gentleman why of course it is not gradual.

Mr. KELLEY. I simply asked the gentleman the question.

Mr. SPALDING. I do not profess to believe that this measure can be brought about in two years. I did not claim that. I only claimed that an officer of the Government, who I believe is endeavoring faithfully to discharge his duty as the principal financier of this Government, should not be subjected to the tar-bucket and the brush whenever he recommends any policy to this House. That is all, sir.

I do believe, barring his political opinions in respect to this work of reconstruction, that the present head of the Treasury Department, in connection with Alexander Hamilton and Salmon P. Chase, will be read in history as the great financial officers of America. Now, I say this boldly: I was ready to say that he was the proper man for the place when Mr. Lincoln appointed him to it. I believed then that Mr. Lincoln was appointing a capable business man, not a politician, to a business situation, and my experience with his administration of the revenue since that time has served to confirm my judgment in this particular.

Now, sir, I do not agree with him in his proposition for reconstruction. I do not agree with the Secretary of the Navy where he alludes to the same subject in his report. I do not agree with any of them, the President or any of his Cabinet; I have said so most distinctly. But setting those political opinions aside, I say those department officers are discharging their duty with high integrity; and, instead of being censured in the House of Representatives, they ought to be commended.

Mr. Speaker, I have occupied much more time than I expected to do when I took the floor this morning. My remarks were expected to be discursive; I have made such as occurred to me; I have made them in a spirit of frankness and candor, and I shall adhere to them with just as much tenacity as ever characterized Ulysses S. Grant when he undertook the siege of Vicksburg. Sir, I have done.

Mr. BUNDY obtained the floor, but yielded to

Mr. STEVENS, who said: Mr. Speaker, I do not rise to make any lengthy reply to the distinguished gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SPALDING.] Certainly I shall enter into no personal controversy with him, for I have no feeling which would induce me to raise a personal issue with him. But when any gentleman advances doctrines here, I feel that those doctrines are public property, to be dealt with by each of us according to our sense of their soundness and worth, and that their condemnation ought to be in no way offensive to those gentlemen whose doctrines are thus condemned. They use the same privilege in regard to others. Hence I wish to say to the gentleman from Ohio that I had no idea that my condemnation of some of his views was in any way a personal matter, or that it could be made personally offensive. If I had supposed so, I should have forborne those remarks. It is my desire here, while I deal boldly and fearlessly with principles, to deal fairly and justly with all individuals of this House of all parties. So much with regard to the animus of my remarks, which the gentleman appears to have misunderstood.

Now, going back upon the ground-work of those remarks, which was the resolution introduced by him some weeks ago, and which he has read to the House this morning, listening to his resolution from this point and to his attack upon the editor of the Washington Chronicle for what he had said with regard to the purport of that resolution, I could not help thinking that the gentleman's views differed from mine. He may be right, but I gave it as my opinion that his views were wrong and mischievous. I hold the same doctrine to-day.

Now, sir, what I meant by that was this: that resolution was the entering wedge into this House of the idea, the sanction of the idea, that when the proposed amendment to the Constitution of the United States should be adopted the States now in rebellion were to be admitted to their representation in this House. I knew that that doctrine had been assumed in some of the States, and had been enunciated in their platforms. I knew it had been argued, not only in the district of the gentleman, [Mr. SPALDING,] but in other districts in Ohio, and the people there had been taught the doctrine that the constitutional amendment which we had proposed was the final action of Congress in regard to the admission of those States. In my judgment, a more pernicious heresy never was promulgated anywhere or by any party; and it left us open, if it were once adopted, to the influx from the South of all the unreconstructed rebels that choose to come here. I agree with the gentleman that when three-fourths of the loyal States shall have ratified that amendment—and I suppose all on this side of the House agree with me—it will become a part of the Constitution of the United States. Then, it being a part of the Constitution, according to the doctrine to which I have referred, what is there for the southern States to do but to send their Representatives to this Hall? If that was the final action of Congress before we admitted the rebels into this Hall, whenever, in a few days the northern States, the States that proposed the amendment, shall by a three-fourths vote have ratified it, then, if the doctrine to which I have referred shall prevail, there is no earthly power in this House to keep them out.

Now, I put it to this House and to the country if that would not be the most pernicious—"pernicious" is the word I used in regard to the gentleman's resolution—if that would not be the most pernicious doctrine, the most pernicious action that any rebel sympathizer could propose to this body? I did not misunderstand entirely the resolution of the gentleman, and I do not now. As I read it—not perhaps as the gentleman understands it—it is a soft invitation, a feeling-the-way to the very thing which I have just now stated. What was the resolution?

"Resolved, That the committee on reconstruction be requested to inquire into the expediency of passing a joint resolution declaratory of the purpose of Congress in the reception of Senators and Representatives from the rebellious States, respectively, upon the ratification by them of the constitutional amendment and the establishment of republican forms of government not inconsistent with the Constitution of the United States."

Now, sir, I think I saw this tadpole before it had its present shape. I think its present form is due in some measure to the gentleman's colleague, [Mr. BINGHAM,] at whose suggestion, I am inclined to believe, it was modified. In its present form the resolution looks a little better, but it really means nothing different. Why instruct the committee to inquire into the propriety of adopting a joint resolution providing for the admission of the Representatives and Senators from those States as soon as the amendment is adopted if it was not intended as a broad insinuation that such a resolution should be passed, and that the southern rebels should be admitted on the adoption of the amendment? If that was not the purpose, why was the proposition offered?

But the gentleman complained of the editor of the Chronicle, for it was in answer to an article of the editor that the gentleman made his remarks. He said that the editor charged him with inconsistency. The language of the resolution contemplates "the reception of Senators and Representatives from the rebellious States respectively upon the ratification by them of the constitutional amendment," distinctly inviting and legalizing the action of those States upon the constitutional amendment. Could anything more effectually stultify this body? The gentleman did not intend to stultify us; but he would have done it undoubtedly. We have been fighting upon the ground that there are ten outlawed rebel communities—

Mr. SPALDING. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. STEVENS. Yes, sir.

Mr. SPALDING. Will the gentleman have the goodness to say whether, in his judgment, the adoption of the constitutional amendment has any bearing whatever on the reconstruction of those States?

Mr. STEVENS. Not the least, except so far as it provides that when we find those States fit for admission they shall not overwhelm us by a representation based upon the negroes who are not voters. That, in my judgment, is the vital feature of the constitutional amendment. It contains other wholesome provisions, but its great virtue is, that it cuts down the representation of those States; takes away their power to overrule us when they shall have formed proper constitutions and shall be deemed fit for admission to representation. The idea that the constitutional amendment contains anything contemplating its submission to the action of the southern States is altogether idle. It need not go there. If we once adopt it and they choose to come in, why ask them to ratify it? They come in as any other State would come in, under the Constitution as amended, and they are bound by it, whether they ever choose to ratify it or not. To ask them to vote upon it would be stultifying ourselves, as the editor of the Chronicle has justly said, for it would be treating them as States, and asking them to take State action upon what Congress has sent forth for the action of the loyal States. After doing this, how could we say to the Executive, "Why, sir, you are wrong; these are no States?" "What?" that astute gentleman would reply, "not States? You have sent to them an invitation to ratify this amendment to the Constitution. Not States? What are they? Are they disorganized communities, lying about, as you pretend? Why, you have solemnly asked them to unite with every loyal State in an action which none but States can take." Will the gentleman tell me whether by placing ourselves in that posture we should not stultify ourselves?

Mr. SPALDING. It may be so; but I will ask the gentleman whether his bill does not contemplate recognizing for certain purposes these very organizations in those States.

Mr. STEVENS. By act of Congress.

Mr. SPALDING. Exactly so.

Mr. STEVENS. We do not propose to recognize the present organizations as valid. We propose to regulate them; we do not propose to ask them to regulate anything. We propose to say to those communities: "You have no governments; we repudiate all your pretended governments. Go on and form such governments as Congress has ordered you to form." That is what we propose to do. When we shall have recognized those governments for municipal purposes the gentleman will be right in saying that for such purposes they are States. But the gentleman proposes to do this in advance. He would have them act now as States under their bastard reconstruction, and do that which none but States can do. I must beg leave to say, sir, as I have said before, first, the proposition was the most pernicious that could possibly be made by this body, and secondly, it stultified the House, and hence the editor was right.

Mr. SPALDING. I beg leave to ask the gentleman one question.

Mr. STEVENS. Certainly.

Mr. SPALDING. I ask whether he concurred in the majority report of the committee on reconstruction submitting this amendment for the approval of the House? I would also like to know whether he voted for the admission of Tennessee.

Mr. STEVENS. Yes, sir, I voted for the admission of Tennessee without regard to the amendment sent forth, which was no amendment then. Tennessee had formed a constitution and submitted it to her people, and they had ratified it; the only rebel State that had done so. On full examination of that constitution, my colleague here knows, and all the laws passed under it, the committee came to the conclusion it was a republican State, and we could safely admit it. Her adoption of the constitutional amendment before the act of admission was a matter of no importance; not the least in the world.

Mr. NIBLACK. I wish to inquire of the gentleman from Pennsylvania whether the joint resolution admitting the State of Tennessee to representation in the two Houses of Congress did not place it upon the ground the State had adopted the constitutional amendment, and whether Congress did not sanction that view in that act, and that to adopt the constitutional amendment would entitle any of the rebel States to admission?

Mr. STEVENS. The preamble to the joint resolution admitting the State of Tennessee recited many of her good acts, and among the rest, as an inducement to admit her and as evidence of her loyalty, that she had just adopted the amendment to the Constitution; but nobody ever thought of giving a vote on that ground. No one thought of voting for it because she had done it; but it was one of the evidences of her loyalty.

Mr. NIBLACK. I beg to ask the gentleman whether Congress in that matter did not stultify itself according to the view he has promulgated?

Mr. STEVENS. Congress did not submit it to Tennessee at all. Tennessee did it before Congress passed the joint resolution. It was the voluntary act of the State of Tennessee, incited thereto by the impetuous young gentleman who is the Governor of that State. [Laughter.] It was sent here and was incorporated as one of her good things to palliate the great many foolish things she had done. That is the whole of that.

Mr. NIBLACK. The gentleman will pardon me. My recollection is that it was transmitted to the Governor of the State of Tennessee, who called a special session of the Legislature, and that Congress waited with breathless anxiety to hear of the result; and when we received word by telegraph that Tennessee had adopted the constitutional amendment, Congress made haste to admit Tennessee on that ground. It is part of the history of the country. Such is my recollection, and I think gentlemen will agree with me.

Mr. STEVENS. I have not that recollection, but I do not undertake to contradict the gentleman from Indiana when I do not recollect. All I have to say is, that we recognized Tennessee as a State; the committee recognized Tennessee as a State; we agreed she had done all in forming her constitution which a State was required to do. The gentleman's fact, therefore, has no pertinency.

I may as well say to the gentleman that he knows we took the ground that these disloyal States are not State organizations known to us, but are captive provinces, and have in their capitals certain municipal institutions for the purpose of going on from day to day, which we do not propose yet to disturb, but which are referred to in my enabling acts.

Now, sir, I have answered the gentleman's personal point. I have nothing personal to say in the matter; I say personal point; I mean the question referred to in his personal explanation. I do not wish, and I hope he does not so understand I wish, to interfere with his prospects; I do not know what they are; I would not do it if I could. Three or four of his colleagues were as bad upon the stump as he was.

Mr. MAYNARD. Will the gentleman allow me, as the admission of Tennessee has been referred to at this stage of the discussion, to ask if States which were in rebellion were to do the things which Tennessee has done, and which are recited in the preamble to the joint resolution by which Tennessee was restored to her privileges in the Union, namely: providing by law to secure her freedmen in the enjoyment of their civil rights; providing by law for the prevention of the return of the rebel element to power in the State; and, in the manner designated here, proving its loyalty to the Government and the loyalty of the people whom that Government represents, whether the gentleman or any other gentleman would not take such action in the case of that State as in the case of the State of Tennessee? I speak of no one particular act, but acts denoting all that I have intimated; that is, the repression of the rebellion in the persons of its votaries, the protection of the freedmen, and a government of loyal men representing a loyal constituency.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. Speaker, it is not expected that the rebel States will be kept out forever, although they seem to be getting worse and worse—further and further off every day; and I do not know when they will get to the end of this long lane that has no turning. When these States form constitutions—I believe that of Tennessee was submitted to the people—

Mr. MAYNARD. Yes, sir.

Mr. STEVENS. When they form constitutions and present them here, and the Congress of the United States shall believe them to be republican in form and founded upon principles of justice, I presume Congress will be very glad to admit them to representation. I will say, however, here and now, that I shall never vote for the admission of another State containing one of the provisions of the Tennessee State government. The gentleman, I suppose, knows what that is.

Mr. MAYNARD. I confess I do not. [Laughter.]

Mr. STEVENS. Why, the exclusion of negro suffrage.

Mr. MAYNARD. Well, sir, I will say in regard to Tennessee that, so far as her treatment of the black portion of her population and of the late rebel population is concerned, she has been entirely impartial; that is to say, she gives to the freedmen and to the late rebels alike the enjoyment of all civil rights, and denies them only the right to vote, to hold office, and to serve on juries. The probability is, however, that she will very soon adopt the principle that this Congress has already adopted in reference to this District—not of universal suffrage, not of negro suffrage, not of impartial suffrage, but of loyal suffrage, giving the right to vote to all who have shown their loyalty to this Government, irrespective of race or color.

Mr. STEVENS. That is the part of the constitution of Tennessee which I shut my eyes to at the time the vote was taken, (I do not know whether my friend from Tennessee shut his,) the idea that a loyal negro is to be put on the same footing with a rebel. [Laughter.] It is an outrage in the constitution of Tennessee.

Mr. MAYNARD. Will the gentleman permit me to say that Tennessee has done a great deal more for the negro than is done in a large portion of the United States, where he is not elevated to the same plane that the rebel is permitted to occupy. Even in the gentleman's own State a rebel from my portion of the country, should he go there, would find the door of political fellowship open to him. Whether they would welcome a loyal negro or not perhaps the gentleman can tell us. [Laughter.]

Mr. STEVENS. The gentleman is right. Pennsylvania ought to blush, and many others of the free States ought to blush, for the infamous exclusion to which the gentleman refers. But will our blushes whiten the countenance of Tennessee? [Great laughter.]

Mr. MAYNARD. No; but perhaps the suffrage may be a little less obvious. [Laughter.]

Mr. STEVENS. I have nothing to say against Tennessee. I feel kind toward her. All I mean to say is, that I do not expect to vote for the admission of any other State upon precisely the same conditions as those upon which Tennessee came in.

Mr. MAYNARD. Tennessee reciprocates the sentiment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania; she feels kindly toward him, and regrets that he did not find it convenient to become one of the party on a recent occasion to spend the holidays in that part of the country. [Laughter.]

Mr. STEVENS. Well, sir, I had made no preparation for a burial down there, [great laughter,] so I thought I would stay at home until I got ready, or at least until the winter was over and the ground broken. [Laughter.]

Mr. Speaker, aside from this episode, which is a very pleasant one, I was going on to say a few words by way of reparation, perhaps, for the feelings of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SPALDING,] who thinks, unnecessarily as I suppose, that I have said something harsh about him. I admit that he has made the ablest and the handsomest defense of Andrew Johnson and his administration that I have heard for the last two years. I trust the members on the other side of the House will forgive me for placing them in the shade in comparison with the grand eulogy which has been delivered upon Andrew Johnson, his doings and his Cabinet, by the gentleman from Ohio. [Laughter.] Why, sir, I understand the gentleman to be perfectly satisfied with not only this exalted President, but particularly with everything done by the Secretary of the Treasury. Did he remove your collector? [Laughter.] Well, I do not know whether he did or not.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. He removed mine.

Mr. WENTWORTH. And mine.

Mr. STEVENS. I do not think he removed the gentleman's collector.

Mr. SPALDING. He did.

Mr. STEVENS. Then you got him back?

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. He was put out at the request of the gentleman.

Mr. STEVENS. My friend says that he was put out at the request of the gentleman. I do not give it as my own statement.

Mr. SPALDING. So I see. I know where it comes from.

Mr. STEVENS. When my friends were slaughtered I did not feel grateful. When the Secretary of the Treasury, for no cause on earth but the building up of a new party and the promotion of a new political organization, turned out of office the best men in my district I did not feel toward him as the gentleman does. That only shows how much more of a Christian the gentleman is than I am, and I give him credit for it.

But the gentleman is afraid of "radicals." Well, who does he mean by radicals? He said he was a radical himself. Well, sir, "radical" means anything: root! Sometimes the root goes down about half an inch and sometimes a foot. How deep the gentleman's root goes I do not know. [Laughter.]

Mr. SPALDING. The less he and I say about roots the better for both. [Laughter.]

Mr. STEVENS. We should say nothing about little roots. [Laughter.]

Mr. Speaker, the gentleman is afraid that there will be an assault rashly made upon the President in this House; that there are threats to impeach him without examination, without deliberation, and indiscreetly. Now the gentleman had no right, in answer to me, to make any remark of that kind. I have said and done nothing in the House which looked to impeachment, and the only thing, perhaps, that I have to reproach myself with is, that the gentleman has held me back so long. Nothing has been done to enable us to administer this Government in its purity, and it never can be administered so as to protect the liberties of this nation until there is a different—I dare not say it, sir; it might be supposed that I am in favor of impeaching the President—I mean, sir, until the presidential term is up, (that is all,) and he thereby becomes removed, for he is an obstruction to all loyal action, and he is an eye-sore to all loyal men except the gentleman from Ohio.

The gentleman will excuse me for noticing his remarks in respect to the Administration, which I do in no censorious spirit, but merely to express my dissent in a very faint way, and more particularly to fix the attention of the Administration upon the laudable efforts of the gentleman in their behalf.

But, sir, I did not rise to make a speech, or to say anything unkind toward the gentleman from Ohio, but simply to vindicate the editor and myself, in defending him from the proposition which the gentleman made, and in reference to which I think the editor was right. I have nothing further to say.

Mr. BUNDY. Mr. Speaker, after the speeches which the House has just listened to, any remarks I may be able to make will seem dry, as the subject about which I propose to talk a little will not be of much interest to the members of this House. I did not suppose that I should be able to get the floor during the present session for the purpose of saying anything touching any subject that has been before us for our action or that might be before us, or most certainly I would have made some preparation with a view to the proper discussion of the subject.

The subject upon which I propose to talk a few minutes, without, however, any expectation that anything I may say may influence the mind or the conduct of any gentleman present, is one, as I said before, that in its nature is not very interesting just at this time, because although it is a subject of great interest to a great many persons, it has been and will be overslaughed by the great question of reconstruction, about which we have heard so much. I allude to the subject of finance, and I do not approach its discussion with any purpose on my part or with any idea that I shall be able to throw any light upon it, but simply in discharge of what I conceive to be a duty to myself and to those whom I represent upon this floor. I have a chronic dislike to making speeches. I think my time can be much better occupied, as a general thing, in doing something else. Like Balaam's long-eared horse, I never speak anywhere until I am almost kicked into it. But, sir, in the great interest manifested in the question called reconstruction, it seems to me that the financial interests of the country, if not entirely disregarded, have commanded a very small share of the consideration of this House.

In other words, it seems to me that by the action which we have taken during the last session of Congress, and which I see we are to take during the present session, if we are to carry out the suggestions and recommendations of those gentlemen who have the charge of the subject here—the whole subject being handed over to the keeping of the Secretary of the Treasury, and with a rate of speed that I do not comprehend by any manner of means, the Committee on Ways and Means of this House appear to adopt and carry out almost all his suggestions in regard to it—and which, in my judgment, seriously threaten, to say nothing worse, the industrial interests of the country. I know the difficulties under which the man labors here if he disagrees with or if he attacks in any form whatever, even by his vote simply, the recommendations of that committee. I know the embarrassments under which he labors if he attempts to make a speech in opposition to its recommendations or suggestions, and I know the advantages that the members of that committee have over other members of this House with regard to any measure that it may propose here, and that may be discussed by the committee or by the different members thereof.

Having said this much, I propose to spend a few moments in the consideration of a proposition which has been mooted, an assertion that has been made and parrot-like repeated by almost every gentleman who has made a speech on this subject, in reference to the recommendations of the Secretary of the Treasury; and that is in regard to this feature of those recommendations, to wit: that the "redundancy of the currency or circulating medium of the country enhances the prices of the products of the country, or, in other words, enhances the price of living for the non-producers." Now, is that true? I know that that is the theory laid down in the books. I know very well that almost all writers on domestic or political economy assume that the quantity of the circulating medium of a country affects, either one way or the other, as it may be redundant or scarce, the prices of the productions of the labor of the country. I know that that proposition is laid down, I believe, in Adam Smith upon the Wealth of Nations.

Now, why should we pay any regard to a theory of that sort when it is found that in our financial history the proposition had far better be laid down by "John Smith," of America, because the conditions by which we are surrounded are altogether different from those which suggested the theory as laid down by that eminent author upon the subject of political economy? Now, I take it that all such theories have been exploded by the facts, every time that the test has been made in the history of this country at any rate. How is it, why is it, that for the last two or three years the prices of the living of our people, the prices of their meat, their bread, and their apparel have been so extraordinarily high in comparison with the prices of other years? Is it because we have had such a redundant currency? I know that that is the assertion. Is it because that previous to the war, say in the year 1860, we had a circulating medium of about three hundred million dollars in round numbers, including all descriptions of currency, while during the period of the last three years we have had three times that amount of a circulating medium? I say I know that is the theory; I know that is the assertion; I have heard the assertion made in this House by distinguished members of the Committee of Ways and Means. But, in my judgment, a little reflection upon the facts will dispel that theory, as facts have dispelled all such theories in all times, I believe, in the financial history of our country.

Why was it that the price of beef, if you please, has increased from four to twenty cents per pound? Was it because we had a redundant currency? I take it it was not for that reason. It was because by reason of the market made by the demands of the war; and this remark will apply to all articles. A million and a quarter of men were sent into the field, composing the Federal Army, more than one million of that number being producers. More than one million of that number of men were engaged before the war, before they entered the Army, in some department of the industry of the country. We transferred that million of men from the ranks of the producers to those of the consumers, and the effects were not only felt in the immediate vicinity of the Army, but they were felt in all the remote districts of the country. I said that that remark applied to everything else; to the bread, to the meats of all descriptions, if you please. Did a redundant currency have anything to do with it? Why, sir, in my judgment it had but very little to do with it. Those men who had been engaged in supplying their wants by their own industry, being producers, had ceased to be such, and had become consumers.

But, says the Secretary of the Treasury, in order to bring back the state of things that we had prior to the war it is necessary to reduce the volume of the circulation. Why, sir, what I understand to be necessary to restore the state of things that we had before the war, in reference to the price of living, is to give the people of the country the time to repair the wastes of the war. Let these men go to producing again, as they did before the war; let the supply increase in proportion to the demand, and I have no doubt that we shall see, as we have seen heretofore, that when, so to speak, there is a proper equilibrium established in this regard, prices will recede.

I have said that the remark applies to the prices of all descriptions of commodities. Take some of the items, if you please. I have spoken of beef. Take, if you please, mutton, which before the war always commanded a price as large or larger than beef. But during the war it has been, as it is now, almost as low in the market as it ever was. In Ohio to-day the raw material is almost or quite as low as it ever was. Why? If this theory that a redundant currency enhances prices be true, why should not the price of mutton correspond with the price of beef? Why should not the raw material be upon the same plane? Simply because there is a very large supply of that raw material, a very large number of sheep in the country. I might say the same with regard to corn. Why, sir, before the war, when we had $300,000,000 of currency in circulation, I have known the price of corn in our country, which is a very great corn-growing region, to be one dollar per bushel, when all other articles beside were at nominal prices. Why was that? There was a scarcity of currency. Why was not the price governed by the volume of the circulating medium? Simply because Providence withheld the earlier and the later rains, and there was a failure of the crop. That is the only explanation that can be given.

How has it been, and how is it now, with regard to pork? The great demands of the war, and the prevalence of the disease known as the "hog cholera," so far cut short the crop that the farmers in the country did not raise a supply for domestic purposes, very many of whom were compelled to supply themselves from the great pork marts of the country. This was the case especially for the seasons of 1864-65, hogs and their products commanding such prices that even the class formerly retained for reproduction were thrown upon the market and killed, thereby almost cutting off the means of supply. But in 1865 the great prices stimulated an almost universal effort among producers to restore the supply, and in which they were partially successful, to the extent that the price of the hog crop declined nearly one half the present season. What had a redundant currency to do with this? Nothing. The reason for the decline is to be found in the fact that nearly all the so-called "small farmers" raised this year, not only their own supplies, but a surplus for the general market.

To claim that a retiring currency or a declining gold market had very much to do with bringing the price of pork from eleven cents per pound to six cents would be rank injustice alike to the procreating or recuperating capabilities and powers of the swine and the enterprise, industry, and thrift of the farmer. No article in the market has shown or does show any palpable sympathy with the gold market, the increase or decline of the volume of the circulating medium, except such as are imported exclusively; and even the supply of the latter will more certainly and sensibly affect its price than anything else.

How was it at the same time with regard to the article of wheat? There having been good wheat crops throughout the country, wheat was just as cheap in the market as corn. How is it now? Corn to-day with us is worth forty cents per bushel. If a redundant currency causes high prices, why is not the price of that article one dollar or one dollar and twenty cents per bushel, as it has been sometimes? Why, because there is a large corn crop. That is the explanation, and the only explanation that can be given. And with regard to wheat there has been an almost entire failure of the crop; and therefore the price is higher than we have ever before known it to be. My constituents have to buy their wheat from the constituents of the gentleman from Chicago.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I am willing to admit that there may be for some purposes such a thing as a redundant currency, and that it may have an effect upon prices; but that effect is only temporary. It may induce men who have no means of their own to go into speculation. Because of the quantity of the currency or its accessibility they may borrow and go into speculation. They may buy and hold a large amount of produce and temporarily affect prices. But when their bills payable become due and have to be met, possibly they may renew them once for a period of ninety days; but when those bills have to be met the produce must be sold and the market comes down. Speculators may affect the prices of commodities temporarily; but when pay-day comes, as come it must, prices again come into harmony with the demand for the article.

But, sir, is it true that, as compared with the period of 1859 and 1860, we have a redundant currency? How was it then? Why, sir, they say that at that time we had $300,000,000 of currency afloat, and now that we have $600,000,000 or $700,000,000. I undertake to say, sir, that $600,000,000 or $700,000,000 is not so much in proportion to the demand and the uses for currency now as $300,000,000 was before the war. Before the war, for every dollar of circulation, for every dollar of bank paper or gold, or whatever entered into or made up the sum total of our currency, there was somebody's note out for ten or fifteen dollars.

No one then pretended to do business on a cash basis; no business was conducted anywhere for cash; no sales were made for cash. The wholesale merchant sold at six months' time, and the retail merchant did the same thing. Every man who had any commodity to sell never expected to get money for it; he always expected to get somebody's note, the usual credit being for six months. I undertake to say that, during the period of five or six years prior to 1862, fifteen sixteenths of all the commercial transactions of the country were carried on upon the basis of credit; and therefore it is not true, taking our present position and what we are doing as compared with what we did then, that seven or eight hundred millions of currency now are more than three hundred millions then; for we are now attempting to do business for money, to do away with the credit system. I have nothing to say against the credit system by itself; but, sir, it has been the parent of a great deal of our miseries as a people. It has been the occasion of bringing on a great many of our financial crises. But when, sir, the idea was conceived and brought forth that we were to have a paper currency, such as the actual wants of the country demanded, why the people gradually, very gradually, did away to some extent with the credit system among us, and they did business purely on a cash principle. While they are doing that, I undertake to say, such a thing as panic or crisis could not possibly take place. What do the people care about a crisis if no one is in debt? It can never be, and never will take place. Therefore I say, sir, in point of fact it is not true that we have a redundant currency at this time. Beside, sir, we have a demand now for actual currency to pay internal Federal tax or revenue exceeding the entire volume of circulation before the war. The last report of the Secretary of the Treasury shows that during the last fiscal year our people have paid into the Treasury of the United States more than $310,000,000—eighteen million dollars more than the total of the authorized circulation of the national banks; and nothing but currency (lawful money) will be received in payment of these dues.

But, Mr. Speaker, acting on his theory, the Secretary of the Treasury, seconded by the Finance Committees of both Houses of Congress, is retiring as fast as possible, as fast as the law will permit, a portion of the currency we already have. How is it to-day, sir? We have about sixteen hundred national banks, with a circulation of $292,000,000. We have in round numbers $400,000,000 of United States notes and in round numbers $159,000,000 of compound-interest notes that have already been treated and regarded as money; and now what is attempted to be done? By the law of the last session the Secretary of the Treasury was permitted and authorized by law to do—what? Why, sir, to convert the compound-interest notes into long bonds; to retire the non-interest-bearing notes; so that, since the passage of the law, $4,000,000 per month of United States money or non-interest-bearing legal tenders have been retired, and the Government has put just that much more money on interest than we had before. Now, what is to be the effect of this thing? If it goes on, how is the country to be affected? How is the business of the country to be affected? If this thing is to continue, all the compound-interest notes will be retired; the entire $400,000,000 will be retired, and then we will be remitted to a condition of things not so favorable to the business of the country as before the war, as we will not then have as much circulation as we had before the war.

Mr. PRICE. Do I understand the gentleman to say that by the act of the last session of Congress the Secretary of the Treasury was authorized to retire legal tenders and to pay for them in long bonds?

Mr. BUNDY. Yes, sir, in effect.

Mr. PRICE. I supposed we had guarded against that point particularly.

Mr. BUNDY. How can you guard against it? I am a modest gentleman here and will cheerfully answer any question put to me, but as I have never had the floor before I fear I may make some mistake and lose it. [Laughter.] I ask you, Mr. Speaker, whether it is not an authority given to the Secretary of the Treasury to retire legal tenders and to issue Government interest-bearing bonds in their stead?

Mr. PRICE. I wish to say in reply, if the gentleman is correct in the position he assumes then the country is in a dangerous position financially.

Mr. BUNDY. That is what I say, sir.

Mr. PRICE. For one I will go as far as any member upon this floor to correct that evil. I suppose that the act of the last Congress authorized the Secretary to retire so many millions per month and that they were to be destroyed, and to make myself sure that I was correct in that, I introduced a resolution some two weeks since, which was kindly objected to by my friend from Illinois, [Mr. WENTWORTH,] requesting the Committee on Banking and Currency to ascertain whether these legal tenders had been burned. I wanted to know what had been done with them. I wanted to be assured that they were reduced to ashes. For if instead of being destroyed they are being converted into long bonds, if we have left that door open to the Secretary of the Treasury, then we had better here and now, before sunset, pass a law that no non-interest-bearing legal tender should ever be converted into interest-bearing bonds of any description. I cannot consent to believe that we have made such an egregious blunder as to allow such a thing to be done.

Mr. WENTWORTH. The gentleman says I objected to his resolution; I objected only to a part of it.

Mr. PRICE. There were two resolutions, and the gentleman very kindly objected to both.

Mr. WENTWORTH. Was it all in one proposition?

Mr. PRICE. They were on the same paper, but they were susceptible of division if the gentleman had seen proper to call for a division, but he did not.

Mr. WENTWORTH. Does not the gentleman understand parliamentary law well enough to know that we cannot divide a proposition when the question is upon its reception. Only after it is received can it be divided; therefore I objected to its reception.

Mr. PRICE. I am so well acquainted with parliamentary law as to know that the House could not act on it in any manner until it was received, and the gentleman availed himself of the privilege, knowing that a single objection would stop it, to prevent its coming up for debate or division or anything else.

But to return to what I was saying when I was interrupted. When at the last session that bill was under consideration, I expressed my views upon it in a short speech, and I took the ground that we should retire these notes no faster than the receipts of the Government exceeded its expenditures, and that we must not retire the non-interest-paying paper and keep afloat the other. I certainly combated to the extent of my ability then, and shall continue to do it so long as I shall remain a member of this House, the doctrine that the Government should make any more interest-paying notes, and maintained that if it retired any it should be the interest-paying notes. I supposed I was entirely with the gentleman from Ohio in that, and I am only sorry to find there is a possibility of my being mistaken in regard to it.

Mr. BUNDY. It is wholly immaterial, and the gentleman as readily understands it as any member on the floor perhaps, whether there is a provision in the law to the effect which he claims or not. What are the facts in the case? The gentleman knows as well as I do that if you do not increase the interest-bearing bonds of the Government they remain as they are bearing interest. In other words if you retire anything, would it not be better to retire the bonds that bear interest?

Mr. PRICE. The notes that bear interest.

Mr. BUNDY. Why do you give the Secretary of the Treasury permission to retire four millions a month of notes upon which the Government pays no interest and retain as indebtedness those upon which it does pay interest? There is the impolicy of the thing. I care not what the special provisions of your law are; it amounts to nothing, because if we are getting more revenue than is necessary to meet the ordinary expenses of the Government, that surplus ought to be applied to the payment of the debt upon which we are paying interest and not of that upon which we are paying no interest. He would be a very foolish man indeed who, in the administration of his own affairs, should give his surplus above his necessary expenses or the requirements of his business to pay those notes upon which he had to pay no interest, while he let those remain upon which he was paying interest.

Mr. KELLEY. Will the gentleman yield? Mr. BUNDY. Oh yes, only I am afraid the gentleman will interject a better speech than my own. [Laughter.]

Mr. KELLEY. I desire just at this point to say that the theory of the Secretary of the Treasury is, that by absorbing the non-interest-bearing notes, while the compound-interest notes are afloat, he is contracting the currency; and I wish to ask the gentleman to permit me to have read from the Public Ledger, of Philadelphia, a paper of unquestioned standing, an article showing that the banks recognize the absorption of the compound-interest notes as contraction, and are afraid that retiring them even at their maturity will bring them to insolvency or to a suspension of the payment of greenbacks in the redemption of their notes. I ask for the reading of the article:

The Clerk read as follows:

"The proposition to take from the national banks the right to count compound notes as a part of their legal reserve is creating alarm among bankers, who see in it the seeds of financial revulsion, the result of an arbitrary and violent change in the law. The withdrawal of the compound notes from the banks at maturity will force upon them a conservative policy, which cannot fail to be felt by their debtors, who must pay up as fast as the banks are obliged to contract by the maturing of their interest-bearing reserve. The following extract from a letter from the president of the First National Bank at New York, whose experience in currency and banking gives his opinions great weight, is entitled to the consideration of Congress:

"I wish to enter my protest to the Honorable Mr. Hooper and others against amending the national bank law so that the banks cannot count in their reserve money their compound-interest notes. When they are due and payable the banks do not substitute gold or greenbacks for the compounds they hold any faster than they fall due will surely cause a severe revulsion in the money market, and the Government itself will not be among the minor sufferers. The banks will necessarily violate the law as regards their reserve, or fail, many of them, outright."

Mr. BUNDY. I would before I got through, if I had not forgotten it, have referred to that feature of the bill known as Mr. HOOPER's bill. Permit me to say, in passing, that I have no sympathy with banks or bankers who are apprehensive of any such state of things. It is their business to provide against any such contingencies. I was going on to say—and I am sorry that I have no moorings to which I can fasten for the purpose of making my speech, if you can call it such, connected—I was going on to say that the legitimate effect of the processes now in operation, inaugurated by the Secretary of the Treasury, and seconded, I am sorry to say, by the Congress of the United States, is to bring us down to the circulation of the national banks without any authority for the increase of that circulation, to wit, to $292,000,000, or less than we had during the terrible times of 1860 and 1861. I say that that state of things is inevitable. Inevitable, why? Why, because, as I before remarked, this excess which the Government derives from its sources of revenue is applied, not to the extinguishment of the interest-bearing bonds of the Government, but to the extinguishment of the non-interest-bearing bonds to a great extent. Why retire the non-interest-bearing notes? What reason is there for that? Four hundred millions of them at six per cent. would produce $24,000,000 a year, which, under a peace establishment, would have been considered a large source of revenue for the purpose of carrying on the Government and paying its ordinary expenses; and yet it is proposed to retire all that class of public indebtedness, not as rapidly as the Secretary of the Treasury asks, I admit, but as rapidly as he may do it under the law.

Does that look like a good financial policy? Why was it inaugurated? Why is it insisted on with such pertinacity on the part of the head of the exchequer? Why, sir, without attributing any selfish motives in the matter, without supposing for a moment that he had any aspiration for the future with regard to himself, it would be a very pleasant thing for him to have it said in history that during his administration of the financial affairs of the country he had become its greatest financier. His object is to enforce the resumption of specie payments. Who wants the resumption of specie payments?

Several MEMBERS. We do.

Mr. BUNDY. We do, but we want it in a way that will not destroy the great industrial interests of the country. I undertake to say that if this matter is left to natural causes specie payments will resume themselves without any spasmodic action on the part of the Secretary or of Congress.

How can we resume specie payment now? What is specie payment? What is specie? It is nothing more or less than the representative of the values of the products of the country. It has no intrinsic worth; it is the medium of exchange. Exchange of what? Exchange of that which is substantial, and which is of intrinsic worth. And how can we resume specie payment without those products? Just wait; "make haste slowly" in this matter, and the productive industries of the country will become such as will create a basis upon which your specie can rest, and when specie payment is resumed, as the consequence of natural causes, it will be worth something. If you attempt it before, as I have said, the action will be spasmodic and worthless, and not only worthless, but destructive to every material interest of this country. Who wants specie payment, and for what? Why, upon the theory I first mentioned, that because of the fact that gold is above the face of our paper currency, the denomination of the currency, and therefore the prices of the living of those men who have salaries are enhanced, and the prices of the living of non-producers are enhanced. That is one view of it. I know that it is right for persons who have salaries even to live as cheaply as they possibly can; but I take it that they have no right to demand cheap living at our hands, even if their theory is true at all, at the expense of the whole productive interests of the country.

Who else wants resumption of specie payment? Why, sir, the holders of the bonds of the country, and their name is legion, whether foreign or domestic. Those men who have bought our bonds when gold was 280 would regard it as a God-send to-day if by the action of the Secretary of the Treasury and of this Congress, the thirty-three cents of their gold should become a dollar in their hands. Why, sir, Aladdin's lamp would be utterly worthless in comparison with it. They are interested in this matter. Where are the bondholders thus interested? There are across the waters a part of the bondholders, and I am very glad of it, very glad of it in one view. It would be a grand financial triumph of the Secretary of the Treasury, aided by the Congress of the United States, if by possibility the fifty cents in gold which, in the day of our distress they brought over here and invested in our bonds, should become a dollar in gold.

Mr. MAYNARD. Will the gentleman allow me a moment?

Mr. BUNDY. I will.

Mr. MAYNARD. I desire to ask the gentleman a question right at this point. Does he think this nation is under any moral obligation, I do not say any legal obligation, to meet these outstanding bonds in coin, or does the gentleman think they may justly and righteously be discharged by the payment of Treasury notes or greenbacks?

Mr. BUNDY. If I understand that to be the sentiment of the gentleman then I agree with him. Those bonds were bought by these men when gold was at least one hundred per cent. premium. And I say it is not the business of Congress, it is not the business of the Secretary of the Treasury, in order to put money into the pockets of these men, to so shape the finances of this country as that they shall make a dollar out of their fifty cents within a very short time, say within a year or two.

Mr. KELLEY. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him for a moment?

Mr. BUNDY. Oh, yes, sir.

Mr. KELLEY. Allow me to say that those bonds are payable in "lawful money," and if the English people send them over here before we resume specie payment, they must take their redemption in lawful money, let it be specie or greenbacks.

Mr. BUNDY. That is a very important suggestion, and I am obliged to the gentleman for making it.

Mr. MAYNARD. I wish to ask my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] whether he thinks that the Secretary of the Treasury, by making an official announcement that these bonds will be paid at maturity in coin, creates thereby any moral obligation upon the part of the Government to pay them in coin.

Mr. KELLEY. I have never supposed that the word of the Secretary of the Treasury could override the law of the land; and as those who bought these bonds bought them with the understanding that according to the terms of the law they should be redeemable in lawful money, the Secretary cannot change the terms of the contract. I am therefore in no hurry to give the gold instead of greenbacks, as in doing so we will crush all branches of American industry. Foreign bondholders cannot complain if they have to take what is "nominated in the bond," and do not get gold when we promised but lawful money.

Mr. BUNDY. I am very much obliged to gentlemen for interjecting such good doctrines into my speech. They will be highly valuable as illustrations.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have stated who are the interested parties; and they are the only parties interested. On the one side are the non-producers, with the bondholders, domestic and foreign, added; while on the other are the producers of this country, the men who work, I care not where they work; on them the whole weight of this thing must eventually fall. They constitute the bed-rock in these strata. Whatever we may say here, the capitalist, the man who has the money, is not to be the sufferer by a crisis. The weight of the calamity falls at last, and most severely, upon the man who works—the producer.

But, sir, it is urged that the reputation of the Government is involved in this matter. I have seen intimations coming from across the waters that we should see to it that very early, perhaps even before all the revolted States are restored to practical relations with the Government, the resumption of specie payments shall be accomplished. In order to enforce this doctrine, the example of Great Britain after the Peninsular war is quoted to us as an illustration. What is the fact in regard to this matter? How did Great Britain resume specie payments? What are her consols worth to-day in the market? Do they command specie dollar for dollar with their denominational characters? No, sir. They are quoted in London at ninety-two cents on the dollar; while our five-twenties in the same market are quoted at seventy-two. Do you call that a resumption of specie payments? If it were proposed that our Government should resume specie payments upon that principle, there would not perhaps be so much objection to it. Take all our vast debt; consolidate it; declare that you will pay but three per cent. interest on it, and then let its quotable value in the market be but ninety-two cents on the dollar, and you will have resumed specie payments in the same way that England has done it, so far as the indebtedness of the Government is concerned.

But, Mr. Speaker, the evil of this thing does not stop here. In the first place, we are not conditioned like Great Britain. We never have been; and we shall not be within the next hundred years. Her natural resources are nearly all developed; and the Government, the capitalist, the agriculturalist, and the manufacturer are all a unit. They are on one side of the line; on the other are the paupers of Great Britain, the artisan, the mechanic, and the laborer. Hence, under the system prevailing there, the manufacturers and capitalists can, in almost every case, avoid a financial crisis when they see it approaching. All that they need to do is to get the Bank of England to lower the rate of discount and issue their paper, thus anticipating and avoiding a financial crisis. It is not so with us, and it never will be. Here the Government is one thing; our agriculturists another thing; our manufacturers another, so far as their respective interests are concerned. Hence I maintain that England cannot furnish us any example in the solution of our financial difficulties. There cannot exist in that country a condition of things analogous to that prevailing here. There is just as much propriety in quoting the practice of Great Britain under her financial system as a rule for our Government as there is in quoting international law established by despotic and monarchical Powers as a rule to guide us in the restoration of our Government.

Why, Mr. Speaker, we never did do anything here like Great Britain, and I hope we never will. Here it is that the people are sovereign, and they manage their own affairs pretty much as they please. Not so there. Therefore I say the rule does not apply. Gentlemen are perfectly willing, apparently, to leave all matters pertaining to our interests in this country to the people who are involved, except this question of finance. We maintain until we get into Congress that that is their right, under the spirit and form of our Government. I know how I have felt once. When I was at home as an humble individual, I thought I was able to conduct my own finances without any interference from others; but somehow or other when I got in here I thought it was a part of my duty to regulate the financial affairs of all my neighbors. I know that is natural; but, sir, the effect of all such action is detrimental to the business interests of the country. So much, then, for that view of the question.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I concede that the bondholders have a large interest in this question of "contraction and resumption," for those are the catch phrases; and perhaps, without intending to say anything against our national banking system at all or any of the persons who are engaged in it, I must be allowed to say there is no class of men in the country who are any more interested than they are, because their bonds constitute the basis of their circulation.

There is another aspect of this case. By the legislation of Congress you tax out of existence every State bank in the country. In other words, the national banking system is the only one we have or can have. They have the matter in their own hands. It is curious to see how the capital has been distributed, and how it has been appropriated by different sections of the country. Now, sir, I do not blame men for being actuated to some extent by self-interest in this country, and therefore it is not surprising to me that a great effort is being made to so amend our national banking law so that our country national banks shall be compelled to keep an agency in New York. It is not a matter of surprise, when we look at the New England States. I will show how that thing has been "fixed up." Take, if you please, the State of Massachusetts, with a population, I do not remember how many, but something over a million. In this race of diligence, for that is what it is, they have appropriated of the banking capital of three hundred and odd millions authorized by Congress, seventy-nine millions, over one fourth of the whole. The State of Ohio, with a population twice that of Massachusetts, with an area much larger, with a country for agriculture far superior, with a belt of mineral territory six miles wide, running from the northeast to the southwest, which, if properly developed, would be worth more than all the lands and manufactories of Massachusetts, has a banking capital of this association of—how much do you think?—about twenty millions, or about one fourth of Massachusetts.

I do not wish to make any invidious comparisons; I only wish to show how fast men go in this race of diligence. Take, if you please, seven States, New York, Massachusetts, Maine, Rhode Island, New Hampshire, Vermont, and Connecticut, and of the sixteen hundred and odd banks they have seven hundred and ninety-eight of them, with an authorized capital of about two hundred and sixty-two million dollars. If you include Pennsylvania—and we have a right to include it so far as the Northwest is concerned—there is this condition of things: that of the sixteen hundred and forty-seven banks, they have nine hundred and ninety-nine of them, or two thirds, leaving for the other twenty-eight States of the Union and all the Territories but six hundred and forty-eight banks; that is all that can be made under the law. In order to show how this national banking system has been "fixed up" and appropriated, I append the following tables, extracted from the last report of the Secretary of the Treasury:

To which may be added such part of the compound-interest notes due in 1867 and 1868 as may be held as reserves by the several national banks, thereby releasing for circulation an equal amount of the said United States notes, the whole amount of the said compound-interest notes being $159,012,140.

Now, sir, is it surprising we should find upon our tables a bill asking us, in addition to all this, that the national banks in Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and throughout the West, Northwest, and South, must organize a redeeming agency in the city of New York? They will then get all our money there; every bit of it.

There is another proposition in that bill I will speak of before I get through. But now about this thing of having a redeeming agency in New York. Some of us in the West have had sad experience in regard to that matter.

You remember, sir, once upon a time there existed an institution called the Ohio Life Insurance and Trust Company. The main office of that company was in Ohio, but the principal office for redemption was located in the city of New York, where the bulls and bears do congregate, to say nothing of any other species of animals. It so happened that the men who had the management of this redemption agency in New York applied all the funds to purposes outside of the legitimate object of the organization, and when the crash came in 1857 down went the Life and Trust Company. Now, I say that in my judgment it would be infinitely better, if we are to have an institution of that kind, to locate it out West somewhere, in some of our little towns, where men do not congregate in such masses; and perhaps it would not be amiss to locate that redeeming agency in my own little town of Jackson. [Laughter.]

Mr. MAYNARD. If the gentleman will allow me, I find in my mail a petition of some of my constituents which seems germane to the subject he is discussing, and if he does not object I would like to have it read.

Mr. BUNDY. Not at all; every injection of that sort helps my speech. [Laughter.]

The Clerk read as follows:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

Your petitioners, the undersigned, citizens of Benton, in the county of Polk, in the State of Tennessee, respectfully pray:

1. That your honorable body will refrain from the passage of any act authorizing the curtailment of the national currency, or having in view the return, within a limited time, to specie payments. They respectfully represent that the further reduction of the volume of currency at present would prove highly injurious to the banking, manufacturing, and mercantile interests of the country, and would entail suffering upon nearly every member of the community; and they express the opinion that, if such currency shall now be contracted, we are near to the time when the lawful obligations of citizens cannot be met; when the demands of the national Government, together with the heavy taxes levied by our State and municipal authorities, cannot be paid; and when many of our good citizens shall have to submit to a confiscation of their hard-earned property.

2. Your petitioners further pray that your honorable body will refrain from the enactment of any law compelling all national banks, wherever located, to redeem their notes in New York, or prohibiting national banks from paying or receiving interest on bank balances.

And your petitioners respectfully submit, that any law compelling all national banks to redeem their circulating notes in New York would prove onerous to them, injurious to the business men of their locality, and would ignore the just claims of other sections of the country.

And your petitioners further show, that as the business of nearly every bank in the United States requires it to keep deposits at one of the national banks located in New York, any law prohibiting the receipt or payment of interest upon balances by such banks would operate harshly upon all like institutions located out of that city, and would render wholly unproductive a considerable proportion of their capital.

And your petitioners will ever pray, &c.

Mr. MAYNARD. A letter explanatory of the petitioners' views accompanies it, which I offer.

The Clerk read as follows:

BENTON, TENNESSEE, January 3, 1867.

SIR: By last mail a portion of the citizens sent a petition addressed to you asking Congress to refrain from passing any act curtailing the national currency, or to require the national banks to redeem their notes in the city of New York, or to prohibit national banks from paying interest on bank balances; all of which I hope will meet with your approbation, as any laws looking to a reduction of the currency and an early resumption of specie payments at a time when we have such heavy taxes (both State and national) to pay, would prove highly injurious to all classes of business.

Calling attention to the petition referred to, I am, respectfully, yours, &c.

Hon. H. MAYNARD.

Mr. WENTWORTH. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. BUNDY. Yes, sir.

Mr. WENTWORTH. While that petition was being read I looked over one of eight or ten of the same kind that I have, and I now send it to the Clerk's desk to be read, for the purpose of showing where these petitions come from. Every member, I presume, has a handful of them:

OFFICE OF THE MERCHANTS' UNION LAW COMPANY, AMERICAN EXCHANGE BANK BUILDING, No. 128 BROADWAY, NEW YORK, December 21, 1866.

DEAR SIR: Several of the parties connected with the Merchants' Union Law Company, having been retained by some of the national banks and others interested to oppose measures pending in Congress for the further curtailment of the currency, for compelling all such banks to redeem their issues in New York, and for prohibiting them from receiving or paying interest on bank balances, in view of the importance of the questions involved, concert of action in the matter has been determined upon. Eminent counsel have been retained at Washington and elsewhere to prepare and present arguments against each of these measures, and in favor of an enlargement rather than contraction of the volume of the currency; and such other measures have been taken as were deemed proper to inform Congress of the wishes and interests of the whole community upon these subjects.

Copies of the blank petitions, which have been transmitted throughout the Union, have also been forwarded to you; and, after procuring the signatures of your most influential citizens thereto, you are respectfully requested to inclose the same to your Congressional Representative, or to some other member at Washington with whom you are acquainted. Much good may also arise from communicating your wishes by letter to your acquaintances in Congress.

Additional blank petitions, in any number desired, with printed arguments, in pamphlet form, by some of the most eminent counsel in the country, favoring these views, will be forwarded to you free of charge upon application to this office.

If you approve of the efforts thus made and to be continued in this direction, you are respectfully solicited to contribute to the expenses of the same by transmitting to this office such retainer in the matter as you shall deem proper—say one tenth of one mill on each dollar of your capital, being in the proportion of ten dollars on each $100,000 of such capital; it being understood, of course, that you incur no additional obligation by so doing.

Yours, &c.,

JOHN LIVINGSTON,

Secretary, &c.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. WENTWORTH moved that the time of the gentleman be extended.

No objection being made, the time was accordingly extended.

Mr. BUNDY. I understand very well the scope and effect of that letter, and am not surprised at the source whence it emanates and the medium for its introduction into this House. My friend from Illinois resides in a large city of the West, which is abundantly supplied with banking facilities.

Mr. WENTWORTH. With the gentleman's permission I would like to say a word in answer to a remark of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] on the subject of national banks. I will assure that gentleman that for every bank that fails I can get men in my district alone to start another. We are not afraid of these national bank failures, as their bills are secured; and there are bonds enough in the country in the hands of willing capitalists to start a dozen for every one that fails.

Mr. BUNDY. Yes, sir. I understand something about banking at Chicago. Banking facilities are very easily obtained there, to say the least of it; but there is one condition—precedent, I believe, to the discount of any business paper, and that is that the applicant must leave some additional sum of money, beside the proceeds of the discounted paper, on deposit until the paper matures. [Laughter.] Of course they do not want any increase of banking facilities there. But, Mr. Speaker, that paper is but the forerunner of coming financial events if this state of things in reference to the currency continues; and it should be regarded as a note of warning to the whole country, and its effect should not be lost upon the members of this House.

Mr. HARDING, of Illinois. I desire, with the gentleman's permission, to say, in reference to the representations made by my colleague, that I hold in my possession petitions from numerous and very respectable men of business in Chicago, who dissent from the views presented by my colleague, [Mr. WENTWORTH.] The petitions are headed by such names as Solomon Sturgeon & Son, Amos T. Hall, and many others; so that, although my colleague is from Chicago, it seems there are two sentiments prevailing there on this question.

Mr. WENTWORTH. Allow me to say that I have expressed no sentiment; I only sent up the paper to be read in order to get the origin of these petitions before the country.

Mr. BUNDY. Mr. Speaker, I begin to think there is a conspiracy here, knowing that I am a modest man, to embarrass my speech. [Laughter.] Now, I do not know where I was. [Laughter.] I was about saying—yes, I did say, that by a law of Congress there was such a heavy tax imposed upon State banks that it is impossible for institutions of that kind to exist, and therefore the only circulating medium that we have or can have in the future, if this state of things is permitted to go on, will be that furnished by these national banks. I said they had no interest. It is true, they may have a conflicting interest. They may have no interest and no sympathy with my views; but they have an interest in this special, "strait-jacket" legislation, which confines the entire facilities for furnishing a circulating medium to them. It is natural that it should be so. I have no objection to that on their part. They want to make as much money out of their money as they can. That is their side of the question.

Now, Mr. Speaker, with regard to the processes and the manner in which they are to be accelerated for the reduction of the currency, I have said that these Eastern banks, acting on the suggestion of their own interests, as a matter of course, would favor nothing that looked to an increase of the capital of the banks, or a redistribution of it. I am opposed, for one, to any legislation upon the subject. If I should favor any legislation at all it would be a reapportioning of this bank capital to the States and Territories in proportion to the people resident there, or to the wants of the country, as might be determined after investigation.

In looking further into the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, I find that eight States, including the seven first mentioned and Pennsylvania, have a circulation on authorized capital of $310,459,000, leaving the other twenty-eight States and Territories only one hundred and six million odd dollars; or, in other words, that those eight States have two thirds of the entire authorized banking capital under this law; and therefore it is not remarkable that they should feel an interest in perpetuating this state of things as far as they can, and making it as profitable as possible.

Let me refer to the section of this bill, which has been read, amending section thirty-two of the law. I read the proviso:

"Provided, That compound-interest notes shall not be included in the lawful money of the United States required in any association by the provisions of the preceding section."

What is the practice of all these banks now? For their reserve they put away the compound-interest notes, and that being the case, it keeps afloat legal tenders to a corresponding extent, because the law requires that such a per cent. of their capital shall be placed as a reserve, and it must be "lawful money;" and the word "lawful" is held to mean those interest-bearing notes. Instead of holding as a reserve this vast sum in legal-tender, non-interest-bearing notes, they now hold compound-interest notes. By the proviso in this bill the committee, no doubt acting in harmony with the desires and suggestions of the Secretary, propose to force all the national banks, to discard and surrender the compound-interest notes now held as a reserve, and substitute therefor the United States non-interest-bearing legal tenders. This would facilitate, to the extent of such substitution, the reduction of the currency.

The process of the reduction of the currency is not rapid enough to suit these gentlemen; it is too tardy. They propose, therefore, by this amendment to make it unlawful for the banks to retain compound-interest notes as a reserve, and compel them to substitute the legal-tender now circulating among the people. They propose, "at one fell swoop," by this amendment to take all the compound-interest notes out of the vaults of the banks, and compel them to put in their place legal-tenders or non-interest-bearing notes.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I said a while ago that there were two parties to this controversy; two interests involved. It is a fine thing for us to talk boldly and eloquently about "the rights of man;" it is something for us to say when we go home, that during the present session of this Congress we enfranchised a portion of a race that has been disfranchised from time immemorial; it is something for us to say that we have, as far as we were able by our voices and our votes, attempted to do justice to every member of the human family; but, Mr. Speaker, while we are doing that, while this interest seems to overshadow all others, it must be recollected that back there in the States there are a few white men left, whose interests must be consulted by the Administration and by Congress. They have said in thunder tones to us, "These things ye ought to have done;" and the same distant and potential voice will also peal forth, "and not to have left the others undone." If we do not now, we will be compelled to hear, and our successors to heed, the latter injunction. For my part, I am disposed to hear and obey that injunction now. It will not do for you to say to these men whom you called into the service, a million and a quarter strong, men from the free States who endured the hardships imposed upon them by the Government to put down the rebellion, that, after they did as they had done, nobly, you, by your action on this great question of finances, have so crippled the industrial interests of the country as to turn them out of employment, or to leave them and their families to starve.

I know some gentlemen talk as though they could compel men who have money to operate with it. No such thing can be done. Capital, as has been said here repeatedly, is always timid. The manufacturers, who give employment to these men, will do just as their interests indicate they should do, in order to save that capital and enhance it. And therefore it is not surprising at all that, amid the terrible uncertainty that now seems to hang over this whole question of finance, we find that fifteen thousand artisans, mechanics, and day laborers are idle in the city of New York, looking in vain for the means of procuring subsistence. Why, sir, we not only owe to all conditions of men the boon of personal freedom, but we owe to them access to the means for their living.

And here let me say that there is another thing that will come up in the hereafter, blink it as you may, frown it down in these Halls as you can. Having provided by law that one sixth of all your taxable property, held by all the people of this country, shall, for all time to come, be exempt from taxation, if you turn these men out of employment, who provide the means by which the value of and interest upon that property is kept up, they will say, if they are thus treated by their Government, why should they hereafter labor and toil to keep in power a party in the country who will continue to exempt that property from taxation, while its action destroys the means to their prosperity? I hope the day may never come in the history of our country when the thought of repudiation will tarnish its fair fame. But I will tell gentlemen they may so act, they may so conduct public affairs, as to precipitate such an event. It will do the soldier no good; it will furnish him no reasons why he should continue his support of a party that, on these great abstract rights, obeyed the behests of justice and the dictates of an enlightened conscience, when at the same time it fails to secure to him and his family the means to exist. This, indeed, would be a sublime history and grand example for the instruction and admiration of the world. The soldier has been honorably discharged from the conflicts of the ensanguined field; he has now returned, if not to the more terrible, yet more protracted battle of life. It is true, we have a free country; but with freedom I want to carry blessings to all its people. The manufacturers will not, cannot, employ these men. The agriculturist cannot do it. The capitalist will not invest his money in any enterprises, without reasonable prospects of fair profits upon the investment. They will prefer investment in the untaxed bonds of the Government.

There is another view of this subject which may be important in this connection, and which is intimately connected with this question of labor, or the employment of labor.

Before the war, when our currency was in round numbers $300,000,000, the manufacturers as a class, and even the agriculturists, were so much in debt that they were obliged to continue in operation their business regardless of the results of their operations as to profits. The manufacturers were compelled to keep their establishments in operation even at a yearly loss, so that, by the sale of their products, their existing indebtedness could be carried over from year to year; and they were also stimulated by the hope that each successive year's operations might show a better balance-sheet at the end thereof.

The farmers as a class were embarrassed by reason of investments made for improvements upon their farms or for additions purchased thereto, so that it may be said, without any disparagement of the farmers as a class, that their farms were shingled over with mortgages to secure the payment of liabilities incurred as above suggested. They too were compelled to cultivate their farms, furnishing employment to labor, so that by the sale of each year's products they were enabled to pay the accruing interest on their liabilities and also carry over or change their maturing liabilities by making new loans.

But, Mr. Speaker, that state of things no longer exists. The manufacturers and farmers are comparatively if not entirely relieved from debt, and the only thing for them now to decide in the consideration of the question of prosecuting their business is, whether it will be profitable to operate or not. The farmer will be contented with simply producing enough to subsist himself and family, unless, indeed, he has assurance that he will receive such prices for the surplus that he will be paid for his labors. The same remark will apply to the manufacturers. So that the question of the employment of labor will not, as heretofore, be governed by the necessities of the employers thereof, but by the prospects of their business.

Now, Mr. Speaker, is it not easy to see that if by our action here the financial affairs of the country shall be so distracted and disturbed as to unsettle or embarrass our producing enterprises, and that supplies shall be cut short by reason thereof, that the prices of produce and everything that our people consume will be enhanced thereby? The fact of a reduced currency or resumption of specie payment would not have much influence in the premises.

And, sir, if we reduce our currency below the absolute requirements of the country, in order to the successful prosecution of all classes of enterprises, how are you to command the means to pay the accruing interest on your public debt? From what source will you derive internal revenue? Whence will be derived your surplus that looks to the creation of a "sinking fund," or the direct reduction or extinguishment of your public debt? Do you expect that the Commissioner of Internal Revenue will be able to report the receipt annually of more than $300,000,000 from this source alone? And how is the labor of the country to be employed with reference to the interest, if not to the very existence, of the laborer? I confess I do not see how these questions can receive satisfactory answers if the line of policy inaugurated by the Secretary is to be pursued indefinitely.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have said all that I intended to say, and much more. Having no notes, and keeping no account of what I did say, owing to the repeated interruptions to which I have been subjected, it will not be strange if these remarks are somewhat incoherent and disconnected. It is said that the books furnish the theories that guide the exchequer of the country, and in the main they furnish the arguments, too, of the Committee of Ways and Means of this House. But what are books with us? What are theories with us? In our practices we scout them all. Diverging a little from the main topic and in order to illustrate the individuality and independence of our people as to the modes of thought and action, I beg to refer to the following little incident of the war: In the State of Tennessee, the home of my friend on the right, [Mr. MAXNARD,] a young man, a soldier of the Union Army, made application for a furlough to go home. Being denied by all his immediate superior officers, nothing daunted he resolved to seek the headquarters of the general commanding the department, General Thomas. He readily obtained access to the good-natured, sedate, and brave man, who inquired the object of his visit. He said, "General, I want to go home." "What do you want to go home for?" said the General. "To see my wife," replied the soldier. "How long has it been since you have seen her?" inquired the General. "Three months," responded the soldier. "That's nothing," said the General, "I have not seen my wife for three years." "Ah, General," said the soldier, "my wife and me are not that kind of folks, I want you to understand." The General surrendered; the soldier received his furlough. [Great laughter.] Think of such a dialogue and repartee with the results between a great general and the common soldier of any other country but ours. Why do you attempt to draw instructions from the theories or even the practices of the old countries, or any country whose conditions are not like ours? What did Adam Smith know about greenbacks? Why should we attempt to adopt theories or follow examples furnished us by monarchies and despotisms, even in regard to the great subject of the reconstruction of the States lately in rebellion?

They are all in the same category. They can furnish us no rule, because, Mr. Speaker, whenever two kings go to war, they fight until a sufficient number of their subjects have been killed to sate their ambition, and then all that is necessary to bring about peace is that the two kings or the two dynasties should make up their quarrel. But here it so happens that every one of our people is a sovereign; and I claim, sir, that the humble soldier-boy has as much right to dictate the terms upon which he will reaffiliate with the rebel who tried to kill him as the man in the White House at the other end of the avenue. My only boy, who is dying by inches from the effects of a wound received by a rebel shell, has as much right to say upon what terms those men shall come in here by my side and vote me down as the President of the United States. He stood for me, sir, in the time of my own and my country's peril, and by the blessing of God I will now stand in "my lot" here or elsewhere for him and his brave compatriots until I die.

Why, sir, look at the recent war in Europe between Austria and Prussia. It was a very short war; and when the war was over everything apparently was very speedily "fixed up." Why? Because there was nobody to fix it up but the dynasties interested. A great many of us wondered why it was that the Prussians gained so many advantages over the Austrians. We never understood it until we learned the fact that Benedek had George B. McClellan on his staff. Then the whole mystery was explained.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I want to say in conclusion that I hope we shall right here "call a halt." There is no necessity for a financial crisis in this country. Let our people alone; let them go on with their respective branches of industry under the auspices of a Government which they regard as their friend financially, and soon, very soon, the wastes of the late war will be repaired; soon, very soon, you will have productions upon which you can form a basis for the resumption of specie payments; soon, very soon, our people, if left to themselves, will so manage their affairs that we shall have universal prosperity all over the land. Let us have no spasmodic action. Let us right here say to the Secretary of the Treasury: "Thus far and no farther, shalt thou go in this matter." Let us declare that the volume of the currency shall not be diminished, except so fast as the interest of the country may require. Let us say that no one man on earth, however great or able, shall be intrusted with the power that the Secretary of the Treasury exercises to-day with regard to the financial destinies of the country. I know of but one man on earth who is the embodiment of sufficient wisdom and patriotism to govern and conduct the affairs of this great people, and he is so only in his own estimation. In my judgment it is the duty of this Congress—it is my duty and the duty of every Union man in this body—to see to it that no harm shall come to our people because of the management or mismanagement of our finances by the Secretary of the Treasury, and that while we can send to the nations of the earth greeting that "our people are free," may we be able in all truthfulness to say with equal pride and significance that "they are prosperous and happy."

Mr. MAYNARD obtained the floor.

Mr. PRICE. Will the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MAYNARD] yield to me for a moment?

Mr. MAYNARD. I will if the gentleman will agree to continue the speech of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BUNDR] in the same strain and with the same ability.

Mr. PRICE. That is asking a great deal of one man. I will, to the extent of my ability, continue it in the same strain, but I cannot promise to do it with the same ability.

I desire to occupy the attention of the House for a moment, because there may be other members than those who have spoken who are under a wrong impression in regard to the law passed at the last session. When I interrupted the gentleman from Ohio, who very kindly yielded me the floor, I did so because I thought he was under a misapprehension as to the power conferred on the Secretary of the Treasury by the law of last session. I know that, unless he had misapprehended that law, I had; and that was my reason for asking him the question which I put to him. I have since obtained a copy of the law, and I wish to read a few lines to refresh the memory of members on this subject. The act of April 12, 1866, entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to provide ways and means to support the Government,'" approved March 5, 1865, provides—

"That the act entitled 'An act to provide ways and means to support the Government,' approved March 3, 1865, shall be extended and construed to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury, at his discretion, to receive any Treasury notes or other obligations issued under any act of Congress, whether bearing interest or not, in exchange for any description of bonds authorized by the act to which this is an amendment; and also to dispose of any description of bonds authorized by said act, either in the United States or elsewhere, to such an amount, in such manner, and at such rates as he may think advisable, for lawful money of the United States, or for any Treasury notes, certificates of indebtedness, or certificates of deposit, or other representatives of value, which have been or which may be issued under any act of Congress; the proceeds thereof to be used only for retiring Treasury notes or other obligations issued under any act of Congress; but nothing herein contained."

This is the point to which I wish to call attention—

"shall be construed to authorize any increase of the public debt."

The interest of the public debt, Mr. Speaker, is as much a part of the public debt, and for which the people of this Government are as much bound as the principal. The act then goes on to say:

"Provided, That of United States notes not more than $10,000,000 may be retired and canceled within six months from the passage of this act, and thereafter not more than $1,000,000 in any one month."

That is why I introduced the resolution the other day. I want to know whether they have been canceled; I want to know whether the law has been complied with; I want to know whether the money has been retired according to law, and what evidence we have of that fact. That is the reason why I introduced my resolution; and one of these days, if I live long enough, I hope to get that resolution up again, and gentlemen here perhaps will then see that such a law has been passed. That is all I have to say in reference to the law.

Now, it will be seen by the law that it contemplates this and nothing more, if I comprehend it correctly. It gives the Secretary of the Treasury power to convert the seven-thirties, that is, he may issue five-twenties for seven-thirties, because six per cent. is not more than seven-thirty. That law gives the Secretary of the Treasury power to retire the compound-interest notes and to issue bonds bearing a like amount of interest to give us more time. In my opinion it authorizes him to do that and nothing more, and it was with that view I thought the bill was brought in, although I did not approve of it at the time of its passage, because it was held by some members upon this floor, as I find it held by some still, that the Secretary had power to do other things. And in confirmation of that I ask the Clerk to read half a dozen lines of what I said on that occasion. The gentleman from Ohio will find it entirely in consonance with what he has said on this subject.

The Clerk read as follows:

"A very small, almost insignificant, part of our debt is payable on demand, and the balance runs from fifteen to forty years, at the expiration of which time we shall, if republican ideas and principles prevail, be the richest and most powerful nation on the globe. The feature of this bill, which provides that the $450,000,000 of legal-tender notes, which bear no interest, and which are redeemable at no definite time, may be funded in six per cent. gold-bearing bonds, is to me so strange and unaccountable that I am astonished to find it presented to the House for consideration. This feature of the bill, if adopted, would involve an additional annual expenditure of $27,000,000 in gold, for which the people of the country must necessarily pay an additional tax. Would any prudent and sensible business man, who had given his note payable at his own option, and without interest, be likely to take up that note and give another for the same amount payable at a certain time, with interest at six per cent., payable semi-annually in gold?"

"Why, sir, the bare mention of such a transaction provokes a smile of incredulity, and yet this is precisely one of the features of this bill. The Government owes $450,000,000 on which we pay no interest, and which is redeemable whenever it suits the convenience of the Government; and yet if this bill becomes a law this $450,000,000 may be funded in bonds bearing six per cent. in gold."

Mr. PRICE. These were the views I held on the passage of that bill, and I hold the same views now. I think the majority of the House also held these views when it passed the law from which I have read, and believed that it was guarded against this evil. I say now and here, to the members of the House, as I said before, when the gentleman from Ohio so kindly yielded to me, if we have not guarded against that evil, if we have left the door open for the increase of the public debt, leaving the Secretary of the Treasury to do as he pleases, the sooner we drop all other business and attend to that the better it will be for the nation. And I hope, without unnecessary delay, the matter will be investigated and attended to. We ought to retire the interest-bearing notes; and when we have retired any amount of them, in the language of the act I have read, they ought to be canceled, which, in my opinion, means they ought to be destroyed, and destroyed by being burned.

Mr. MAYNARD. Mr. Speaker, several days ago, during the consideration of another subject, I made a statement about a matter affecting a constituent and personal friend of mine, who had been arraigned in the State of North Carolina for an offense alleged to have been committed by him, as an officer, during the war. In the course of my observations I stated that I understood this officer had been demanded as a felon by the Governor of North Carolina from the Governor of Tennessee. The Governor of North Carolina, being in the city, corrected me in the matter of his having made any such demand, and I so stated on a subsequent occasion in making a personal explanation. This morning I have received from the Governor of Tennessee a communication, which I desire, in connection with my former remarks, to present to the House.

The Clerk read as follows:

STATE OF TENNESSEE, EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT, KNOXVILLE, December 31, 1866.

HON. H. MAYNARD: I notice in a Washington paper a report of your remarks relative to the case of Captain Nelson. You gave the case substantially as the captain and I gave it to you. He was notified of the finding of a true bill against him in North Carolina, and of the intention of Governor Worth to make a requisition upon me. I told the captain to make himself easy, that I was familiar with all the facts, that I knew him to have acted under military orders as a member of General Gillem's staff, and that I would not surrender him to a rebel mob in North Carolina.

Governor Worth never made such requisition, and I attributed his not doing so to the noise made in the rebel papers, about the same time, of my prompt refusal to give up the gallant Colonel Smith, upon an application by Governor Jenkins, of Georgia, for an indictment for stealing four bales of cotton, which cotton he had seized as an officer of the Government. Had I given him up he would have gone to the penitentiary for twenty-one years, not really for stealing cotton, but for having fought through the war on the Federal side.

Previous to these occurrences Governor Peirpoint, of Virginia, addressed me a communication foreshadowing his purpose to make a demand upon me for Hon. R. R. Butler, for a time in the Federal Army, but now one of our superior court judges. I gave the Governor such an answer that no further correspondence took place between us on the subject.

I now have before me a demand upon Major General Thomas by the sheriff of Gordon county for Captain Duff, of East Tennessee, a gallant officer, who served in the Union Army during the war. Captain Duff was with a party who followed a gang of Georgia horse-thieves into Gordon county, found the Tennessee horse and a Georgia thief on him, and in the scuffle a Georgian got killed. Although Captain Duff was not in the fight, a demand was made upon the commanding general for him, the sheriff expressing his want of confidence in the civil authorities of Tennessee.

The Georgia sheriff properly understands me. I will not surrender Union officers and soldiers to the horse-thieves and bushwhackers of the rebel States to be imprisoned and hung because of their Union sentiments. They were persecuted during the rebellion and driven from their homes, and their families shamefully abused; and now it is proposed to keep it up through the courts of the rebel States, where traitors preside on the bench and traitors serve as jurors. There is too much of this thing going on in the rebel States. It ought to be met by Congress with prompt and vigorous legislation, and a stop put to all such persecution. The loyal party in Congress owe it to the brave officers of the Union Army and the gallant soldiers who fought under their commands.

I have the honor to be, &c.,

W. G. BROWNLOW,

Governor of Tennessee.

Mr. MAYNARD. I do not propose at this time to go into the general subject broached in that letter. I sought the floor in order to present that statement to the House and to the country. I will remark, however, that there is no tyranny known to mankind so inexorable and terrible as judicial tyranny. The most fearful persecutions that ever the race has been subjected to have been committed under the form of legal proceedings.

Two propositions, as law, at this time are very much pressed in all that region of country where the rebellion has prevailed. The first is, that the southern confederacy was the government de facto of that country until it was overthrown, and that consequently its edicts and decrees furnish a legal defense for all trespasses that were committed under it by the conspirators and their followers, whether arraigned for civil or criminal redress. The other proposition is, that everything done by the Federal Government for the purpose of suppressing the rebellion from the time President Lincoln called out seventy-five thousand militia until the closing act of the war, was done in contravention of the national Constitution, and was therefore void and a usurpation, furnishing no protection at all to the agents of the Government by whom the war was carried on, whether military or civil.

It is not strange that with these two propositions declared to be law rebel confiscation should be held to be valid, while confiscation by the authority of the United States Government should be held to be void and utterly disregarded. The subject is one that Congress must sooner or later address itself to. It will not do to leave—I will not say Union men of the southern country, the men that stood by the Government during the war—but it will not do to leave your own officers and soldiers subject to indictment and arrest whenever business, pleasure, or curiosity may induce them; after five, ten, or fifteen years, to visit that country which was the scene of their military exploits. It is a matter that must be provided for, so that men who, under the flag of their country, maintained its honor on the southern battle-field and in camp, shall not be subjected to annoyance. It is true at the present moment your citizens are not likely to be annoyed as are those of the southern States who went into the Army and supported the national flag; but leave them to suffer, give them no redress, and believe me the time will soon come when—

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Will my friend allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. MAYNARD. Yes, sir.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. The gentleman speaks of "your" citizens, addressing himself, as I suppose, to citizens of other States, including, of course, the State which I have the honor in part to represent.

Mr. MAYNARD. Yes, sir; I mean the States outside.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I desire to state to my friend that northern citizens are not exempt from outrages at the South even now. I had a most extraordinary case presented to me last evening by a citizen of my own State, a member of an Illinois regiment, a man by the name of Morey, who was early in the Army, and, on account of his intelligence and capacity, was detailed as a detective. After the surrender of Vicksburg he was ordered by the provost marshal of that city to go through the city and hunt up captured or stolen property of the United States. He found in the possession of a Jew two Government tents, which, under the orders of his superior officers, he took and turned over to the provost marshal. But when the civil authority, about which we hear so much, was established, and the military control was to some extent withdrawn, this soldier was indicted in the local court at Vicksburg for robbery, and held to bail in the sum of $3,000. Fortunately he had character and means enough to give security; otherwise he would have been in the jail at that place to-day or in the penitentiary at Jackson.

When his case came up (and I speak this from the record which he exhibited to me, certified by the clerk of the court) the plea was put in that the act was performed as a soldier acting under orders of a superior officer, and that he was protected by the act of Congress; but the court overruled the plea and held him on the indictment. Then his lawyer put in an application under the law to remove the case to the district court of the United States; that also the court overruled. Either by accident or design this last plea does not appear in the record.

I do not know what existing remedy there is in the present state of things, under the recent decision of the Supreme Court, for that man. He has to choose whether to go back to Mississippi, where the door of the penitentiary is yawning for him, or remain at the North, have his cognizance forfeited, and pay his $3,000. As to his release by a United States judge on a habeas corpus, there is great doubt about his getting the writ allowed, and many think the Supreme Court will hold an indemnity act unconstitutional. And, in addition to that, he told me of another case. The man to whom I have referred is a constituent of my distinguished friend and colleague before me, [Mr. FARNSWORTH,] a Union soldier, who has been lying for months and months in jail at Vicksburg, upon the absurd and false charge that he had set fire to some buildings at the time when Vicksburg was besieged; a thing which it was impossible for him to have done; and even if he had done it he would not have been amenable to any civil tribunal. He says further, that the condition of every Union man in that section of the country is absolutely horrible, and that every northern man and every Union man is leaving as fast as he can get away.

Sir, the case I have mentioned I presume is but the type of a very large class, and, as the gentlemen has said, there is scarcely an officer or soldier who fought in the Union ranks who can travel in the States lately in rebellion without subjecting himself to indictment and punishment. I see no existing adequate remedy for it. The judges disregard the United States law and trample it under foot, and there is no power that I know of to enforce it; and I say that this Congress must take prompt and effective measures to vindicate the rights of these men. We must have courage and ability and genius enough to devise something by which the lives and liberties of these loyal men shall be protected, and if we have not that courage, if we have not that ability, if we have not that disposition, our constituents will require us to leave our places here that our places may be filled by men equal to the exigencies of the times in which we live.

Mr. MAYNARD resumed the floor.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. With the permission of the gentleman from Tennessee, I will say that we need not go to Mississippi for circumstances such as were detailed by the gentleman from Illinois. In my own district one of the five tried and convicted by a military court at Indianapolis, whose case has lately been reviewed by the Supreme Court, has, within the last two months, obtained judgments against the soldiers who arrested him for $25,000 for false imprisonment. Some powder and caps were captured at the same time, and ten soldiers are now under indictment in the State of Indiana, under heavy bonds, for having taken the powder and caps from the possession of this person. This is outside of the rebel States and in a loyal State.

For my part, I certainly agree with the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. WASHBURN,] that we must take some prompt and decided steps when the judges in the State of Indiana decide that our laws are unconstitutional and refuse to allow these cases to be taken from their courts.

Mr. MAYNARD. Mr. Speaker, if the people of Indiana are not competent to redress all such cases as that suggested by the gentleman [Mr. WASHBURN,] then I am mistaken in the estimate that I formed of their character during a recent brief visit to that State.

For the case mentioned by the gentleman from Illinois, he says that he knows of no existing remedy. It used to be told as an anecdote of General Jackson, illustrative of his character, that when his Attorney General on one occasion reported that he could find no law for doing something that the general had much at heart, he sent word back to him: "Tell my Attorney General that if he cannot find law, I will find an Attorney General who can find law;" and I think that Jacksonian view of the case will present itself very strongly to the Union constituencies of each one of us.

Now, it certainly seems to me that when our fathers framed this Constitution of government they did not leave things at such loose ends that there should be no power in the government to protect a citizen of the United States in the enjoyment of his rights as such citizen upon the soil of the United States. It would have been very remarkable if they had done so.

Mr. NIBLACK. If the gentleman from Tennessee will allow me, I wish to say that the difficulty in Indiana, to which my colleague referred, grew out of a disregard of the rights of American citizens on the soil of the United States. That was the trouble. If they had obeyed the laws and resorted to the courts for the vindication of the law and the majesty and power of this Government, if they had not resorted to illegal military arrests and illegal military tribunals, there would have been no difficulty whatever. The difficulty they may now be involved in grows out of their disregard of the municipal laws of the State of Indiana.

Mr. MAYNARD. On one occasion Mr.

Clay appeared at the bar, where, with all his greatness as a statesman and ability as a lawyer, it was understood that he was not specially versed in what are called the technicalities of the law. The judge reminded him that the state of the law was according to a formula that he, the judge, laid down. "Very well," said Mr. Clay, "may it please your honor, if that is the law, all I have to say is that it ought not to be the law." And if it is the law in Indiana that arresting a traitor with arms in his hands and ammunition in his pocket, ready to turn loose thousands of the enemies of the country held as prisoners of war and arm them and organize them into a hostile army; if this is an offense, then the laws of Indiana ought to be changed, and the laws of the United States ought to be changed.

Mr. NIBLACK. All I have to say is that if the law is a bad one there is a way of getting rid of it. But the theory of the conservative men, as we call ourselves in Indiana, always has been that while laws are upon the statute-book they must be enforced. There is a law of Congress and a law of Indiana that provides for the arrest and trial in a certain way of any man guilty of treason or any other crime against the Government; but these military officers disregarded that law; they took the matter into their own hands, and by the exercise of brute military force they have involved themselves in this trouble. If there were any traitors in Indiana they could have been convicted by the courts at any time. The gentleman assumes that these men thus arrested were traitors. That is the issue, an issue that has never yet been properly tried. The Government has always declined to appeal to the courts to test that question; and it is the disregard of the plain provisions of the laws of Congress and of the State which has involved those men in all this trouble.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. With the permission of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. MAYNARD,] I will ask the gentleman from Indiana if the parties thus arrested and tried have not now in their possession the pardons of the President?

Mr. NIBLACK. To whom does the gentleman refer?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. To Milligan and others tried by a military commission at Indianapolis.

Mr. NIBLACK. I know not how that may be. But the point I make is this: before men can be called traitors they ought to be convicted of treason; and there is a way of doing that provided by the laws of Indiana, but which was not appealed to by these gentlemen.

Mr. MAYNARD. It will certainly be very gratifying to the loyal Union people of this country to hear the gentlemen from Indiana [Mr. NIBLACK,] say that there is a way by which men who are guilty of treason can be tried and punished, because a great many of them are fast coming to the conclusion that there is no means by which treason can be brought to trial much less punished.

Most of us are aware that from the beginning of this struggle there has been a school of legal politics which assumed that every measure taken by this Government for the suppression of the rebellion was in violation of the Constitution, a usurpation, and illegal and void. I need not refer to the speeches that appear in the debates of this House and the debates at the other end of the Capitol. I will mention no names; I merely state the general fact.

And I will state further, as my opinion and belief, that if that school of politics was right; if those opinions shall be established by judicial decisions to have been the law of this land, then it would have been better to have allowed our flag to trail irrecoverably in the dust under the walls of Fort Sumter; to have let this Government go into the limbo of lost and forgotten things, never more to be heard of; for the Government which does not possess within itself the power of self-preservation against rebellion, treason, and insurrection is in fact no Government.

But to return to my friend from Illinois, [Mr. WASHBURN,] who intimates that he can find no remedy for the evils I have mentioned. It strikes me that for the case he has specified there is a very simple remedy. I understand his constituent is held under the authority of what assumes to be for the time being the government of Mississippi.

As I understand, the effect of the rebellion—asserted not only by the President now in office, but by his predecessor, and by various acts of Congress—was to deprive the people of that State of the civil government which they had before the war, of all civil government, and it devolves upon the United States to guaranty to the people of that State civil government. The Supreme Court more than twenty years ago declared, as I understand the decision pronounced by the late Chief Justice, that it is the office of Congress to execute this guarantee, and that before Congress can guaranty a republican form of government in a particular case it is necessary to examine it and see whether it is such a one as in its opinion ought to be guarantied. If this be a specimen of the government of Mississippi, I think we have at our command a very short method of disposing of it—setting it aside and establishing another one that will recognize the rights of citizens of the United States.

I will not elaborate these views. I did not rise for that purpose nor for the purpose of making a speech, but simply to present the written statement which has been read. At some future time if I can have the ear of the House, I may take occasion to extend these views somewhat more in detail. But it does seem to me that we are not driven to any extreme position—anything that will shock the ordinary sense of the country; that we are not driven to the extreme of regarding these States as no longer members of the Union or of regarding them simply as Territories held by right of conquest. It appears to me that we may reach a solution of the difficulty by regarding them simply as States that for the time being are without civil government, States not in function, States whose statal powers are in abeyance, or if I may use an expression of the President, "in a condition of suspended animation;" and adopting this view we can go to work and see that the governments of those States shall be reorganized on such a basis as in our judgment is adequate to the exigency of the times and consistent with the present state of affairs. This strikes me as a simple proposition, and one which there is certainly ability enough in this House, as displayed upon many other questions, to carry out, and that without much delay or inconvenience.

Mr. WENTWORTH obtained the floor.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. With the consent of my colleague [Mr. WENTWORTH] I wish to say, that when I stated I knew no existing remedy in a case I mentioned I did not mean to be understood as saying that we could not adopt a remedy. On the other hand, I said we were bound as representatives of the people to provide some remedy. There is no existing remedy. As to that man confined in jail at Vicksburg for no offense whatever, I do not know how he is to be got out in the existing state of things.

Mr. MAYNARD. I suppose the gentleman meant to say that there was no remedy for that man; but we have in our hands the power to apply a remedy, and if we do not apply it the fault is with us.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. That is just what I said.

Mr. WENTWORTH. Mr. Speaker, alluding to some remarks which I made yesterday with reference to the decision of the Supreme Court, I find it claimed in some of the papers that the law of 1863, in the construction of which the Supreme Court was unanimous, originated with Mr. Lincoln's Cabinet, and was taken up in this House and passed by a strict party vote. On looking at the record upon the subject, I find that if this House adopted a bill under the supervision or at the suggestion of

Mr. Lincoln's Cabinet, it must have been a very short bill which I now send up to be read by the Clerk.

The Clerk read as follows:

"Whereas since the 4th day of March, 1861, the United States have been in an insurrectionary and rebellious condition, and the public safety has required that the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus should be suspended; and whereas during that time the privilege of the said writ has been several times suspended by the President of the United States, and several arrests and imprisonments have taken place under and in consequence thereof; and whereas there is not entire unanimity of opinion as to which branch of the Government possesses the constitutional power to declare such suspension: Therefore,

"Be it enacted, &c., That all such suspensions, arrests, and imprisonments, by whomsoever made or caused to be made, under the authority of the said President, shall be confirmed and made valid; and the said President, Secretaries, heads of Departments, and all persons who have been concerned in making said arrests, or in doing or advising any such acts as aforesaid, are hereby indemnified and discharged in respect thereof, and all indictments, and information, action, suits, prosecutions, and proceedings whatsoever commenced, or to be commenced, against the said President, or any of the persons aforesaid in relation to the acts and matters aforesaid, or any of them, are hereby discharged and made void.

"SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That during the existence of this rebellion the President shall be, and is hereby, invested with authority to declare the suspension of the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus, at such times and in such places, and with regard to such persons, as in his judgment the public safety may require."

Mr. WENTWORTH. Now, Mr. Speaker, if our soldiers have a right to complain of anything in the passage of the law of 1863, it certainly cannot be of Mr. Lincoln or his Cabinet. That law originated in this House; it went from this House to the Senate; the Senate amended it and added to it very materially; it came back to this House and was rejected; a committee of conference was had, and I see that it was only passed at the very close of the session. Mr. Lincoln was compelled to get a law passed through for a suspension of the habeas corpus in that shape or to have none at all. So then the responsibility for the passage of that law cannot be charged upon Mr. Lincoln or his Cabinet, or upon this House. That is all I have to say.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana, moved that the House adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and thereupon (at twenty-five minutes to four o'clock p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS.

The following petitions were presented under the rules, and referred to the appropriate committees:

By Mr. COBB: The petition of citizens of Richland Center, Richland county, State of Wisconsin, for an improvement of water communications between the Mississippi valley and the Atlantic seaboard.

By Mr. FERRY: The petition of Allan McLean, Augustus Wilcox, C. O. Thompson, L. J. Lemert, Dorus M. Fox, and 60 others, citizens of Michigan, praying for an amendment to the Constitution providing against any inequality among citizens on account of birth, race, color, &c., and for legislation removing such inequality from the District of Columbia, Territories, and the ten unrestored States.

By Mr. GARFIELD: The petition of citizens of Ravenna, Ohio, praying that no further curtailment of the national currency be made, and that national banks be not required to redeem their notes in New York.

By Mr. SCHENCK: Sundry petitions of officers of the United States Army, for the restoration of fifty cents as the commutation price of the ration.

IN SENATE.

MONDAY, January 7, 1867.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. E. H. GRAY. The Journal of Friday last was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has received, and been requested to lay before the Senate, a memorial of the Legislative Council of the Territory of New Mexico, setting forth that General James M. Carleton and others have purchased a land grant in Taos county, in that Territory, usually known by the name of the Rio Grande grant, and are seeking to have the title to that land confirmed in them; that this will do great injustice to many of the settlers who are upon this grant, who are numerous, and who have made improvements on the land, and they pray Congress to confirm the title to these lands in the actual settlers, and not regard this grant. If there be no objection, this memorial will be received and referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. RAMSEY presented the petition of Josephine Slocum, widow of Martin N. Slocum, late second lieutenant sixty-fifth regiment United States (colored) infantry, praying for a pension for herself and minor children; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. POLAND presented seven petitions of officers of the United States Army, praying for an increase of pay; which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. CHANDLER presented the petition of citizens of the town of Wheeler, Steuben county, New York, praying for the passage of House bill No. 718, to provide increased revenue from imports, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. MORGAN presented the petition of the manufacturers of white lead, red lead, and litharge, praying that the duty on the articles manufactured by them may be placed two cents per pound higher than on the raw material; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented the petition of citizens of East Bloomfield, New York, praying for the passage of House bill No. 718, to provide increased revenue from imports, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented the memorial of saw manufacturers, remonstrating against the increase of the duty on steel as proposed by House bill No. 718, to provide increased revenue from imports, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented seven memorials of consumers of steel, remonstrating against the increase of the duty on steel as proposed by House bill No. 718, to provide increased revenue from imports, and for other purposes; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented the memorial of citizens of New York, remonstrating against the passage of any act authorizing the curtailment of the national currency, or having in view the return within a limited time to specie payments, and against the enactment of any law compelling all national banks, wherever located, to redeem their notes in New York, or prohibiting national banks from paying or receiving interest on bank balances; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. WADE presented the petition of citizens of Erie county, Ohio, praying for a specific duty of one dollar per gallon on all importations of wine; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented the petition of citizens of Licking county, Ohio, praying for the passage of House bill No. 718, to provide increased revenue from imports, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. WADE. I present also the petition of George Arnold, late major of Ohio volunteers, praying for the passage of a law giving to soldiers who have lost their discharge papers the bounty to which they are entitled upon proof of their service and identity and of the loss of their discharge. I think the Committee on Military Affairs ought to look into this subject. It is a great hardship I know upon soldiers who by the accidents of war have lost their discharge papers that, as the law now stands, they cannot supply that proof by any other means, although they have evidence perfectly satisfactory. I think that equity and justice demand that a law should be passed to remedy this evil. I move the reference of this petition to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. FESSENDEN presented the petition of Thomas E. Dudley, of the first collection district of the State of South Carolina, praying for compensation for services rendered as assistant assessor in that district; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. JOHNSON. I present the petition of Thomas B. Devereux, of North Carolina, stating that he invested a fund in confederate bonds under particular circumstances set forth in the petition, and asking that under the peculiar circumstances of that investment he be indemnified to the extent of $8,000, which he lost. I move its reference to the Committee on Claims.

It was so referred.

Mr. SHERMAN presented the petition of citizens of Erie county, Ohio, praying for a specific duty of one dollar per gallon on all importations of wine; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. ANTHONY presented the petition of Benjamin W. Ham, cashier of the Providence National Bank, of Providence, Rhode Island, praying that certain taxes alleged to have been erroneously paid under a decision of the Treasurer of the United States and the Commissioner of Internal Revenue may be refunded; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. SUMNER presented the petition of Alphonso Dorn and Thomas H. Cross, employes at the Executive Mansion, praying for an addition of twenty per cent. on their present pay; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. TRUMBULL presented the petition of Charles Robidou, of Alton, Illinois, praying for services rendered as secret policeman in the army of the Cumberland; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. MORRILL presented the petition of Henry Addison and H. D. Cooke, of Georgetown, District of Columbia, representing that an inequality of taxation was imposed on the cities of Georgetown and Washington by the act of July 26, 1866, entitled "An act authorizing the construction of a jail in and for the District of Columbia," and praying for the repeal of that portion of the act making the inequality; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. HOWE presented the petition of O. E. Dreutzer, of Wisconsin, praying for compensation for services rendered as consul of the United States at Bergen, Norway, from the 5th of November, 1865, to the 26th of May, 1866; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. GRIMES presented the petition of the McGregor Western Railway Company, praying for a grant of land in alternate sections to enable them to extend their road from the terminal point in O'Brien county, Iowa, via Yankton, to a point on the Union Pacific railroad; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN.

On motion of Mr. SAULSBURY, it was Ordered, That Colonel Benjamin S. Compton have leave to withdraw from the files of the Senate his petition and papers praying for compensation for seven hundred and eighty-two bales of cotton, which he alleges were seized by a military expedition under the command of Brigadier General Ransom, and shipped to the port of Memphis and sold on account of the Government of the United States.

On motion of Mr. NESMITH, it was Ordered, That Robert W. Dunbar have leave to withdraw from the files of the Senate his memorial praying to be reimbursed for damages sustained in consequence of a revocation of his appointment as agent to take charge of public property at Port Orford, in Oregon.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. JOHNSON. I rise, sir, with no view to present a memorial, but to refer to what the honorable member from Wisconsin [Mr. Howe] is reported to have said on Friday in what might be called a colloquy between himself and myself, which I did not hear at the time, or I would then have done what I am now about to do. The honorable member supposed, as I collect from his speech, as reported, and I suppose the report is accurate, that in what I had said in relation to him it was my purpose to taunt the State of Wisconsin with having sent him to this body. I should have hoped that my friend never would for a moment have supposed that in anything I had said, or was capable of saying, I intended or could intend any reflection upon him, and particularly upon his State from his being her representative on this floor. Our relations ever since we have been together in the Senate have been upon my part, and I have no doubt upon his, entirely cordial. I have felt for him the sincerest esteem, and that esteem I know I shall continue to feel as long as we remain here and thereafter. So far from my desiring to taunt the State of Wisconsin with having him as her representative upon this floor, I know no man in that State, and I know a great many there who are members of his own party, whom I would be more glad to see upon this floor as the honorable member from Wisconsin. I could wish, as I have no doubt he would wish in regard to myself, if he spoke of my position as a Senator on this floor, that upon some of the political topics of the day his opinions coincided with my own. The opinions which he entertains, I have no doubt, are just as sincerely entertained as the opposite that I entertain. I would be the last member of the Senate to evince, even in the most distant way, any want of courtesy to any associate upon this floor. I am not conscious that I have ever done it upon any former occasion; and if I may have said anything which could be construed into any purpose of the kind to which I allude I beg the honorable Senator to be assured that it was as far from my purpose as anything that is the most absolutely foreign to any purpose I ever had, or can have, and I trust would be foreign to my own nature.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, I ought not to allow the very generous remarks just made by the Senator from Maryland to pass without saying that, although I did feel at the time that some portion of the remarks he made on Friday sounded something like a taunt, as I said at the time, yet I felt they were struck out of him in the heat of debate, that they were not the expression of a serious conviction, and they left no sting or bitterness on my part which I carried out of the Senate Chamber; indeed, they occasioned no bitterness at the time. I thought it due to myself, as well as to the course the debate had taken, that I should notice them as I did, but beyond that I certainly never meant to take any notice of them, and I meant by nothing that I said to challenge any such very ample explanation as the honorable Senator has just been pleased to make. It is true, as he says, that our relations have been as kindly heretofore as I believe it is usual for the relations between members of this body to be, and it is only proper for me to say, as we are on the subject of personal explanations, that there is no member on this floor, and has been none, for whom I have cherished any higher personal regard than I have for the Senator from Maryland.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

Mr. HOWARD. The Committee on the Pacific Railroad, to whom was referred a report of the Secretary of War communicating, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of July 24, 1866, information touching the probable cost of constructing a railroad on the route mentioned in the charter of the Northern Pacific railroad, have had the same under consideration, and instructed me to report the papers back and move that they be printed for the use of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to.

NAVY REGISTER.

Mr. ANTHONY, from the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred a resolution to print a thousand copies of the Navy Register, reported it without amendment, and it was considered and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That one thousand extra copies of the Navy Register of the United States for the year 1867 be printed for the use of the Senate.

SOLDIERS' MEDALS.

Mr. RAMSEY. The Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, to whom was referred a joint resolution (H. R. No. 221) authorizing certain medals to be distributed to honorably discharged soldiers free of postage, have instructed me to report it back and recommend its passage. It is a very short resolution, to which I presume there will be no objection. It merely authorizes the authorities of West Virginia to transmit medals through the post office to their honorably discharged soldiers. I ask for its present consideration.

By unanimous consent, the joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to authorize the adjutant general of the State of West Virginia to distribute through the mails, free of postage, to the honorably discharged soldiers of West Virginia, and to the relatives and friends of those who were killed or died of wounds or disease while in service, certain medals furnished by the Legislature of that State; and provides that the envelopes inclosing them shall be franked by the adjutant general of the State in the mode prescribed by the Postmaster General.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PAYMENT TO MASTERS OF ENLISTED SLAVES.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I move to take up for consideration Senate bill No. 459.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 459) suspending the payment of moneys from the Treasury as compensation to persons claiming the service or labor of colored volunteers or drafted men, and for other purposes, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides that the final report of the commissioners provided for in the second section of the act of Congress entitled "An act making appropriation for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1867, and for other purposes," approved July 28, 1866, shall be made through the Secretary of War to Congress; and that no money shall be paid from the Treasury, or from any fund therein, upon that report or otherwise, to any claimant under the provisions of section twenty-four of the act approved February 24, 1864, entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes,'" approved March 3, 1863, until such report shall be approved and confirmed by Congress.

Mr. JOHNSON. My colleague feels an interest in this subject. I do not see him in his seat, and I suggest that the bill be postponed until he comes in. I think that course would personally gratify him.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I think he is here or will be in the Chamber in a minute.

Mr. JOHNSON. I do not see him in his seat. The law itself which it is proposed to suspend was passed several years ago, and awards have been made to the amount of some two or three hundred thousand dollars, and a fund is now in the Treasury specifically appropriated to meet such cases. The Secretary of War or the President has renewed the commissions for the purpose of proceeding with the duty which the law imposes. We had supposed in Maryland that after Congress promised the loyal owners of slaves that if they would consent to their going into the military service of the United States they should be paid, that promise would be kept. On the faith of that promise Maryland also agreed to give, I think, about a hundred dollars in each case, and that she has paid pari passu with the Government, or rather has paid since the Government has stopped paying; and it would be exceedingly inconvenient to the loyal men of Maryland, for whom the original law was passed and who are great sufferers now by the emancipation of their slaves, that they should be deprived of this comparatively small sum; I mean comparatively small to each party. Unless there is a great public necessity for suspending the law, I should hope it would be permitted to take its course. I see that my friend and colleague is now in his seat. He knows more about the matter than I do, and can state to the Senate the situation in which our people are placed.

Mr. CRESWELL. When this subject was before the Senate at the last session I said all that I believed I could say in regard to the measure, and I have nothing further to add now. The Senate must take such action as it deems best under the circumstances.

Mr. FESSENDEN. This bill does not propose to repeal the law or interfere with the obligation of the Government, but merely to keep the Treasury in the hands of Congress, and to provide that Congress shall see what the reports are and judge how far they are satisfactory before money is paid out of the Treasury.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I think that the provision of the bill of the last session was incorporated on the motion of the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. DAVIS,] who is not now present.

Mr. FESSENDEN. There has been no legislation on the subject since the original act.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Was there not legislation at the last session?

Mr. FESSENDEN. It was brought up at the last session, but nothing was done. It was then proposed in the shape of an appropriation.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I thought that provision was made at the last session. I recollected that the Senator from Kentucky took a good deal of interest in it, and I wanted to suggest to the Senator from Maine the fact of his absence.

Mr. FESSENDEN. This does not interfere with any object the Senator from Kentucky has in view. He wants the money paid, claims it as a matter of right and contract on the part of the Government. That is not the question here. Neither is this a question of an appropriation to pay it. There have been commissions appointed under the original act to make examination and report, and the object of this bill is to direct that those reports shall be made through the Secretary of War to Congress, and that Congress shall have a chance to examine the reports and see the results arrived at before the money is paid out of the Treasury. That is the object of the bill, and a very proper one, as the Committee on Finance unanimously thought.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I did not intend to discuss the bill, but simply to suggest that the Senator from Kentucky, whose State is probably more interested in this question than any other State, had taken an interest in it at the last session, and I thought the amendment which he proposed at the last session was adopted.

Mr. FESSENDEN. No, sir.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Then I was misled.

Mr. FESSENDEN. This has reference to the original act, and does not interfere with any object he had.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. WILLIAMS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 490) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide a temporary government for the Territory of Idaho," approved March 3, 1863; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Territories.

Mr. WADE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 155) to provide an increased depth of water in the harbor improvements of the lakes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. CRESWELL asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 491) amendatory of the several acts respecting copyright; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the Library, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MORRILL asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 492) to protect the rights of married women; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

CEREALS AT THE PARIS EXPOSITION.

Mr. CATTELL asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 154) to provide for the exhibition of the cereal productions of the United States at the Paris Exposition in April next; which was read twice. It proposes to instruct the Commissioner of Agriculture to collect and prepare, as far as practicable and with as little delay as possible, suitable specimens of the cereal productions of the several States of the Union for exhibition at the Paris Exposition, and forward the specimens in proper order and condition to J. C. Derby, agent of the United States Government for the Paris Exposition at New York.

Mr. CATTELL. I hold in my hand a letter from Mr. J. C. Derby, the agent of the United States for the Paris Exposition, in which he states, under date of January 4, that only some six or seven States of this Union have so far forwarded specimens of the cereal productions of our country. It occurs to me that an interest so vast as that of the agriculture of the United States should be properly represented at the Exposition in Paris, and that no readier method could be adopted than that of instructing the Commissioner of Agriculture, who has opened correspondence with prominent gentlemen connected with this interest of our country in various parts of the country, to gather together these specimens and to forward them to the duly authorized agent, Mr. Derby, of New York, to be forwarded to the Exposition. The States which have already forwarded them are Illinois, Missouri, Kansas, Indiana, Wisconsin, Michigan, Louisiana, and California, leaving quite a number of the States which produce largely of cereals unprovided for. I have only to say, Mr. President, that having been for the last twenty years connected with both the foreign and domestic trade in cereals of this country, I am anxious to have a comparison of them in regard to their extent and their variety and their quality with those of any other nation on the face of the globe. I hope, therefore, as no time can be lost if we are to do this thing properly, that the joint resolution will pass now.

By unanimous consent the joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CONNESS. I think some provision should be made in that connection to limit or fix the expenditure that the Commissioner of Agriculture may involve the Treasury in. I should like to know from the Senator who has introduced the resolution, if any estimate can be made with regard to the expense of this proceeding. If it is to come out of the annual appropriation made for the support of the Agricultural Department, if that is to be understood, of course it is all right. I should like to know something about it.

Mr. CATTELL. I apprehend that the expenses will be so trifling as to be scarcely worthy of consideration, and I suppose it would come without the slightest difficulty out of the usual appropriation for the Agricultural Department. Samples will be furnished gratuitously with great pleasure by everybody. It is simply the trouble of preparing the packages and forwarding them, which would involve only a trifling expense, so much so as I think not to be worthy of notice.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PASSENGER STEAMSHIPS.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I offer the following resolution, and ask for its present consideration:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire into the expediency of prohibiting by law the sending of passenger steamships to sea after they have been in use a certain number of years.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I would suggest to my friend from Oregon that if the Committee on Commerce are to perfect anything useful in respect to that inquiry there had better be added to the resolution a power to compel the attendance of persons and papers; and I move to amend the resolution by adding "and that the committee have power to send for persons and papers." It is an inquiry of very considerable importance, and a subject which needs, in my judgment, a good deal of searching investigation.

The amendment was agreed to; and the resolution, as amended, was adopted.

COLONY OF AMERICANS IN TURKEY.

Mr. MORRILL submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to the Senate, if this can be done compatibly with the public interest, a copy of any official correspondence which may have taken place upon the subject of an alleged recent emigration of citizens of the United States to the dominions of the Sublime Porte for the purpose of settling and acquiring landed property there.

PENSION AGENTS.

Mr. CRAGIN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. No. 69) to provide for the payment of pensions, which was passed by the Senate at the last session and has been returned from the House of Representatives with an amendment.

Mr. HOWE. I do not want to delay the passage of that bill, but I am taken by surprise by the motion now. I shall have no objection to its being taken up to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. No. 69) to provide for the payment of pensions. The bill as passed by the Senate was in these words:

Be it enacted, That the President of the United States shall be, and he is hereby, authorized to establish agencies for the payment of pensions granted by the United States wherever, in his judgment, the public interests and the convenience of the pensioners require, and by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint all pension agents, who shall hold their offices for the term of four years and until their successors shall have been appointed and qualified, and who shall give bond, with good and sufficient sureties, for such amount and in such form as the Secretary of the Interior may approve; Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to vacate any existing office prior to an appointment by the President as herein provided.

The amendment of the House of Representatives was to strike out the proviso at the close of the bill, and in lieu of it to insert the following:

Resolved, That the number of pension agencies in any State or Territory shall in no case be increased hereafter so as to exceed three, and that no such agency shall be established in addition to those now existing in any State or Territory in which the whole amount of pensions paid during the fiscal year next preceding shall not have exceeded the sum of $500,000: And provided further, That the term of office of all pension agents appointed since the 1st day of January, A. D. 1866, shall expire at the end of thirty days from the passage of this act, and that the President shall, within fifteen days from the passage of this act, nominate to the Senate persons for pension agents in the several agencies in which pension agents have been appointed since the said 1st day of January, A. D. 1866; and that all pension agents appointed prior to said date last named, and now acting, shall continue in their respective offices until their successors shall be nominated and confirmed in accordance with the provisions of this act.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Committee on the Judiciary have reported amendments to the amendment of the House of Representatives. The first amendment of the committee is in line eleven of the House amendment, to strike out "January" and insert "October;" and in line twelve to strike out "six" and insert "five," so as to read "1st day of October, A. D. 1865," instead of "1st day of January, A. D. 1866."

Mr. HOWE. Is that amendment in the eleventh and twelfth lines only one amendment? If it is all one amendment, I object to a part of it. I have no objection to the amendment in line eleven.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment can be divided at the suggestion of the Senator, and the question can be taken in the first instance on the first portion of the amendment.

Mr. HOWE. I would rather the vote should be taken on the first amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Then the question will be on the first clause of the amendment, striking out "January" and inserting "October" in line eleven.

Mr. TRUMBULL. That amendment was proposed on the consideration of facts presented to the committee while the bill was before them, and I trust the amendment will be concurred in. No reason is given why it should not be. It reaches back to 1865.

Mr. HOWE. For what reason?

Mr. TRUMBULL. It is to go back and declare that the terms of office of those men who have been put into office simply for political purposes since the controversy that now exists arose shall expire, and that either they or somebody else shall be nominated to the Senate and confirmed. The object of the bill is to bring before the Senate these important officers, pension agents. Since the war and the large increase of pensions in the country these offices have become important and they have multiplied; they are much more numerous than they were; I think there are as many as four in some of the States of the Union; and it was thought advisable that instead of being designated as heretofore by the Secretary of the Interior, and he being left to designate them ad libitum as many as he pleased, it was better to regulate this matter by law. The bill does not appropriately, as I think, belong to the Committee on the Judiciary. We did not think so. It originally came from the Committee on Pensions, and I trust the Senator from Indiana, who is chairman of that committee, will take charge of this question. After being amended in the House and sent back to the Senate, the bill was referred at his instance to the Committee on the Judiciary, on the assumption that there was some constitutional question involved in the matter. I think, however, the Committee on the Judiciary were unanimously of the opinion that there was no constitutional question involved, but as the bill was before them they considered it and reported it back with these amendments.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. LLOYD, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (H. R. No. 828) to repeal section thirteen of "An act to suppress insurrection, to punish treason and rebellion, to seize and confiscate the property of rebels, and for other purposes," approved July 17, 1862; which thereupon received the signature of the President pro tempore of the Senate.

APPROVAL OF BILLS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. ROBERT JOHNSON, his Secretary, announced that he had approved and signed a bill (S. No. 62) to amend an act entitled "An act granting lands to the State of Oregon to aid in the construction of a military road from Eugene City to the eastern boundary of said State;" and a joint resolution (S. R. No. 123) in relation to the settlement of the accounts of William P. Wingate, collector at the port of Bangor, Maine.

SUFFRAGE IN THE DISTRICT—VETO.

The President's Secretary also announced that he was directed by the President to return to the Senate, in which it originated, the bill (S. No. 1) to regulate the elective franchise in the District of Columbia, with his objections thereto in writing.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour having expired, it becomes the duty of the Chair to call up the unfinished business of Friday; but prior to that, with the permission of the Senate, the Chair will lay before the Senate a message from the President of the United States.

The Secretary of the Senate, Hon. JOHN W. FORNEY, thereupon read the message as follows:

To the Senate of the United States:

I have received and considered a bill entitled "An act to regulate the elective franchise in the District of Columbia," passed by the Senate on the 13th of December, and by the House of Representatives on the succeeding day. It was presented for my approval on the 26th ultimo—six days after the adjournment of Congress—and is now returned with my objections to the Senate, in which House it originated.

Measures having been introduced, at the commencement of the first session of the present Congress, for the extension of the elective franchise to persons of color in the District of Columbia, steps were taken by the corporate authorities of Washington and Georgetown to ascertain and make known the opinion of the people of the two cities upon a subject so immediately affecting their welfare as a community. The question was submitted to the people at special elections, held in the month of December, 1865, when the qualified voters of Washington and Georgetown, with great unanimity of sentiment, expressed themselves opposed to the contemplated legislation. In Washington, in a vote of 6,556—the largest, with but two exceptions, ever polled in that city—only 32 ballots were cast for negro suffrage; while in Georgetown, in an aggregate of 813 votes—a number considerably in excess of the average vote at the four preceding annual elections—but one was given in favor of the proposed extension of the elective franchise. As these elections seem to have been conducted with entire fairness, the result must be accepted as a truthful expression of the opinion of the people of the District upon the question which evoked it. Possessing, as an organized community, the same popular right as the inhabitants of a State or Territory, to make known their will upon matters which affect their social and political condition, they could have selected no more appropriate mode of memorializing Congress upon the subject of this bill than through the suffrages of their qualified voters.

Entirely disregarding the wishes of the people of the District of Columbia, Congress has deemed it right and expedient to pass the measure now submitted for my signature. It therefore becomes the duty of the Executive, standing between the legislation of the one and the will of the other, fairly expressed, to determine whether he should approve the bill, and thus aid in placing upon the statute-books of the nation a law against which the people to whom it is to apply have solemnly and with such unanimity protested, or whether he should return it with his objections in the hope that upon reconsideration, Congress, acting as the representatives of the inhabitants of the seat of Government, will permit them to regulate a purely local question as to them may seem best suited to their interests and condition.

The District of Columbia was ceded to the United States by Maryland and Virginia, in order that it might become the permanent seat of Government of the United States. Accepted by Congress, it at once became subject to the "exclusive legislation" for which provision is made in the Federal Constitution. It should be borne in mind, however, that in exercising its functions as the law-making power of the District of Columbia, the authority of the national Legislature is not without limit, but that Congress is bound to observe the letter and spirit of the Constitution, as well in the enactment of local laws for the seat of Government as in legislation common to the entire Union. Were it to be admitted that the right "to exercise exclusive legislation in all cases whatsoever" conferred upon Congress unlimited power within the District of Columbia, bills of attainder and ex post facto laws might be passed and titles of nobility granted within its boundaries. Laws might be made "respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances." "The right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures," might with impunity be violated. The right of trial by jury might be denied, excessive bail required, excessive fines imposed, and cruel and unusual punishments inflicted. Despotism would thus reign at the seat of Government of a free Republic, and, as a place of permanent residence, it would be avoided by all who prefer the blessings of liberty to the mere emoluments of official position.

It should also be remembered that in legislating for the District of Columbia, under the Federal Constitution, the relation of Congress to its inhabitants is analogous to that of a Legislature to the people of a State, under their own local constitution. It does not, therefore, seem to be asking too much that, in matters pertaining to the District, Congress should have a like respect for the will and interests of its inhabitants as is entertained by a State Legislature for the wishes and prosperity of those for whom they legislate. The spirit of our Constitution and the genius of our Government require that, in regard to any law which is to affect and have a permanent bearing upon a people, their will should exert at least a reasonable influence upon those who are acting in the capacity of their legislators. Would, for instance, the Legislature of the State of New York, or of Pennsylvania, or of Indiana, or of any State in the Union, in opposition to the expressed will of a large majority of the people whom they were chosen to represent, arbitrarily force upon them, as voters, all persons of the African or negro race and make them eligible for office, without any other qualification than a certain term of residence within the State? In neither of the States named would the colored population, when acting together, be able to produce any great social or political result. Yet, in New York, before he can vote, the man of color must fulfill conditions that are not required of the white citizen; in Pennsylvania the elective franchise is restricted to white freemen; while in Indiana negroes and mulattoes are expressly excluded from the right of suffrage. It hardly seems consistent with the principles of right and justice that representatives of States where suffrage is either denied the colored man, or granted to him on qualifications requiring intelligence or property, should compel the people of the District of Columbia to try an experiment which their own constituents have thus far shown an unwillingness to test for themselves. Nor does it accord with our republican ideas that the principle of self-government should lose its force when applied to the residents of the District merely because their legislators are not, like those of the States, responsible, through the ballot, to the people for whom they are the law-making power.

The great object of placing the seat of Government under the exclusive legislation of Congress was to secure the entire independence of the General Government from undue State influence, and to enable it to discharge, without danger of interruption or infringement of its authority, the high functions for which it was created by the people. For this important purpose it was ceded to the United States by Maryland and Virginia, and it certainly never could have been contemplated, as one of the objects to be attained by placing it under the exclusive jurisdiction of Congress, that it would afford to propagandists of political parties a place for an experimental test of their principles and theories. While, indeed, the residents of the seat of Government are not citizens of any State, and are not therefore allowed a voice in the Electoral College or representation in the councils of the nation, they are nevertheless American citizens, entitled as such to every guarantee of the Constitution, to every benefit of the laws, and to every right which pertains to citizens of our common country. In all matters, then, affecting their domestic affairs, the spirit of our democratic form of Government demands that their wishes should be consulted and respected, and they taught to feel that, although not permitted practically to participate in national concerns, they are nevertheless under a paternal Government, regardless of their rights, mindful of their wants, and solicitous for their prosperity. It was evidently contemplated that all local questions would be left to their decision, at least to an extent that would not be incompatible with the object for which Congress was granted exclusive legislation over the seat of Government. When the Constitution was yet under consideration it was assumed by Mr. Madison that its inhabitants would be allowed "a municipal Legislature, for local purposes, derived from their own suffrages." When for the first time Congress, in the year 1800, assembled at Washington, President Adams, in his speech at its opening, reminded the two Houses that it was for them to consider whether the local powers over the District of Columbia, vested by the Constitution in the Congress of the United States, should be immediately exercised, and he asked them to "consider it as the capital of a great nation, advancing with unexampled rapidity in arts, in commerce, in wealth, and in population, and possessing within itself those resources which, if not thrown away or lamentably misdirected, would secure to it a long course of prosperity and self-government." Three years had not elapsed when Congress was called upon to determine the propriety of retroceding to Maryland and Virginia the jurisdiction of the territory which they had, respectively, relinquished to the Government of the United States.

It was urged, on the one hand, that exclusive jurisdiction was not necessary or useful to the Government; that it deprived the inhabitants of the District of their political rights; that much of the time of Congress was consumed in legislation pertaining to it; that its government was expensive; that Congress was not competent to legislate for the District, because the members were strangers to its local concerns; and that it was an example of a government without representation—an experiment dangerous to the liberties of the States. On the other hand, it was held, among other reasons, and successfully, that the Constitution, the acts of cession of Virginia and Maryland, and the act of Congress accepting the grant, all contemplated the exercise of exclusive legislation by Congress, and that its usefulness, if not its necessity, was inferred from the inconvenience which was felt for want of it by the Congress of the Confederation; that the people themselves, who it was said had been deprived of their political rights, had not complained and did not desire a retrocession; that the evil might be remedied by giving them a representation in Congress when the District should become sufficiently populous, and in the mean time a local Legislature; that if the inhabitants had not political rights they had great political influence; that the trouble and expense of legislating for the District would not be great but would diminish, and might in a great measure be avoided by a local Legislature; and that Congress could not retrocede the inhabitants without their consent.

Continuing to live substantially under the laws that existed at the time of the cession, and such changes only having been made as were suggested by themselves, the people of the District have not sought, by a local Legislature, that which has generally been willingly conceded by the Congress of the nation.

As a general rule, sound policy requires that the Legislature should yield to the wishes of a people, when not inconsistent with the Constitution and the laws. The measures suited to one community might not be well adapted to the condition of another; and the persons best qualified to determine such questions are those whose interests are to be directly affected by any proposed law. In Massachusetts, for instance, male persons are allowed to vote without regard to color, provided they possess a certain degree of intelligence. In a population in that State of 1,231,066, there were, by the census of 1860, only 9,602 persons of color; and of the males over twenty years of age, there were 339,086 white to 2,602 colored. By the same official enumeration there were in the District of Columbia 60,764 whites to 14,316 persons of the colored race. Since then, however, the population of the District has largely increased, and it is estimated that at the present time there are nearly 100,000 whites to 30,000 negroes. The cause of the augmented numbers of the latter class needs no explanation. Contiguous to Maryland and Virginia, the District, during the war, became a place of refuge for those who escaped from servitude, and it is yet the abiding place of a considerable proportion of those who sought within its limits a shelter from bondage. Until then held in slavery, and denied all opportunities for mental culture, their first knowledge of the Government was acquired when, by conferring upon them freedom, it became the benefactor of their race; the test of their capability for improvement began, when, for the first time the career of free industry and the avenues to intelligence were opened to them. Possessing these advantages but a limited time—the greater number perhaps having entered the District of Columbia during the later years of the war or since its termination—we may well pause to inquire whether, after so brief a probation, they are as a class capable of an intelligent exercise of the right of suffrage, and qualified to discharge the duties of official position. The people who are daily witnesses of their mode of living, and who have become familiar with their habits of thought, have expressed the conviction that they are not yet competent to serve as electors, and thus become eligible for office in the local governments under which they live. Clothed with the elective franchise, their numbers, already largely in excess of the demand for labor, would be soon increased by an influx from the adjoining States. Drawn from fields where employment is abundant, they would in vain seek it here, and so add to the embarrassments already experienced from the large class of idle persons congregated in the District. Hardly yet capable of forming correct judgments upon the important questions that often make the issues of a political contest, they could readily be made subservient to the purposes of designing persons.

While in Massachusetts, under the census of 1860, the proportion of white to colored males over twenty years of age was one hundred and thirty to one, here the black race constitutes nearly one third of the entire population, while the same class surrounds the District on all sides, ready to change their residence at a moment's notice, and with all the facility of a nomadic people, in order to enjoy here, after a short residence, a privilege they find nowhere else. It is within their power, in one year, to come into the District in such numbers as to have the supreme control of the white race, and to govern them by their own officers, and by the exercise of all the municipal authority—among the rest, of the power of taxation over property in which they have no interest. In Massachusetts, where they have enjoyed the benefits of a thorough educational system, a qualification of intelligence is required, while here suffrage is extended to all, without discrimination, as well to the most incapable, who can prove a residence in the District of one year, as to those persons of color, who, comparatively few in number, are permanent inhabitants, and having given evidence of merit and qualification, are recognized as useful and responsible members of the community. Imposed upon an unwilling people, placed, by the Constitution, under the exclusive legislation of Congress, it would be viewed as an arbitrary exercise of power, and as an indication by the country of the purpose of Congress to compel the acceptance of negro suffrage by the States. It would engender a feeling of opposition and hatred between the two races, which, becoming deep-rooted and ineradicable, would prevent them from living together in a state of mutual friendliness. Carefully avoiding every measure that might tend to produce such a result, and following the clear and well-ascertained popular will, we should assiduously endeavor to promote kindly relations between them, and thus, when that popular will leads the way, prepare for the gradual and harmonious introduction of this new element into the political power of the country.

It cannot be urged that the proposed extension of suffrage in the District of Columbia is necessary to enable persons of color to protect either their interests or their rights. They stand here precisely as they stand in Pennsylvania, Ohio, and Indiana. Here, as elsewhere, in all that pertains to civil rights, there is nothing to distinguish this class of persons from citizens of the United States; for they possess the "full and equal benefit of all laws and proceedings for the security of person and property as is enjoyed by white citizens," and are made "subject to like punishment, pains, and penalties, and to none other, any law, statute, ordinance, regulation, or custom to the contrary notwithstanding." Nor, as has been assumed, are their suffrages necessary to aid a loyal sentiment here; for local governments already exist of undoubted fealty to the Government, and are sustained by communities which were among the first to testify their devotion to the Union, and which during the struggle furnished their full quotas of men to the military service of the country.

The exercise of the elective franchise is the highest attribute of an American citizen, and, when guided by virtue, intelligence, patriotism, and a proper appreciation of our institutions, constitutes the true basis of a democratic form of government, in which the sovereign power is lodged in the body of the people. Its influence for good necessarily depends upon the elevated character and patriotism of the elector, for if exercised by persons who do not justly estimate its value and who are indifferent to its results, it will only serve as a means of placing power in the hands of the unprincipled and ambitious, and must eventuate in the complete destruction of that liberty of which it should be the most powerful conservator. Great danger is therefore to be apprehended from an untimely extension of the elective franchise to any new class in our country, especially when the large majority of that class, in wielding the power thus placed in their hands, cannot be expected correctly to comprehend the duties and responsibilities which pertain to suffrage. Yesterday, as it were, four million persons were held in a condition of slavery that had existed for generations; to-day they are free-men, and are assumed by law to be citizens. It cannot be presumed, from their previous condition of servitude, that, as a class, they are as well informed as to the nature of our Government as the intelligent foreigner who makes our land the home of his choice. In the case of the latter, neither a residence of five years, and the knowledge of our institutions which it gives, nor attachment to the principles of the Constitution, are the only conditions upon which he can be admitted to citizenship. He must prove, in addition, a good moral character, and thus give reasonable ground for the belief that he will be faithful to the obligations which he assumes as a citizen of the Republic. Where a people—the source of all political power—speak by their suffrages, through the instrumentality of the ballot-box, it must be carefully guarded against the control of those who are corrupt in principle and enemies of free institutions, for it can only become to our political and social system a safe conductor of healthy popular sentiment when kept free from demoralizing influences. Controlled through fraud and usurpation by the designing, anarchy and despotism must inevitably follow. In the hands of the patriotic and worthy our Government will be preserved upon the principles of the Constitution inherited from our fathers. It follows, therefore, that in admitting to the ballot-box a new class of voters not qualified for the exercise of the elective franchise, we weaken our system of government instead of adding to its strength and durability.

In returning this bill to the Senate, I deeply regret that there should be any conflict of opinion between the legislative and executive departments of the Government in regard to measures that vitally affect the prosperity and peace of the country. Sincerely desiring to reconcile the States with one another, and the whole people to the Government of the United States, it has been my earnest wish to co-operate with Congress in all measures having for their object a proper and complete adjustment of the questions resulting from our late civil war. Harmony between the coordinate branches of the Government, always necessary for the public welfare, was never more demanded than at the present time, and it will therefore be my constant aim to promote, as far as possible, concert of action between them. The differences of opinion that have already occurred have rendered me only the more cautious, lest the Executive should encroach upon any of the prerogatives of Congress, or, by exceeding in any manner the constitutional limit of his duties, destroy the equilibrium which should exist between the several coordinate departments, and which is so essential to the harmonious working of the Government. I know it has been urged that the executive department is more likely to enlarge the sphere of its action than either of the other two branches of the Government, and especially in the exercise of the veto power conferred upon it by the Constitution. It should be remembered, however, that this power is wholly negative and conservative in its character, and was intended to operate as a check upon unconstitutional, hasty, and improvident legislation, and as a means of protection against invasions of the just powers of the executive and judicial departments. It is remarked by Chancellor Kent that—

"To enact laws is a transcendent power; and, if the body that possesses it be a full and equal representation of the people, there is danger of its pressing with destructive weight upon all the other parts of the machinery of Government. It has therefore been thought necessary, by the most skillful and most experienced artists in the science of civil polity, that strong barriers should be erected for the protection and security of the other necessary powers of the Government. Nothing has been deemed more fit and expedient for the purpose than the provision that the head of the executive department should be so constituted as to secure a requisite share of independence, and that he should have a negative upon the passing of laws; and that the judiciary power, resting on a still more permanent basis, should have the right of determining upon the validity of laws by the standard of the Constitution."

The necessity of some such check in the hands of the Executive is shown by reference to the most eminent writers upon our system of government, who seem to concur in the opinion that encroachments are most to be apprehended from the department in which all legislative powers are vested by the Constitution. Mr. Madison, in referring to the difficulty of providing some practical security for each against the invasion of the others, remarks that—

"The legislative department is everywhere extending the sphere of its activity, and drawing all power into its impetuous vortex." "The founders of our republics" "seem never to have recollected the danger from legislative usurpations, which, by assembling all power in the same hands, must lead to the same tyranny as is threatened by Executive usurpations." "In a representative republic, where the executive magistracy is carefully limited, both in the extent and the duration of its power, and where the legislative power is exercised by an assembly which is inspired by a supposed influence over the people, with an intrepid confidence in its own strength, which is sufficiently numerous to feel all the passions which actuate a multitude, yet not so numerous as to be incapable of pursuing the objects of its passions by means which reason prescribes—it is against the enterprising ambition of this department that the people ought to indulge all their jealousy and exhaust all their precautions." "The legislative department derives a superiority in our governments from other circumstances. Its constitutional powers being at once more extensive and less susceptible of precise limits, it can with the greater facility mask, under complicated and indirect measures, the encroachments which it makes on the coordinate departments." "On the other side, the executive power being restrained within a narrower compass, and being more simple in its nature, and the judiciary being described by land-marks still less uncertain, projects of usurpation by either of these departments would immediately betray and defeat themselves. Nor is this all. As the legislative department alone has access to the pockets of the people, and has in some constitutions full discretion, and in all a prevailing influence over the pecuniary rewards of those who fill the other departments, a dependence is thus created in the latter which gives still greater facility to encroachments of the former." "We have seen that the tendency of republican governments is to an aggrandizement of the legislative, at the expense of the other departments."

Mr. Jefferson, in referring to the early constitution of Virginia, objected that by its provisions all the powers of government—legislative, executive, and judicial—resulted to the legislative body, holding that—

"The concentrating these in the same hands is precisely the definition of despotic government. It will be no alleviation that these powers will be exercised by a plurality of hands and not by a single one. One hundred and seventy-three despots would surely be as oppressive as one." "As little will it avail us that they are chosen by ourselves. An elective despotism was not the Government we fought for, but one which should not only be founded on free principles, but in which the powers of government should be so divided and balanced among several bodies of magistracy as that no one could transcend their legal limits without being effectually checked and restrained by the others. For this reason that convention which passed the ordinance of government laid its foundation on this basis: that the legislative, executive, and judiciary departments should be separate and distinct, so that no person should exercise the powers of more than one of them at the same time. But no barrier was provided between these several powers. The judiciary and executive members were left dependent on the legislative for their subsistence in office, and some of them for their continuance in it. If, therefore, the Legislature assumes executive and judiciary powers, no opposition is likely to be made, nor, if made, can be effectual; because in that case they may put their proceedings into the form of an act of assembly, which will render them obligatory on the other branches. They have accordingly, in many instances, decided rights which should have been left to judiciary controversy; and the direction of the Executive during the whole time of their session is becoming habitual and familiar."

Mr. Justice Story, in his Commentaries on the Constitution, reviews the same subject, and says:

"The truth is, that the legislative power is the great and overruling power in every free Government." "The representatives of the people will watch with jealousy every encroachment of the Executive Magistrate, for it trenches upon their own authority. But who shall watch the encroachment of these representatives themselves? Will they be as jealous of the exercise of power by themselves as by others?" "There are many reasons which may be assigned for the engrossing influence of the legislative department. In the first place, its constitutional powers are more extensive, and less capable of being brought within precise limits than those of either of the other departments. The bounds of the executive authority are easily marked out and defined. It reaches few objects, and those are known. It cannot transcend them without being brought in contact with the other departments. Laws may check and restrain and bound its exercise. The same remarks apply with still greater force to the judiciary. The jurisdiction is, or may be, bounded to a few objects or persons; or, however general and unlimited, its operations are necessarily confined to the mere administration of private and public justice. It cannot punish without law. It cannot create controversies to act upon. It can decide only upon rights and cases as they are brought by others before it. It can do nothing for itself. It must do everything for others. It must obey the laws; and if it corruptly administers them, it is subjected to the power of impeachment. On the other hand, the legislative power, except in the few cases of constitutional prohibition, is unlimited. It is forever varying its means and its ends. It governs the institutions and laws and public policy of the country. It regulates all its vast interests. It disposes of all its property. Look but at the exercise of two or three branches of its ordinary powers. It levies all taxes; it directs and appropriates all supplies; it gives the rules for the descent, distribution, and devises of all property held by individuals. It controls the sources and the resources of wealth. It changes at its will the whole fabric of the laws. It molds at its pleasure almost all the institutions which give strength and comfort and dignity to society. In the next place, it is the direct, visible representative of the will of the people in all the changes of times and circumstances. It has the pride as well as the power of numbers. It is easily moved and steadily moved by the strong impulses of popular feeling and popular odium. It obeys, without reluctance, the wishes and the will of the majority for the time being. The path to public favor lies open by such obedience; and it finds not only support, but impunity, in whatever measures the majority advises, even though they transcend the constitutional limits. It has no motive, therefore, to be jealous or scrupulous in its own use of power; and it finds its ambition stimulated and its arm strengthened by the countenance and the courage of numbers. These views are not alone those of men who look with apprehension upon the fate of republics; but they are also freely admitted by some of the strongest advocates for popular rights and the permanency of republican institutions." "Each department should have a will of its own." "Each should have its own independence secured beyond the power of being taken away by either or both of the others. But at the same time the relations of each to the other should be so strong that there should be a mutual interest to sustain and protect each other. There should not only be constitutional means but personal motives to resist encroachments of one or either of the others. Thus ambition would be made to counteract ambition; the desire of power to check power; and the pressure of interest to balance an opposing interest." "The judiciary is naturally, and almost necessarily, (as has been already said,) the weakest department. It can have no means of influence by patronage. Its powers can never be wielded for itself. It has no command over the purse or the sword of the nation. It can neither lay taxes nor appropriate money nor command armies nor appoint to office. It is never brought into contact with the people by constant appeals and solicitations and private intercourse, which belong to all the other departments of Government. It is seen only in controversies or in trials and punishments. Its rigid justice and impartiality give it no claims to favor, however they may to respect. It stands solitary and unsupported, except by that portion of public opinion which is interested only in the strict administration of justice. It can rarely secure the sympathy or zealous support either of the Executive or the Legislature. If they are not (as is not unfrequently the case) jealous of its prerogatives, the constant necessity of scrutinizing the acts of each, upon the application of any private person, and the painful duty of pronouncing judgment that these acts are a departure from the law or Constitution, can have no tendency to conciliate kindness or nourish influence. It would seem, therefore, that some additional guards would, under such circumstances, be necessary to protect this department from the absolute dominion of the others. Yet rarely have any such guards been applied; and every attempt to introduce them has been resisted with a pertinacity which demonstrates how slow popular leaders are to introduce checks upon their own power, and how slow the people are to believe that the judiciary is the real bulwark of their liberties." "If any department of the Government has undue influence, or absorbing power, it certainly has not been either the executive or judiciary."

In addition to what has been said by these distinguished writers, it may also be urged that the dominant party in each House may, by the expulsion of a sufficient number of members, or by the exclusion from representation of a requisite number of States, reduce the minority to less than one third. Congress, by these means, might be enabled to pass a law, the objections of the President to the contrary notwithstanding, which would render impotent the other two departments of the Government, and make inoperative the wholesome and restraining power which it was intended by the framers of the Constitution should be exerted by them. This would be a practical concentration of all power in the Congress of the United States—this, in the language of the author of the Declaration of Independence, would be "precisely the definition of despotic Government."

I have preferred to reproduce these teachings of the great statesmen and constitutional lawyers of the early and later days of the Republic rather than to rely simply upon an expression of my own opinions. We cannot too often recur to them, especially at a conjuncture like the present. Their application to our actual condition is so apparent that they now come to us a living voice, to be listened to with more attention than at any previous period of our history. We have been and are yet in the midst of popular commotion. The passions aroused by a great civil war are still dominant. It is not a time favorable to that calm and deliberate judgment which is the only safe guide when radical changes in our institutions are to be made. The measure now before me is one of those changes. It initiates an untried experiment for a people who have said, with one voice, that it is not for their good. This alone should make us pause; but it is not all. The experiment has not been tried, or so much as demanded by the people of the several States for themselves. In but few of the States has such an innovation been allowed as giving the ballot to the colored population without any other qualification than a residence of one year, and in most of them the denial of the ballot to this race is absolute, and by fundamental law placed beyond the domain of ordinary legislation. In most of those States the evil of such suffrage would be partial; but, small as it would be, it is guarded by constitutional barriers. Here the innovation assumes formidable proportions, which may easily grow to such an extent as to make the white population a subordinate element in the body-politic.

After full deliberation upon this measure, I cannot bring myself to approve it, even upon local considerations, nor yet as the beginning of an experiment on a larger scale. I yield to no one in attachment to that rule of general suffrage which distinguishes our policy as a nation. But there is a limit, wisely observed hitherto, which makes the ballot a privilege and a trust, and which requires of some classes a time suitable for probation and preparation. To give it indiscriminately to a new class, wholly unprepared by previous habits and opportunities, to perform the trust which it demands, is to degrade it, and finally to destroy its power; for it may be safely assumed that no political truth is better established than that such indiscriminate and all-embracing extension of popular suffrage must end at last in its destruction.

ANDREW JOHNSON.

WASHINGTON, January 5, 1867.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair.) The bill is now before the Senate for reconsideration, and the question is: Shall the bill pass, the objections of the President to the contrary notwithstanding? By the terms of the Constitution this vote must be taken by yeas and nays.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I move that the message of the President be printed, and that the further consideration of the subject be postponed until to-morrow.

Mr. MORRILL. So far as the printing of the document is concerned, that seems to have been anticipated; it is already printed and on our tables.

Mr. SAULSBURY. We have not had time to read it, all of us.

Mr. MORRILL. I hope, Mr. President, that the Senate feel themselves sufficiently informed or possessed of the opinions of this document to enable them to vote upon the bill at the present time. Whether the question in its present form of postponement is debatable or not, I do not propose to state more than simply the points raised in the message, and to say that so far as I am concerned I feel no embarrassment on the question; for there are but three distinct points of objection raised at all by this message, and each of those was considered at large by the Senate when the bill was under discussion. I will not occupy the attention of the Senate at this moment. I hope the Senate will come to a vote at the present time.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I consider that it is nothing but respectful to the chief executive officer of this country that the message which he has sent to this body should be printed. It is true that since it has been brought to the Senate, it has been laid on our tables in a printed form, but a good many of us have had no opportunity of reading it, or hardly of hearing it read. We have been necessarily called out of the Chamber by persons whom we are bound to see. Being a communication from the President of the United States, it is due to him, whatever may be his political position, or however antagonistic to his may be the position of a majority of the Senate, that this message should be printed and calmly and deliberately considered; and on to-morrow, the first day after it has been delivered to the Senate, the honorable chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia may be able to show to us some reasons why perhaps the bill should be passed, the objections of the President to the contrary notwithstanding. I should like to look into the reasons assigned by the Chief Magistrate of the nation why he has felt it his duty to interpose his objection and to forbid the passage of this law, as far as he is concerned. There is no need for haste. I presume that the bill will pass over the President's veto; but give us time to look into the reasons assigned by the President, and above all, he being the chief executive officer of the country, let us treat him and his messages with that respect which is always due to the Chief Magistrate of the country.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL. I do not propose to occupy the attention of the Senate in submitting remarks at large upon the message, but to advert to the points as I have gathered them as the document has been read.

I understand that the first objection which the President makes to the passage of this bill is that it is against the popular will of this District. I had occasion to say when this bill was under consideration that that fact does not appear. It was not made to appear before the committee, and I have not seen the evidence of it in the Senate. The evidence which was relied upon here on a former occasion, that which is relied on by the President, is a vote of the electors qualified to vote in the ordinary affairs of the District. Now, the objection I took—perhaps it was more lawyer-like than otherwise—was that this was a subject upon which those electors qualified to vote in ordinary affairs were not qualified to act. This is a popular question; or, in other words, it is a question of popular rights. It does not belong exclusively or peculiarly to the persons who are qualified by law to vote in this District upon the ordinary affairs of the District.

But, then, on this subject there is a more conclusive answer still; and that is that this question does not belong to the people of this District in any sense whatever. This District belongs, in the highest sense and the strongest sense, to the people of the United States, and upon all questions of popular rights here the people of the United States, and not the people of the District, are to control, I take it. We are the representatives of this District as we are the representatives of the country at large; and beside us this District has no representative, and by the Constitution was not expected to have. So in the sense that this question is a question of popular rights, the people of this District have no control over the subject at all. It is a question, I repeat, belonging entirely to the American people.

I said on a former occasion all I then deemed necessary or now deem necessary to say if I were to discuss this question more at large.

The next objection which the President takes to this bill is that it violates the right of local government which this people have. Why, sir, what rights of local government have the residents of this District? Was this District organized in the sense of government? Was it ever designed that this capital should be a government? Certainly not; otherwise they would have been provided with a local Legislature, as they are not; otherwise this District would have been provided with representation, either by Representatives, Senators, or Delegates, neither of which is there. In no just sense whatever I conceive is the District of Columbia a government, either local or general, and the questions of local self-government do not arise here. It is the capital of the United States; that is all; exclusive jurisdiction is given to the representatives of the nation. It is the home, the local home, the residence of the representatives of the American people, over which they have exclusive control; and, sir, no local government was contemplated here originally. When this grant was provided for in the Constitution of the United States, the history of the times show that no local government was contemplated, and in conformity with the general expectation it was governed originally and in the beginning by commissioners chosen directly by Congress—governed as what? Governed as the capital of the United States, and that was all.

The next objection I notice upon which the President lays stress, is that of the supposed antagonism between the races which it is said will arise here, and arising here will spread throughout the country to the detriment of the inferior race. I had occasion to anticipate this objection when the bill was before the Senate before; of course I shall not detain the Senate by repeating now what I then said. I had supposed, I may be permitted to remark, that this was a popular delusion, and would not be repeated as an argument by the Executive of the nation why justice should not be done to a defenseless race.

Fourth, and the last statement: I hardly know that I ought to say it is an objection to the passage of this bill, but the fourth specification or statement in this message is that the dangers to be apprehended to popular liberty in this country arising from the encroachments of the legislative rather than the executive department of the Government. That may be so or it may not; I know there has been much speculation on that subject; but it is certainly time that an argument on that point, whichever may be found to be the state of the case, has no relevancy whatever to this measure. If the danger is precisely as the President apprehends, it is not a reason, it is not an argument why this bill should not pass, it has no reference to it; and as I propose to endeavor to get a vote on this bill to-day, I shall postpone the consideration of that subject to some future occasion, when certainly it can be discussed with as much propriety as upon this bill. With these remarks I content myself with asking for the passage of the bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, when this bill was considered at the beginning of the session I contented myself by simply voting for it, but only after serious reflection and after listening to all that was said on either side of the question. We are now required to reconsider our opinions. There comes to us a message from the President of the United States stating in the ordinary way his objections to the passage of this bill. The message is respectful in its terms, made in pursuance of his constitutional duty, and it ought to be fairly and fully considered. There is nothing new in the message so far as argument is concerned. The statements of the message are but a resumé of the arguments already adduced in the Senate, where the subject was fully and ably debated; and probably nothing is said in the message that was not more fully said in the Senate. Still, as it is the duty of the President, where he withholds his assent to a bill passed by Congress, to communicate his reasons to the body in which the bill originated, it becomes our duty to give to his reasons a respectful consideration.

The only criticism I can make on the message itself is on that part of it in which the President undertakes to warn the people of the United States against the dangers of the abuse of legislative power. He quotes from Judge Story that the legislative branch may absorb all the powers of the Government. He quotes also the familiar language of Mr. Jefferson, that one hundred and seventy tyrants are more dangerous than one tyrant. I do not think that there is any occasion for such a warning, because I am not aware that in this bill Congress has even assumed any doubtful power. The President himself admits that Congress has absolute legislative power over this District, as full power as any State Legislature could have, unrestrained by a constitution. The power of Congress over this District is without limit, and therefore in prescribing who shall vote for mayor and city council of this city it cannot be claimed that we usurp power or exercise a doubtful power. The only question is as to the discretionary exercise of a clearly admitted power.

So far as the President's argument as to the dangers from the legislative power is concerned, I submit that there can be but little danger from Congress; for our acts are but the reflection of the will of the people. This body—the most permanent branch of the legislative authority—is but twice removed from the will of the people. We are elected by members of the State Legislatures, who are elected annually or biennially by the people of the respective States, and one third of this body is changed every two years, so that after all it represents the popular will of the States who send us here. The House of Representatives is more directly the representative of the people, being immediately elected by them. The recent acts of Congress at the last session, those acts upon which the President and Congress separated, were submitted to the people, and after a very full canvass and a very able one, in which great numbers of speeches were made on both sides and documents were circulated, the people, who are the common masters of the President and Congress, decided in favor of Congress. Unless, therefore, there is an inherent danger from a republican Government, resting solely upon the will of the people, there is no occasion for the warning of the President. Unless the judgment of one man is better than the combined judgment of a great majority, he should have respected their decision, and not continue a controversy in which our common constituency have decided that he was wrong.

I have not seen any effort on the part of this Congress to unreasonably curb the Executive or to assume any doubtful authority. For the last twenty or thirty years, and ever since the time of General Jackson, there has been a growing feeling in this country that the danger of an undue increase of executive power was the imminent one. The President was not only using his share of the legislative power, because by his veto he controls at least one third of the legislative power, but he was greatly increasing his power by the use of the executive patronage. There has been no time in the history of our Government when the executive patronage has been used to a more dangerous extent than it has been within the last six months. Usually the controversy arises within a party; the President selects agents within his party to administer the executive functions; but by the singular position of events now, the President goes outside of the political party which elected him, goes beyond those who contributed to his election, and selects agents outside of that organization to perform nearly all the executive functions of the Government.

But it is not necessary to pursue this matter; I wished simply to refer to it. The language of the message, as I have said, is courteous: I wish the President in his verbal speeches had always been as courteous and kind in his remarks about Congress as he has been in his messages. If so, it would probably have tended to prevent a great deal of the bitterness of feeling that may have been shown in the recent canvass.

But to come to the question itself: the first objection made by the President is that the people of this District are opposed to this measure. If this were a question whether one mill or two mills or ten mills on the dollar should be levied on their property, I would say that we ought to defer to the wishes of the people of the District. If it were a question whether a new court-house should be built, or any question affecting alone the people of this District, the people of the District ought to be consulted.

When the President says that in local matters we ought to defer to the people of this District, I think he is right. Congress has never been as liberal to the people of the District in conferring political power as I think it ought to have been. My impression has been for years that we ought to form a legislative assembly, or something in the nature of a legislative assembly, in this District, and confer upon it full power over local affairs, and many of the laws introduced here and passed, on the motion of the District Committee, ought to be passed by their local authorities; and whenever such a proposition is made here I shall be most ready to vote for it. Indeed, the growing wants of one hundred thousand souls, the wealth that is accumulating here, the industries that are being built up, the railroads that have been and are being constructed here, all demand some kind of local legislative authority, and I am perfectly willing to give that local legislative authority to the people of the District.

But that is not the question here. This is a question as to who shall vote. This is peculiarly a question for Congress to determine. Even in a State it is not left to the local Legislature to determine who shall vote. The Legislature of Ohio does not prescribe the qualifications of a voter in that State. I believe in no State of the Union can the Legislature prescribe the qualifications of a voter. The prescription of who shall vote is the highest act of power in any government. It is an act of the people. After it is once fixed it is only by a change of the Constitution that the subject can be reached. The people themselves, through a convention duly elected, prescribe who shall vote; and even if legislative power should be conferred upon the people of this District no authority would be given to them to say who should vote. That must be fixed by the supreme legislative authority, and in the District it is admitted to be in Congress.

Now that the white people of this District should meet together and say that other people, equally interested with them, shall not vote is an assumption of authority not justified by reason. What right have the white people of this District to say that the negroes shall not vote, any more than the negroes have to say that the whites shall not vote, except that they are the most numerous? The result was, when they called an election, not in pursuance of a law, not in accordance with law, but without law, to determine who should vote, as a matter of course a great many people remained away, and only those voted who were in favor of excluding the negroes from voting. I do not pay the slightest attention to this vote of the people of the District. We are bound to legislate for them ourselves. We prescribe who shall vote in this District. It is a power clearly conferred upon us; and in the exercise of that power I felt bound to take the broadest democratic rule, to give to every one affected by the legislative authority of this District a right to vote directly or indirectly. So far as the families, the women and children, are concerned, we know that they are represented by their husbands, by their parents, by their brothers, by those who are connected with them by domestic ties; but so far as the black people of this District are concerned, we knew that the white people generally were hostile to them; jealous of them; generally had a feeling of strong prejudice against them. Now to say that the white people of this District should vote for the black people was simply saying that the black people had no rights whatever which the white people were bound to respect.

It has been the history in all Governments in all struggles for liberty that the persons in possession of power have always been the last to share it with the others. If it is left to the governing classes of England they will not extend the elective franchise to the masses of the people of England. A controversy is going on, memorable in its character, at this moment in England. A very small proportion of the white male citizens in England vote; and the struggle now there is, not for universal suffrage, but it is a struggle of a class to get into the favored class. A singular spectacle is presented of men of intelligence, of the highest merit, of education, who have graduated at their colleges, being excluded from the right to vote because they have not property. Every person would say that such men, graduates of colleges, men of intelligence, ought to vote; but they cannot in England extend the franchise by any general rule without reaching the body of the people; and when that proposition is there made it is met by the very same arguments that are here adduced by the President of the United States. It is objected that it is dangerous to go down to a lower grade in society, because you thereby admit to the polls ignorant people unfit to exercise political power. One of the expressions used by the President is almost in the very words uttered by a member of the British Parliament recently, that it would not do to trust the people to levy taxes, because they did not own the property to be taxed. That has been the common argument with which universal suffrage has been resisted in all Governments.

In our own country our institutions are founded mainly upon those of England, and it took more than a hundred years to establish in this country the right of general or universal suffrage; and even now in the State of Massachusetts, which is considered one of the most democratic or republican of States, they exclude a portion of their people because they cannot read or write. It seems to me that now, when we are founding a basis for civil society in this District, we ought to make it as extensive as possible; we ought to give every person whose property is affected by local taxation some right to be represented in the authority which imposes those taxes. If this was a corporation—and so far as the city of Washington is concerned it is but a corporation—we ought to apply to that corporation the same principle that is applied to all other money corporations, that every person who is interested either in the protection of his rights or in the protection of his property should have some voice, directly or indirectly, in the Government.

The next objection which is urged by the President is, that it is dangerous to the rights of the whites to extend the suffrage to the negroes. That is an argument which, I think, answers itself. He admits in this message that the colored population is less than one third of the people of this District. The white people have nearly all the property; they have the control of every organ of public opinion; they have the control of every newspaper; they have control of nearly all the churches; they are intelligent; they are white; and yet it is said that one hundred thousand of them cannot enter into a competition with thirty thousand negroes! It is simply absurd.

But it is said that these negroes are ignorant. So they are. And if I could have drawn any line of distinction between those who are intelligent and those who are not intelligent I would do so. I listened with great interest to the argument of the Presiding Officer of this body on this subject. I should have been willing, for the present at least, to apply an intelligence qualification to the negro voters; but I came to the conclusion that it was impossible. You cannot draw a line and say that a man who can read and write shall vote, and that a man who cannot read and write shall not vote. It is an uncertain test, a difficult test to be applied in any Government. It is unjust here, because by your laws you have prevented this class from learning to read and write. The mere habit of reading and writing is no test of intelligence. It is true a man who can read and write has opportunities of acquiring intelligence which one who cannot read or write has not; but it is no sufficient test upon which to base the great right of suffrage. The very difficulty of drawing a line compelled us either to exclude the whole black population in this District from all right to vote or else to extend it to all alike without distinction of race or color. I think, therefore, the Senate of the United States did perfectly right when they abolished all distinctions upon this subject, and as a general rule allowed every head of a family or every male citizen to exercise the elective franchise.

The President says this is not the time to try the experiment. I say that it is precisely the time. We have recently with great unanimity passed a constitutional amendment in which we have endeavored to persuade in a gentle way the people of the southern States to give some degree of political power or political rights to the negroes of the South. Since we have passed that amendment we cannot sit here and refuse to give to the negro population of this District some political power, as we have in a measure by our constitutional amendment bribed the people of the southern States to extend some political power to their negroes. It seems to me that now is the time, at the end of this great civil war when general principles are discussed more than ever before, to start out upon correct principles.

The President says this is not the place for this experiment. I say it is the place of all others, because if the negroes here abuse the political power we give to them we can withdraw the privilege at any moment. It is always within the power of Congress to revoke this authority. If it be shown hereafter that by their ignorance, or their folly, or their crime, they are endangering or will endanger civil society in this community, we can withdraw at any time the power which we now confer and resume our original functions. When the power is conferred by a State it cannot be withdrawn except by a change of the Constitution, but here we can withdraw it.

I have always thought, and I have often been taunted for saying, that this District was the paradise of free negroes. It is the paradise of free negroes, and it ought to be. Heretofore they were under the ban of prejudice; in the southern States the great mass of them were slaves; in the northern States they could not enjoy any rights; in the city of New York they were cruelly mobbed while we were in the midst of the war in which they served us faithfully as soldiers and laborers. In nearly all of the States they are now denied political power. Here political power can be conferred upon them with safety; I will say for the free negroes in this District that they will exercise their new power with reasonable moderation and intelligence. They are now making rapid progress in education. They are sustaining their own schools without public money, although they are taxed to maintain the schools for white children. They are building churches. They are now showing evidences of intelligence and a degree of industry and order which some classes of the white people do not. I believe they are rapidly advancing in the scale of civilization, and that, if not now, they will soon be prepared to vote with as much intelligence as other citizens of the District.

But there is another reason why we can confer this power here, even before it is conferred in the States. Here this element can do no harm. The people in this District vote simply upon municipal questions; they exercise no political power; they have no voice either in the Senate or the House of Representatives. The questions upon which they are called to vote are simply questions of dollars and cents, money matters which affect them in common with other property holders, and upon which they will vote with as much discretion as others.

I say, therefore, that this is the time and this is the very place to try this experiment. I desire for one to see it extended all over the country. I have no doubt that the people of Ohio, who have for fifty years excluded the black population from voting, will, in their own good time, and in their own way, without any interference from outsiders, allow the negro population of that State, which is very small, participation in the elective franchise, and probably place them on an equality with the whites. I have no doubt this will be done. The State, as a political community, would not allow anybody else to interfere with their power over this subject, but when the Constitution is revised in its regular course, this discrimination against our negro citizens will be removed, and it may be done sooner.

Notice that the Democratic party, in the hope to make a popular issue, have invited the controversy in our State by passing resolutions in their county conventions declaring that they are very much opposed to negro suffrage in Ohio.

I for one am willing to accept their challenge. Our people are ready for the contest, and will not shrink from the universal application of a great principle from a narrow prejudice of caste. I am willing to extend to the few negroes in the State of Ohio the elective franchise on precisely the same terms that it is now given to all other male citizens of legal age. When the question is made—and we will make it in our own good time—it will be carried, and then our Democratic friends, instead of appealing to the narrow prejudice against the negro, will be appealing to the negro for his vote.

I have perhaps said more than it was necessary to say at this time, because I take it we have all formed and expressed by our votes our opinions on this matter, and there is but little doubt as to the result. The message of the President admits the general principle that an intelligent negro ought to vote. We say we can draw no satisfactory test of intelligence and prefer a general rule applicable to white and black. Here we differ, and I for one appeal with confidence to the sober reason of our common constituents. I believe that experience will demonstrate the wisdom of this act, as it has the kindred act of emancipation in this District.

Mr. COWAN. Mr. President, I had not intended to say a word on this subject in defense of the message of the Executive, and I should not do so now had it not been attacked. If it was the design of the majority of the Senate to force this measure to immediate consideration and to an early vote, they should have refrained themselves from attacking the message. However, that was perfectly legitimate. I rise more particularly for the purpose of saying that I differ entirely with the honorable Senator from Maine in the expression of that sentiment of his, that the people of this District had nothing to do with this question. I do not know whether I caught his exact words, but I endeavored to get their substance. If that proposition be true, then this whole Government from top to bottom, our institutions all, State and national, are based upon a wrong foundation. What, sir, the people of this District have nothing to do with this question! Who else have anything to do with it? What have the people of Maine to do with it? What have the people of Ohio to do with it? What have the people of Pennsylvania to do with it? It is the first time in my life that I ever heard the claim set up on the part of an outside people to interfere with the legislation of those who are affected by the legislation. Will any legislation of the mayor and councils of the city of Washington, or any legislation of the municipal authorities of this District of Columbia affect the people of Maine in any way, or affect the people of any State in any way, or any people outside of the limits of the District? If they are not affected, how comes it that they have a right to regulate the internal affairs of the District here? By what warrant would Pennsylvania undertake to regulate the internal legislation of New Jersey? Would not the answer be obvious at once, "Does this legislation affect you?" By what warrant would the people of New Jersey interfere in the election of officers in Pennsylvania? Is not the answer there equally obvious: "Are you to be governed by these officers?" Why, Mr. President, it is a fundamental principle in all our institutions, or else I have very much misunderstood them, that it is to the people alone that these questions are to be referred.

Yes, but the honorable Senator says we have exclusive legislative power over the District of Columbia. We have exclusive power of legislation; what for? To tyrannize over the people of the District of Columbia? To contravene their will, or to carry it out and embody it in our legislation? Which of the two? Was it intended by the founders of this Republic, when they put the District under the guardianship of Congress, the great council of the nation, that the people should be servants; that they should be slaves; that their will should go for naught in the regulation of their municipal affairs? I have always understood that the very reverse was the case; that it was thought, from the magnanimity of this great national council, the District of Columbia would receive more liberal legislation than if it had a local Legislature of its own.

What was the purpose of this grant of exclusive legislation over the District of Columbia? Was it for the purpose of making this a hunting-ground for experimenters? Was it to make it an arena in which all the new-fangled notions of modern times could be tried at the expense of the people of the District, disregarding their will and their wishes, their almost unanimous will; or was it to give this Government simply that control over the District which was necessary to enable us to carry on the Government? Can any man furnish a motive why our authority, our tyrannical authority, our arbitrary authority, should extend further than that? If there is a single one I should like to hear it. We have a right to that extent, to enable us to govern the nation well, to control the District of Columbia; but that gives us no right to disregard the will of the people of the District of Columbia, and trample upon their wishes, and introduce among them, against their will, an experiment which has never yet been tried upon the continent.

To say that the people who are to be affected by the measure ought to have no voice in the question is laying the ax to the very root of the tree of liberty. It is to put the bar at the very foundation of the edifice and to overturn it. The people of the District of Columbia are a free people, a distinct, separate, independent community, as much so as the people of Maine, or the people of Pennsylvania, or the people of Ohio, with the same rights; and those rights are to be preserved by us, not trampled upon.

Now, what is the question? This District is inhabited by two different races. Gentlemen say this argument has all been probed to the bottom; it has all been answered. I beg leave to say that I think it has not been probed to the bottom; I think the question has never been argued down as deeply into the nature of things as it might be. This is not a question as to the admission of a certain number of citizens to the elective franchise, as it is in England. It is an entirely different question. This District is inhabited by two races of people, distinct races. How distinct? So distinct as to prevent anything like social equality. Is not that a fact? If there were no facts before the Committee on the District of Columbia to show that there was a majority of the people of this District opposed to this measure, I suppose that committee will agree that it is a fact that the distinction of races prevents social equality. I think that cannot be denied.

Then a question arises immediately behind that: if the difference between the two races prevents social equality, is it not enough to bar political equality? Honorable Senators say: "No; we will grant political equality." You may grant, if you please, a chance to try it; but you cannot grant the equality. That is a thing lying out of your reach; lying within the nature of the races themselves. Pass what laws you please, you cannot make black men white nor white men black, because that is not the subject-matter of your legislation. Then I ask what is to be the line which will divide parties in this District when the bill of the honorable Senator from Maine becomes a law? As among us of the same race, the line which divides parties is one of principle. My honorable friend on the other side is a free trader; I am a tariff man. There is a line between us, and which side we take depends upon argument and reason. It is from that fact that the lines between parties depend upon argument and reason, and are to be settled by them and them alone, that we have a free Government.

I ask what will be the line when the negro votes in the District? I am presuming now that he is just as well qualified to vote as the white man; that he is just as good, just as wise, just as intelligent as the white man; and I ask what is to be the line between parties when he does vote? Is it to be the line of argument, the line of reason, the line of principle, or is it to be the line of tribal distinctions? Will a man belong to a white party because he believes the white party has the best of the argument, that the principles which the white party advocate are the true principles upon which to govern the District; or will he belong to the white party simply because he is white; and will he belong to the negro party because the negro is right or because he is black?

To a wise man, and to a man who is willing to look a little beyond the excitement of the moment and the passion of the hour, is not this inevitable? Then, what is the consequence, supposing it to be so, and no one can deny it? Nobody can anticipate anything else as the result of the bill but that. Then what is the consequence? It is not a question of sharing in the Government; it is a question of which race shall dominate. There are one hundred thousand whites, and there are thirty thousand negroes. Which will dominate? Given that things remain as they are, the whites will predominate. Then what will the negro get by the bill? Of what use is his vote to him? When your party lines depend upon tribal differences of what use is the vote to the weaker?

There, Mr. President, we come back exactly to that which every society does at the outstart by its fundamental law. In a case of that kind the whites exclude the blacks from the right of suffrage altogether, and it is right and prudent and proper. I would not quarrel with a black community that would exclude the whites from voting, and why? All that the honorable Senator's bill does is to create this contest for every election, to make it recur year after year, and to exclude from the contest all considerations of principle, of reason, of right, of wrong. His bill is to invite in the District of Columbia a contest of races at every election from this time forward. That is the object of it, and that will be the effect of it, and there can be none other. Now, the District of Columbia, being a free community, just like a State, would, if it could, call a convention to settle this matter—settle it just as the States have settled it; "We are the majority; we are the ruling class of the community; we have the power; we can exercise it year after year; but we do not choose to invite that contest; we choose to form a constitution and fix that matter at the outstart by the exclusion of the weaker race from the right of suffrage." That is right and proper and wise, and anything else would be exceedingly improper and exceedingly unwise.

Then, Mr. President, this being a question, not of sharing the Government, this being a question of dominion, who will have the dominion? You have one hundred thousand whites and you have thirty thousand negroes, and you have sixty thousand or one hundred thousand negroes standing all around who have no property, who have no ties to any particular spot, who are not engaged in any business which entangles them, perfectly free-footed to come into the District within any period of ten days and live here as well as they live where they are. They may attain to the ascendancy in that way; but they do not need to come here in equal numbers with the whites to attain to the ascendancy. Sixty thousand negroes here in the city, if you suppose there are ten wards, may govern the city without any difficulty. There is no difficulty in withdrawing that kind of population from one ward to another so as to enable them to carry a majority of the city government, although it is a minority of votes. The whites do not enjoy these facilities for colonizing and pipe-laying. A man who owns large and valuable property in the city cannot pull up stakes and go and live in another ward in order that he may have a controlling vote at an election; but at least nine out of every ten of the colored men can.

The effect of this bill, then, will be to introduce these contests into the District of Columbia, to perpetuate them annually, and to beget a never-ending feud. If white men of the same race can become as much embittered against each other as we see that they can when in this society even now, in the society of the best regulated States north, what are you to expect when the vial of this tribal difference is poured in? It is hardly to be supposed that there were not wise men before us as well as there were brave men before Agamemnon. Why has this experiment never been tried heretofore? Gentlemen say it has been tried partially in Massachusetts. Very sparingly in Massachusetts, and very well guarded; very sparingly in New York, and very well guarded; very sparingly in Maine, and very well guarded—if not sparingly in the words of the law, sparingly in the number of negroes.

Mr. MORRILL. They all vote with us.

Mr. COWAN. They all vote; but is there any of them? In Pennsylvania, where we have one hundred thousand of them, we could extend this privilege to them perhaps, and the effect it would produce would hardly be appreciable there. There would be no danger of the tribal contest I have mentioned there. You could not have a black party and a white party there, because the blacks would not be enough anywhere to make anything like a party; they would hardly be enough in any district in the State to hold even the balance of power. It is a very different thing when you speak about introducing this principle where there are but few negroes, and where they form a large element of the population, say one third of it.

Mr. President, where was the necessity for this? My honorable friend from Maine is chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia. He has had these people under his charge and control for the last four or five years. He knows all about them; and I am here ready to say, I think in all truth, that he has put them in every respect upon a footing with the whites, except in this political aspect. Does not the negro in the District enjoy his personal liberty, his personal property? Has he not a right to go into court and sue? It is likely that he is oftener sued, but still he has the right to sue if he can get anybody in debt to him. He has a right to testify, which was thought to be a most valuable right. He has all the rights that the white man has except one, and what is that? What is this invaluable right that is now to be vested in the negro by this bill, when you come to examine it? I will tell you, Mr. President, what it is. He is to have the right now under this bill to vote for a mayor and council. What have that mayor and that council got to do? Can they tyrannize over him if they want to do so? My honorable friend has fixed all that. They have no power to affect him in any way. They cannot affect any of his personal rights or liberties in any respect.

Well, what have this mayor and council to do? So far as I recollect, they have charge of the streets, the sewers, the pavements, the gutters, the side-walks, and all that kind of thing. I believe these powers are delegated to them specially by Congress. They have them within their jurisdiction. If the negro has been imposed upon in any way by their administration of this branch of the city government, my honorable friend should have withdrawn the delegation of this power from the mayor and common council and made a general law which would have corrected the evil. That I would have agreed to do. But has anybody ever heard a negro complain of the exercise of the power of the city government in these respects? Has he been heard ever to complain that the tax he contributes for municipal purposes, which I suppose is not the one thousandth part of the whole amount, had been misapplied; that the side-walks had been neglected; that the gutters had not been cleaned; that the gas and the water companies had not been well arranged? That is about the extent of it. He is now to have a right to vote for mayor and council, a right to interfere with the distribution of the taxes of the city. How much does he pay of them? Suppose the negroes were here to-day numbering one hundred thousand, equal to the whites, how much of the taxes would they pay? And yet, when they pay no taxes and the whites pay them all, when the whites own all or nearly all of the property, you talk about its being fair that the negro should be permitted to intermeddle in this matter and correct the malversation and the mal-government of the city officials.

I have never heard even the most earnest advocates of the measure allege these as reasons why this new thing should be introduced here. I have never heard my learned and eloquent friend from Maine even hint at such a thing; and why? Because if there was such a thing, it would be susceptible of another and entirely different remedy. There is nothing to prevent Congress from withdrawing all the power delegated to this mayor and common council and resuming it themselves for the purpose of correcting any difficulty that may have occurred on these points. But instead of that, this extraordinary remedy is resorted to.

Mr. MORRILL. My honorable friend will allow me to ask him how it is that in drawing this line he speaks of he finds it so easy to establish a definite line as to all the civil rights of the colored man, affecting his life, his person, and his property, and yet so impossible to draw the line when he touches political rights? I understand him to say distinctly that in regard to civil rights he has no difficulty in defining the line clearly; the colored man has just as much right to protection in all his civil rights, life, liberty, person, property as the white man, and that can be made clear; but he denies that the line between the colored and the white man can be drawn at all without danger of infinite confusion whenever you change the political rights.

Mr. COWAN. I have a very simple answer to all that. The right to life, liberty, property, is the gift of God; the right to vote and the right to hold office, which is the same thing, is the gift of the community. That is all. The negro who is prevented from having a vote in a community has no more right to complain of it than the defeated candidate after the election has a right to complain. Why? Because who shall vote is a question of expediency and policy for the community to decide.

I ask my honorable friend himself if he saw this thing in the light in which I see it, if he saw in the future prospects of this District nothing but a strife between these two races of men, that their parties would be based upon their tribal distinctions, would he vote for this measure? Would he not say that it was better to tell the weaker: "You stand back, do not undertake to participate, because as long as you are the weaker you cannot be elected, and when you get to be the stronger the others cannot be elected." That is the whole of it. It is not like widening the franchise and allowing men of the same race to come in; it is an entirely different question, and one which merits the most careful and serious consideration on the part of everybody intrusted with it.

Does not every man know how much more easy it is to appeal to a sectional prejudice than it is to make an argument. How much easier is it for a man to say, "come my brother Irishman with me," or "come my German friend," or "you come the native?" This is the short way to make a party, and it is a very effectual one to make it even among white men; but what argument is there in it? We have lamented that tendency among ourselves. If that tendency exists among Germans, among Irishmen, and among native-born people, to associate themselves together according to some external mark or symbol rather than to associate themselves upon principle and fortify themselves by argument, if that is a mischief, will not this be much more so?

Gentlemen talk about public opinion, the public opinion of the country. Why, Mr. President, what is the public opinion of the country? It is hardly ten years since a Congress sat here which I suppose thought itself as wise a Congress nearly as this is, which was called a Know-

Nothing body. Then instead of throwing suffrage to the dogs and giving it to everybody, suffrage was said to be a great right of the American citizen, the chosen heritage of the American people, not to be thrown out to foreigners and strange people who came from everywhere. Now I put it to you, Mr. President, to look back ten years. I do not know whether the honorable Senator from Maine was a member of the Know-Nothing party; but supposing him to have been in the Congress of the United States at that time, and supposing he were there to have introduced this proposition, what would public opinion have said then? What will public opinion say next year? I say to him now the public opinion in the District of Columbia, whether the Committee on the District knows it or not, is unanimously or nearly so against his measure. I tell him further that the opinion of the American people, the mass of them, is nearly unanimous against it, too. I agree that there are plenty of the American people who for some reason or other do not like the District of Columbia very well. They think it has rather a southern aspect; that there are many southerners living here; that it has rather been rebelliously inclined; and they do not care, they would probably delight in cramming negro suffrage down upon it; but no man is fool enough, even among them, to believe that this will benefit either the negro or the white man. It may be very comfortable in the hour of party rage and party passion to be able to do that to an antagonist when you have him down and when you have the exclusive power to legislate for him. I have no doubt but that there are large numbers of the American people who are exceedingly anxious to compel negro suffrage through the southern States. But has any one of them ever made an argument to show that the southern States would be better governed; that there would be more peace and more quiet in consequence of it? I have never heard those arguments if they have been made, and I do not know how anybody could make them.

My friend from Ohio excepts to this message of the President because the President happens to have said in it that the legislative power of a country is most likely to encroach upon the other departments. He goes into a labored argument to show that it is impossible that they can encroach. Why, sir, what was the reason the Federal Constitution was made, what is the reason why our States have made constitutions? If legislatures are always right, if they are always obedient to the monitions and the will of the people, what are your constitutions for? Is not a constitution made to restrain the legislature? Is it not made to restrain the legislature just as the law is made to restrain the individual? Why restrain the legislature? Because there is a possibility that the legislature may do wrong, may encroach. That very possibility stood up so strongly before the eyes of our fathers that they made a constitutional wall against it; but now the honorable Senator from Ohio says there is no danger from it at all. Oh, there was no danger, of course, from a legislative assembly in France during the revolution; that convention was perfectly safe; it was the representative of the people; but what did it end in? It ended in the destruction of everything, sacred and profane; all went down in an indiscriminate mass together.

Mr. President, legislatures are dangerous, executives are dangerous, courts are dangerous. Power is always dangerous. Power must always be curbed and must always be restrained, and I fear me very much that constitutions will fail to do it. "Eternal vigilance is the price of liberty," never to sleep in the presence of these encroachments. The honorable Senator might find this Congress in such a shape that a minority could govern the majority if certain precedents are followed. The majority in this body can turn out a refractory member. The majority in this body can turn out a member if he does not happen to be elected by a majority of the Legislature of his State in the way that this body thinks that majority ought to elect.

A majority in this body and in the other House have undertaken to build up a wall around themselves by requiring those who come from certain sections of the Union to take an oath that none of them can take. Does not that look a little like encroachment on the part of the legislative body? What right have we to affix a qualification to a Senator when he comes into this body? If, according to the original bargain, Pennsylvania elects a man thirty years of age, a resident of that State, who, if naturalized, has been nine years a citizen; who is willing to swear to the Constitution, by what right can the other Senators here say to him and to Pennsylvania: "This man whom you have sent as your representative cannot come in?" Why? "Because he cannot do something which we require him to do." Has not Pennsylvania a right to ask: "By what warrant do you require him to do this, that, or the other thing? Is it in the Constitution that he shall do these things? If we send men here who have all the constitutional qualifications, where does the right come from to impose others?"

But, sir, there were precedents for this. Cromwell, who wanted to have a Parliament to suit himself, administered his oath at the door: "You may come in, gentlemen, to legislate for the Commonwealth of England, but there is one thing you must swear you will not do; and what is that? 'Why, inquire into my power and authority; hands off that.'" The French convention undertook to stop at the doors of its halls a certain number of the delegates and keep them out in order that the remainder might have full control. Was there no danger of usurpation there, of encroachment? Was there no danger when Colonel Pride purged the Long Parliament with a couple of squadrons of dragoons? And this was on the same principle precisely. A majority get in and when they get in they say: "We will turn the key and nobody else shall come in." How are you going to do it? Either keep them out at the doors or put them out if they come in, or build up some new qualification wall that they cannot get over. I should not be at all astonished in the fluctuations of parties to find ten years from this time a wall built up here that every man who would not swear that he had never been an abolitionist, never been a Radical, never been in favor of negro suffrage, should not come in. That might just as well be made as any wall you can build up. You may just as well require a man to swear that at the door as anything else. If you can make him purge himself of his crimes, why can you not of his heresies? That canonical system of laws, however, never was very popular, and I do not think that it ought to be.

Then, Mr. President, this bill is against the will of the people of the District, the people who are to be affected by it. And I say further that it is against the will of the American people. I say that wherever this issue was attempted to be started, excepting, perhaps, in the New England States, it was repudiated in the last canvass by the winning party everywhere, and the proposed amendments to the Constitution were triumphantly pointed to to show that the question of suffrage was still to be left to the States. Negro suffrage was disavowed everywhere south of New England. If so, how can it be said now that this is in accordance with the will of the American people? It could be far better said that it is against their will than that it is in accordance with it.

There is another point put by the President, and if I remember aright (because I have no had an opportunity to read the message, and only heard a portion of it imperfectly) that is unanswerable; and I defy the honorable Senator from Maine, with all his ingenuity, to answer it. How do you undertake to say that it is the will of the American people to establish negro suffrage in the District of Columbia when it has not been done in Ohio; when it has not been done in Pennsylvania; when it has not been done in New York; when it has not been done in the States from which almost all those gentlemen come who are eager for it here? How is that to be answered? If a gentleman representing a State strongly imbued with this sentiment, so strongly that it itself had made it a part of its organic law, came here advocating it for the people of the District of Columbia, I should pay great heed to his advice and to his counsel; but I do not understand with what face he can come here and propose to saddle this measure upon this population, happening to be at his mercy, when he refuses to inaugurate it and carry it out at home. If the institutions of the American people are to be taken as expressive of their will, indicative of their wishes in this behalf, I say to the honorable Senator that the great mass of the people are against him and against his scheme. This cannot be disputed. There is no constitution in the Union which has adopted this principle of manhood suffrage; the people of no State in the Union have adopted it; and yet this is said to be desired by the American people.

You cannot attribute to the American people, as such, malice, ill-will; at least we cannot presume that they intend to inflict a punishment upon the District of Columbia rather than confer a benefit upon it. And yet this will be the effect of it, and to no purpose; not to secure the negro; not to give him better laws; not to protect his person; not to protect his liberty any better; not to send him into a court that will be more favorable to him, or to give him any advantage whatever, except to intermeddle with the distribution of taxes raised to clean out gutters and sewers, and to keep the streets in order. Perhaps if he can attain to a majority here and get control of the city he will himself distribute, and distribute as he chooses, the hundredfold of taxes that the whites pay into the public Treasury more than he does. That will be the effect of it.

Mr. President, I have only said what I have said because I was unwilling to allow this occasion to go by without replying to the suggestion which has been made here on the floor of the Senate, that the people who are to be affected by legislation in this case have nothing to do with determining the question of its propriety or impropriety. The idea has always been thrown out that this is the place to make experiments. Why make the experiment here more than anywhere else? Do the people of this District belong to the United States for all purposes, or for only one purpose? If they do not belong to the United States for all purposes, for what particular purpose do they belong? Is it not that the General Government may be located here, and nothing more? If it is nothing more than that, are they not in all other respects American citizens, like other citizens, entitled to the same rights, entitled to the same protection and the same consideration? Have we a right to tyrannize over these people and to make them do things they do not want to do; make them change their institutions in a fundamental point of view; and why? Not because they want it, but it is rather because they are opposed to it than otherwise.

Mr. President, I have no hope that there will be any change in the foreshadowed result in this case; but it is well to know that there are some things at least which may be said in answer to the criticisms made by honorable Senators upon the message.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I believe that the author of this message, while he was "swinging around the circle," frequently referred to his political consistency, and I am inclined to think that this veto maintains his claim in that respect, and that he is now what he said he was at the conclusion of the war—the Moses of the black race and in favor of extending to them the right of suffrage. During the canvass of 1864, if I am not mistaken, the President, then a candidate for office, declared that he was in favor of committing the organization of the rebel States to the loyal white and black men of the South, without making any discrimination as to color, and in the summer of 1865 he transmitted a dispatch to Governor Sharkey, of Mississippi, in which he advocated the extension of qualified suffrage to the black men of that State. Since that time upon various occasions, and particularly to one Mr. Stearns, and I think to the honorable Senator from Missouri, [Mr. HENDERSON,] he expressed his conviction that qualified suffrage should be extended to the negroes of the United States, and according to my information he declared that if he was in Tennessee and could vote upon that question he would vote to extend suffrage to the black men of that State. And, sir, this message seems to me to be somewhat consistent with the declarations which the President has heretofore made on this subject, for I find in one paragraph that he is in favor, as he says, "of the gradual and harmonious introduction of this new element into the political power of the country." Now, sir, to concede that the negroes of the United States are to be an element in the political power of this country is to answer all the objections which the President makes to this bill, except those that are of a local character.

It seems, then, that there is no difference in principle between the President of the United States and the majority in Congress as to negro suffrage. Both are in favor of that kind of suffrage, and the difference is as to the degree or extent to which it shall be exercised. Congress, so far as the District of Columbia is concerned, has extended the right of suffrage to the black men above a certain age and who have resided within the District for a certain time, while the President in his advocacy of negro suffrage has favored other qualifications; and because the President differs from the majority in Congress upon that matter of qualification, he has seen proper, in the exercise of the veto power, to overrule the judgment of Congress, not upon any constitutional ground or question of principle, but upon a mere matter of opinion.

Now, sir, it certainly cannot be so alarming as the President represents it to be to extend suffrage to the black men in this District, when he has favored its extension to black men elsewhere, when not only the majority in Congress favor negro suffrage, but the leading Democratic journals of the United States have espoused the same cause. Sir, we find the President, the majority in Congress, the Chicago Times, the Boston Post, the Albany Argus, the leading Democratic journals of the country favoring negro suffrage in some way. Since the public judgment has become so convinced of its necessity and justice there seems to be no very good reason for sustaining this message.

It has been objected by the Senator from Pennsylvania, repeating what the message says, that Senators here undertake to force negro suffrage upon the people of this District when the States they represent do not allow suffrage to the negroes. I will ask the honorable Senator if by the enactment of a law suffrage could be granted in the States, the legislative assemblies now in session would not extend to colored persons the right of suffrage. To change a constitution takes time. Conventions have been called in some of the States for that purpose, and in other States they are preparing to call conventions; but if by a law suffrage could be extended to the negroes of Pennsylvania as it can be to the negroes of the District of Columbia, I have little doubt that before the present Legislature adjourned negroes there would enjoy the elective franchise.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I wish to ask the Senator from Oregon how many negroes there are in the State he represents here, and whether they allow them the right of suffrage in the State from which he comes?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I have to say, sir, that there are but few negroes in the State which I represent, and, like other States, they are not allowed the right of suffrage for the constitution of that State was formed—

Mr. SAULSBURY. Then let me ask the Senator another question: why does he force this measure upon a people where one third or one fourth of the population consists of negroes, as in my State, when he will not allow the miserable remnant of the negro race in his own State the right of suffrage? Will he explain to the Senate how he can reconcile that with the spirit of justice, right, and propriety?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am not advocating the extension of the elective franchise to the negroes in the State of Delaware.

Mr. SAULSBURY. But you are in favor of it, sir.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The question now before the Senate is as to whether negroes should enjoy the elective franchise in the District of Columbia, and I say that I believe a majority of the people represented here in Congress are in favor of this bill, and my reasons for believing so are these: during the last session a bill similar to this passed the House of Representatives, and a bill was also passed by that House extending the elective franchise to the negroes in all the Territories of the United States. The members—

Mr. SAULSBURY. May I ask—

Mr. WILLIAMS. I wish to finish my sentence.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I ask the gentleman whether he was not a member of the convention of Oregon that excluded the negroes in that State from the right of suffrage, and whether he did not vote for that exclusion?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, that is altogether foreign to this question; but I can explain that matter. There was a strong party in Oregon at the time its constitution was formed in favor of establishing slavery in that State; and it was exceedingly difficult to defeat that party, because there was an effort made to make it the doctrine of the Democratic party, and to exclude from that organization all men who did not favor the pro-slavery policy there, and such was public opinion in the State of Oregon at that time that to defeat the establishment of slavery it was made necessary for the men who opposed it to introduce into that constitution a clause which denied to negroes the right of suffrage and other rights. It was for the purpose of defeating the institution of slavery in that State that the constitution was made in the form it now is.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Did you vote in favor of that, sir, and in giving that vote did you act conscientiously or under compulsion?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I do not like to be diverted from the subject before the Senate; but I say that I was determined, if possible, to defeat the institution of slavery in Oregon, and that, in my judgment, it was necessary in order to prevent its establishment there to concede somewhat to a public opinion which then predominated in that State.

I was compelled to choose between two evils, and, in my judgment, it was better as there were no negroes at that time in the State, and few could reasonably be expected to come there, to provide in the constitution that they should not have the elective franchise than it was to allow slavery to be established in the State of Oregon. But, sir, all that is entirely foreign to the question before the Senate.

I say that I am bound, as it seems to me, as a Senator upon this floor, not to act upon this subject in conformity to the wishes of a part of the people of the District of Columbia, but to act in conformity with the wishes of the people whom I represent upon this floor, or in accordance with a majority of all the people represented here. Now, if the legislative assembly of the State of Ohio should instruct my honorable friend [Mr. WADE] to vote for universal suffrage in the District of Columbia, I ask if he would not be bound to obey the instructions of the State which he represents, although in so doing he might act contrary to the wishes of the people in this District? So if the people of my State, in my judgment, by their elections or by their legislation instruct me to vote for the extension of the elective franchise to the negroes in this District, I am bound to obey their wishes, notwithstanding the fact that a portion of the people in this District may object.

But I was undertaking to show, that in my judgment, the people of the United States were in favor of this bill. The men who voted for the bill at the last session in the other House, and who passed a law extending the right of suffrage to negroes in the Territories, went home to their constituents, gave an account of their proceedings, and were indorsed and returned; and the people through them now demand the consummation of this act by the Congress of the United States. So I claim that this act has been before the people; there has been a popular verdict upon the question, and the judgment of the people has been distinctly expressed in favor of this kind of legislation. I think therefore, Mr. President, that there are no valid objections to the passage of the bill, and that this message which the President has submitted is one that does not concern the principle involved, but simply takes issue with Congress as to the time when the right of suffrage should be extended to the negroes in this District; for I understand him to say that they are to become at some time an element in the political power of this country. It seems to me that Congress is just as competent to decide as to whether the negroes of this District are now sufficiently intelligent to vote or not, as the President of the United States, unless he has some extraordinary means of information which are not possessed by Congress. And when we look at what has transpired during the late war, and see that these black men, ignorant as they are represented to be, were able then to understand the issues before the country and take the right side in the controversy, it seems to me that there is at least some ground for supposing that they have sufficient intelligence to judge of other questions that may arise involving the welfare or safety of the country.

Mr. JOHNSON. This is the only opportunity which I have had of giving, as I shall do in a very few words, my reason for not being enabled to vote for the bill. My friend, the chairman of the committee by whom the bill was reported, supposes that the people of the District of Columbia are not entitled by any provision found in the Constitution to the blessings of a government of their own, that they are placed entirely under the jurisdiction of the Congress of the United States, that the Congress is their Legislature, and that nobody else, not even themselves, have a right to complain of the manner in which Congress shall exert their power.

In what I am about to say I shall be found to differ with the opinions of men of distinction in the past, to whom the nation has been in the habit of looking with reverence and respect. It is true that, in my opinion, everything which Congress, from the very nature of our institutions, is not prohibited from doing, Congress can do by legislation with reference to the District of Columbia. The only limitations upon the powers of Congress are not to be found in the words of the clause which invests Congress with the power, for they are very comprehensive—they are authorized to legislate for the District of Columbia in all cases—but are to be found in the nature of the government, and the particular individual guarantees to be found in the instrument. Those guarantees of personal liberty, personal rights, rights of property, are equally operative upon Congress, in the discharge of its powers over the District of Columbia, as they are operative upon Congress in the discharge of its authority in matters of legislation over the States.

Thirty or forty years after the Constitution was adopted, a notion was entertained by the men to whom I have referred that, although there was no express prohibition upon the authority of Congress in its power to legislate over the District of Columbia, there was an implied one. The implication that was then made was, that having accepted from Maryland and from Virginia cessions of the territory which now compose the District, or did at one time compose the District, there was an implied obligation upon the part of Congress, entered into from the very first of those cessions, that they would not interfere with the institution of slavery. I never entertained that opinion, and certainly do not entertain it now; but it was entertained not only by Mr. Calhoun, who may have been considered somewhat prejudiced, and his opinions the result of that prejudice, because of his view of the benefits of the institution of slavery; but it was entertained by Mr. Clay, and it was measurably entertained by Mr. Adams. Mr. Adams, I think, in a speech in the House of Representatives, stated that he would never agree to abolish slavery in the District of Columbia without first taking the sense of the people of the District, and acting as they might decide upon the question whether the institution was to exist or was to be abolished. He seemed, therefore, to consider that because of the sources of the cession, and because of the inference to be drawn, which was that the persons who became residents of the District had the right to suppose that the institution itself would remain until they were willing to abolish it, it would be wrong to abolish it without their consent. He assimilated it to the authority which the States have over the same subject.

The States unquestionably had a right to abolish slavery. Whether that right was limited or qualified so as to compel them to give compensation to the masters of the slaves was a different question; but with reference to the authority to abolish slavery, no one ever doubted that it was possessed by the State governments. The State governments, however, were to exert it only as their people should will, and Mr. Adams' view was that, although not so expressly provided, it was but just and proper that the same legislation by Congress in the District, when proposed, should be submitted to the judgment of the people. My friend from Maine has well said that there is nothing in the Constitution which gives to the people of the District the right of self-government in the ordinary acceptance of the term. That is so; but if he will refresh his recollection by reading the debates, particularly in the convention of Virginia, he will find that the objection made to the Constitution, because of that sweeping authority vested in Congress, was met by Mr. Madison upon the ground that Congress would at once give the people of the District a government for themselves. Instead of doing what it was supposed, and he said was properly supposed, would be an inconvenient if not impracticable authority, the right to legislate in all local matters which might occupy the greater part of the time of Congress and take away from the Representatives in Congress somewhat of the time and the reflection which should be devoted to the great interests of the country, he said that Congress, as a matter of course, would give them some form of self-government. Upon reasons of policy which are very obvious, the people of the District were not permitted to legislate upon any subject at all except with the authority of Congress, because otherwise Congress itself might be under some local influence, or there might be some clashing of authority between itself and the municipal government. But subject to the right of Congress at any time to interfere, either by repeal or otherwise, with any improper legislation which any local legislature they might authorize might fall into, it was but just and right, consonant to the principles on which our Government was placed, that they should have a government of their own in reference to their mere local interests and individual rights.

If I am right as to this, and I know I am right historically, the honorable member from Maine is mistaken in supposing that the people of this District have not just as much right to be consulted about the government of the District as the people of Maine have a right to be consulted about the government of Maine.

They cannot control it by their votes. That is quite a different question. They have no authority to interpose any veto to any legislation which Congress may think proper to adopt; but they certainly have a right, when you are about to legislate upon matters which, as they think, materially affect their rights and interests, perhaps their safety, to be heard, respectfully heard, not obeyed, because they are not constituents of ours, but followed, provided they satisfy us that the grounds upon which they appeal to us are well founded.

The question then is, is it right to impose upon them this measure? They say not. They say it in respectful terms. They have done it in the most solemn manner in which a people can act. Every qualified voter, as I understand, has voted against the necessity or the propriety of this measure, and has asked to be protected from it. Are their reasons sound, or can any other reasons than those which they assign be given? If either is the case, it becomes Congress to listen and to be guided by the judgment to which they may ultimately come.

Now, what is the condition of the District? I do not know how many slaves were here; there were comparatively few free negroes I believe at the time you abolished slavery several years ago.

Mr. MORRILL. Between three and four thousand slaves and ten thousand free negroes.

Mr. JOHNSON. I am told there were ten thousand free negroes and between three and four thousand slaves. Efforts have been made on this floor, but always without success, to show that under the clause in the constitutional amendment abolishing slavery, which gives to Congress the authority to pass any appropriate legislation, the right of suffrage could be given to the freedmen. There is nothing in that which at the time was intended, or which any member of the Senate or the House has ever been able successfully to prove since, justifies Congress in giving to those people the right of suffrage as a constitutional right. Congress is authorized to pass such legislation as it may be necessary to pass to effect the purpose of the abolition of slavery. If under that constitutional amendment no such power as that which we are about to exert now by legislation was included, why was it not included? If it is right now to give to these people the right of suffrage, why was it not right then? And if it is right now to give it to them in the District, why was it not right then; and why was it not right then to give it to all of the class who are now free people in the several States? And yet nobody proposes that; nobody has suggested it even, except one or two. I believe my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. SUMNER] has been, from the first of the opinion that the right of suffrage should be given to negro males. He has not brought himself as yet to believe that it should be given to negro females. Then if you not only did not give, but carefully avoided giving, to these people in the several States the right to vote —

Mr. MORRILL. At this point of the Senator's argument I should like to remind him that at the very period of the formation of the Constitution to which he refers the right of suffrage was given to all freemen of color in all the States with the single exception of South Carolina; it was held in all the States everywhere to be the right of every freeman without regard to color, except in the single State of South Carolina.

Mr. JOHNSON. That makes what I was about saying still stronger toward the end for which I cited it. It was left to the people of the States to regulate the suffrage. If they gave it at one time to the negroes, at another time they took it away, and it was taken away when this last constitutional amendment was adopted for which my friend voted; and being taken away then, and it also being in the power of the States to keep it away from them, why, let me ask him, did he not propose by constitutional amendment to secure it as against the States?

Mr. MORRILL. Because we could not carry it. There were too many of you opposed to it.

Mr. JOHNSON. Not many of us. I suppose you have reference to gentlemen on the other side; and it is barely possible you might have had in your mind's eye the coming presidential election.

Now, Mr. President, is it right—let us apply it to ourselves—to force this measure upon the people of this District, who almost exclusively own the property here. Their local government is a municipal corporation, having no authority whatever to interfere with the rights of person, or if they have through the instrumentality of any penal legislation, have only that right subject at all times to be corrected by Congress? As I understand, there were at the time we abolished slavery some fifteen thousand negroes in the District; now I am told there are about thirty thousand. I wonder if my friend from Maine, in going around the city a year or two ago, since slavery was abolished, in order to discharge intelligently and humanely his duty as chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia, saw anything in the condition of this race which satisfied him that they were capable of exercising the right of suffrage? Their squalid misery, the disease which at that time was making sad havoc in almost all of the wretched shanties where they were placed touched his heart, touched the hearts to whom that condition became known, and they became the objects, and the just objects, of individual charity. They were, in one sense, paupers; and in every State in the Union paupers are excluded from the franchise. Suppose that instead of the city government here being a municipal corporation of the character that it is, it had been invested with banking privileges, as you might have done, and you had made each citizen a stockholder to the amount that he would subscribe, would you let in these negroes by force to be stockholders without paying anything toward the general fund, toward the capital? Certainly not. And yet here is a capital consisting of personal and real property belonging to the population of the District who are white, over which, and over which alone, the corporation have legislative powers, and you propose to give to these poor creatures the same right to levy taxes, to appropriate money, that belongs, and belongs now exclusively, to those who own the property to be taxed.

And what makes it still more remarkable: not only did those who are in favor of this measure fail to provide that suffrage should be granted in the States of the Union by the constitutional amendment, but I am not aware that any effort has been made in any State of the Union to do it by legislation, or by constitutional change, where it can only be done by constitutional change. My friend who sits near me [Mr. SHERMAN] has told us that he thinks each State must judge of that for herself; that at the proper time, or, to use his own language, in her own good time, Ohio may give to them a right to vote, because there are so few of them. That is what he said, and I have no doubt it is true. If she gives it at all, it will be because there are so few of them. Here in the neighboring State of Maryland slavery has been abolished, and, as I said a day or two ago, abolished with no possible desire to have it reinstated. I do not believe a proposition of that sort would receive the vote of one man in a hundred. There may be some men—I do not know as to that—who are suggesting the propriety of converting Maryland into a territory, who might be in favor of it; but no sane man, as I think, who is unprejudiced, and who has no party ends to attain, would think of proposing to Maryland the proposition of giving to the negroes of Maryland the right of suffrage. Why? It is useless to close our eyes to the fact; you may, by constitutional provision and by legislation, declare, over and over again, that there shall be no distinction on account of color, but there will be that distinction until the colors are blended so as to become one, if that shall ever happen. We find it in relation to the Indians, independent of their savage condition; we find it in relation to the Chinese.

My friend from Oregon who spoke just now [Mr. WILLIAMS] is very much in favor of giving the right of suffrage to the negroes in this District, and yet the other day he proposed a resolution to inquire whether it was not in the power of Congress and expedient to prevent the Chinese from coming into Oregon. Why? Because they are not white; because nature has made a distinction; because it is impossible to act harmoniously upon a subject with those several classes. And, let the time come when it may, if you give to the negroes the right to vote in the States they will either vote as the whites vote or there will be trouble in every community, if Congress should be called upon to enforce such a provision, as they ought to be called upon to enforce it if such a constitutional change should be adopted.

I have but a word or two more to say. I listened and read as the Secretary read the message of the President. His points are very well put, and, as the honorable member from Ohio says, the whole message is in good taste; but, in my judgment, it would have been much better if he had omitted all that part of it which relates to the comparative danger of usurpation between the two departments of the Government; not because he is not right as proved historically, not because he is not right from the very nature of two such departments, but because no such question arises upon this bill.

Congress will be guilty and has been guilty of no usurpation in passing this bill, as I think. Under the authority to legislate in all cases for the District of Columbia, they may legislate as this bill proposes to legislate. For the same reason the subject to which the bill adverts is a subject fit for legislation, and one which could in that way be disposed of by the States. If, therefore, I had been called upon to prepare a message of this sort, certainly all that part of the message would have been omitted by me; but not because I doubt at all the political wisdom of the theory which he maintains. I have said that all history proves that it is correct, and our own history proves it. Individual responsibility is lost in the responsibility of numbers. I do not speak of anything that has been done or may be done in the future. I am speaking of it now as a general principle. A member of the Senate—one of sixty odd members—or a member of the House of some two or three hundred, is, or may often be, found to do what he would not think of doing if he stood alone, open to the eye of the public and responsible alone for the consequences of his conduct. It was for that reason, among others, that the pardoning power was vested exclusively in the President. It was a great power, and it was supposed to be much more wise, judging from the nature of the power and the nature of our frail humanity, that a power of that description should be given alone to one individual.

I do not believe, however, that the time has come, and I trust in Heaven it is never to come, when executive usurpations or legislative usurpations, if there shall be any, will shake the firm foundations upon which the Republic stands. It has proved quite able to resist the assault of numbers on the battle-field, and stands now just as firmly fixed in the affections of the American people as it ever was; and if the time should come hereafter when Congress, in either branch or in both branches, or when a President shall forget the duty which the Constitution imposes upon each, and shall act so as to violate the rights of the people or endanger the safety of our institutions, the remedy will be found then, as it has recently been found in the patriotism and the power of the American people.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. President, several centuries of civilization have so instructed the white race to which we belong that, as a general rule, all male persons of that race, on arriving at their majority, are capable of exercising the right of suffrage; but such is not the fact in relation to the other races. There is no man on this floor who will rise and give it as his deliberate opinion that a majority of either the Indian race, the African race, or the Asiatic race within the United States are capable of exercising the right of suffrage. There is not one Senator who will rise and give it as his opinion that, as a general rule, either the Indians, the Africans, or the Chinese are capable of discharging this highest duty of the citizen. In reference to the white race, the exception is incapacity. The few, the exceptions only of the white men of this country, are incapable of discharging this duty; but with the Indians, the Africans, and the Chinese it is only the exceptions that are capable of exercising this right.

What is this proposition? Not to provide for these exceptions who are capable of discharging the duty of the elective franchise here in the District of Columbia; but the proposition is to give and force universal suffrage to every male negro in this District, or who shall come into this District from the States which surround it. That is the bald proposition. Is there a Senator here—will the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN,] in his conscience and upon his judgment, say that he believes these people, as a general rule, are capable of exercising this right in the District of Columbia, or that those who are to flow into this District from Maryland and Virginia and all the States of the South are capable of exercising it? I admit there are exceptions; there are some very honorable exceptions, men of color who are educated, good peaceable citizens in the District; and if the bill provided for those who were qualified it should not meet with my opposition; but it is to this unqualified, unlimited extension of the right of suffrage to this race which in Africa, in its original condition, stood at the very lowest of all the races of mankind, and which in this country for almost two hundred years has been held in slavery; it is to this idea that now, upon the first instant of breaking the chains of slavery, at once this whole population is to have the right of suffrage bestowed upon them, that I am opposed.

Mr. President, there are gentlemen who stand up and say that the judgment of the people in the last elections was in favor of universal negro suffrage in the District of Columbia. How can that be inferred? This bill passed the House of Representatives early in the last session; it was among the first bills which passed that body; it came to the Senate; it was here pending during the whole of that long session. Why did you not pass it through the Senate? Because, in my humble judgment, you believed the people were against it, and you dared not take the responsibility. Men speak of universal negro suffrage as having been pronounced in favor of in the late election. Let us look at that proposition for a moment. What was the question submitted? The honorable Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SUMNER] says that while the constitutional amendment was submitted to the people, it was by no means the definite issue submitted to them to pass upon, and under which Congress was pledged, in case it should be adopted, to admit representation from the States of the South as properly reconstructed. There are other gentlemen on this floor, it is true, who maintain that that constitutional amendment was submitted by Congress to the States of the South, and if adopted by those States it would be evidence that they were reconstructed so as to be entitled to admission. But, sir, in that constitutional amendment, if you say that that was the issue submitted, negro suffrage was repudiated, so far as the action of Congress was concerned. It was left to the States to decide for themselves. How, then, can gentlemen stand up here and say the judgment of the people in the last election was in favor of universal negro suffrage?

In my judgment, there is not a State in this Union outside of New England, and I doubt even if there is one there unless it may be Vermont, which, on the direct question being put to the people, would vote in favor of universal negro suffrage. Even in Massachusetts, if the direct question of universal negro suffrage, whether the negro can read or write, or not, whether he knows anything about the Constitution of his country or not, were submitted to the people of Massachusetts, I doubt whether they would vote for it, few as the negroes are in the State of Massachusetts. If you proposed that it should be qualified by intelligence, that they should be required to be able to read or write, to read the Constitution of the United States or to write their names, Massachusetts might vote in favor of it; so might Connecticut; so might Wisconsin; so might other States. But when gentlemen tell me that the people of Ohio, the people of New York, and Pennsylvania, and the people of the whole North, by anything that transpired in the late election, have decided in favor of universal, unqualified negro suffrage, they assume that for which there is no foundation whatever. Your very constitutional amendment repudiated the idea of universal negro suffrage. There was not a stump in any one of the northern States on which you did not, over and over again, declare that you did not follow THADDEUS STEVENS of the House and Mr. SUMNER of the Senate in their views of universal negro suffrage, but that you left it to the people to decide for themselves. These are the facts. Sir, had universal negro suffrage to be imposed upon the District of Columbia and upon all the States of the South as a condition of reconstruction been declared as the basis of the issue before the American people by Congress before the election, as you now assume it after the election, and had that issue been presented in Pennsylvania, Ohio, New York, Indiana, Illinois, and Wisconsin, there would have been no such result at the elections as was witnessed.

I say, then, that this assumption which is made by gentlemen here, that the people in the last election have decided in favor of the passage of this bill, in favor of universal negro suffrage here, is an assumption without foundation, and we, therefore, are at liberty to look into this question and discuss it upon its merits. I come back to the merits of the question when I say that while the exceptions to the general rule may be qualified to discharge this duty, as a general rule the African race are incompetent to do it. It is not so with the white race. Therefore, while the law has allowed universal suffrage to the whites of the District, it ought to qualify that suffrage when it extends it to the negro. Inasmuch as this bill gives it without qualification, I voted against it on its passage, and I shall vote against it now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This bill, having been passed by both Houses of Congress and sent to the President, has been by him returned with his objections to the Senate where it originated. It is, by the provisions of the Constitution, reconsidered, and the question is: Shall the bill pass, the objections of the President notwithstanding? Is the Senate ready for that question? ["Question!" "Question!"] By the provisions of the Constitution the vote must be taken by yeas and nays. Senators in favor of the passage of the bill, the objections of the President notwithstanding, will, as their names are called, answer "yea"; those opposed to its passage will answer "nay."

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 29, nays 10; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Cattell, Chandler, Conness, Cragin, Creswell, Edmunds, Fessenden, Foag, Fowler, Frelinghuysen, Grimes, Henderson, Howard, Howe, Kirkwood, Lane, Morgan, Morrill, Poland, Ramsey, Ross, Sherman, Stewart, Sumner, Trumbull, Wade, Willey, and Williams—29.

NAYS—Messrs. Cowan, Dixon, Doolittle, Foster, Hendricks, Johnson, Nesmith, Norton, Patterson, and Van Winkle—10.

ABSENT—Messrs. Brown, Buckalew, Davis, Guthrie, Harris, McDougall, Nye, Pomeroy, Riddle, Saulsbury, Sprague, Wilson, and Yates—13.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. On this question the yeas are 29, and the nays are 10. Two thirds of the Senate having voted in favor of the bill, the bill is passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. LLOYD, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. No. 459) suspending the payment of moneys from the Treasury as compensation to persons claiming the service or labor of colored volunteers or drafted men, and for other purposes.

The message further announced that the House had passed a joint resolution (H. R. No. 217) to allow members of Congress to inspect papers in the Post Office Department, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message further announced that the House had passed the joint resolution of the Senate (S. R. No. 154) to provide for the exhibition of the cereal productions of the United States at the Paris Exposition in April next, with an amendment, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled joint resolution (H. R. No. 221) authorizing certain medals to be distributed to honorably discharged soldiers free of postage; which was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore of the Senate.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The joint resolution (H. R. No. 217) to allow members of Congress to inspect papers in the Post Office Department was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

CEREALS AT THE PARIS EXPOSITION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the joint resolution of the Senate (S. R. No. 154) to provide for the exhibition of the cereal productions of the United States at the Paris Exposition in April next, which was to add at the end of the resolution the following proviso:

Provided, That it shall require no further appropriation from the public Treasury.

Mr. CATTELL. I move that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. WADE. I move to take up Senate bill No. 456, for the admission of the State of Nebraska into the Union.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The unfinished business of Friday, the bill regulating the tenure of offices, was laid aside in order to consider the bill repealing the amnesty section of the confiscation bill, and I hope that that bill may be taken up and that this one may not be. When it is taken up to be proceeded with, I shall be willing to let it be laid aside informally, in order that the bill of the Senator from Ohio may be acted upon if it is ready for a vote.

Mr. WADE. Then I will ask the Senator from Vermont to permit his bill to be laid aside informally in order to allow my bill to come up.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I have no objection to that course.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Senators in favor of the motion, which is, that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill named by the Senator from Ohio, will say "aye;" those opposed "no."

The question being put, it was declared that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I shall ask a division on that subject. I understand the Chair to be putting the question on laying aside, in the technical sense, so that the bill which I have in charge goes on the Calendar again, which is a thing I do not wish to agree to. If the bill which I have named—Senate bill No. 453—is now entitled to precedence, I am willing that it shall be laid aside informally by general consent that my friend's bill may be considered for a short time; but as the question is being put, the effect of it will be that the bill which I have in charge will go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio made the motion, and the Chair had no alternative but to put it.

Mr. WADE. I am willing to withdraw my motion if that will be any accommodation to the Senator from Vermont. I am for both these bills, but I think the Nebraska bill ought to be taken up first, on account of the gentlemen who are waiting here for seats; but anything that will accommodate the Senator I will yield to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is what I ask.

Mr. WADE. He agrees not to call up his bill, and this is next in order, for it was made the special order for to-day.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then I understand the Senator from Ohio to withdraw his motion for the moment.

Mr. WADE. I will withdraw my motion; but what next? I do not know that I understand it. His bill is to be laid aside temporarily and this one taken up, I understand.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Ohio withdraw his motion?

Mr. WADE. I will withdraw it with that understanding.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The effect of the Senator from Ohio withdrawing his motion will be to leave the unfinished business of Friday as the business before the Senate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Now, I am willing that the unfinished business of Friday shall be laid aside informally that the Senate may consider the bill of the Senator from Ohio, if there be no objection.

Mr. WADE. Very well; that is what I want. I do not care about the form.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont suggests that Senate bill No. 453, being the unfinished business, be laid aside informally in order that the Senate may proceed with the consideration of the bill named by the Senator from Ohio. It may be done by the unanimous consent of the Senate. Is there any objection? No objection being made the unfinished business will be laid aside informally, and the bill named by the Senator from Ohio is now before the Senate.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN.

Mr. HENDRICKS. With the permission of the Senator from Ohio, I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate that the papers relating to the claim of James C. Pickett be taken from the files of the Senate and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations. There was an adverse report at the last session on the ground that it was an old claim; but I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate that it may go again to the committee in order that they may consider it again.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That order will be entered, no objection being made.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. FESSENDEN. With the permission of the Senator from Ohio, I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to introduce a bill without previous notice with a view to its reference to the Committee on Finance, which meets to-morrow, and I desire to have the bill considered then by the committee.

There being no objection leave was granted to introduce a bill (S. No. 493) supplemental to an act to establish the Treasury Department, approved the 2d of September, 1789; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

ADMISSION OF NEBRASKA.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 456) for the admission of the State of Nebraska into the Union.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WILSON] to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. BROWN.]

Mr. SHERMAN. Let us have a vote upon it. Mr. FESSENDEN. Let us have it read so that we may understand it.

Mr. WADE. I should like to hear it read. The Secretary read the amendment of Mr. WILSON, which was to strike out all of the amendment offered by Mr. BROWN after the word "color" in the fifth line, and to insert:

Excepting Indians not taxed; and upon the further fundamental condition that the Legislature of said State, by a solemn public act, shall declare the assent of said State to the said fundamental condition, and shall transmit to the President of the United States an authentic copy of said act, upon receipt whereof the President, by proclamation, shall forthwith announce the fact, whereupon said fundamental condition shall be held as a part of the organic law of the State, and thereupon, and without any further proceeding on the part of Congress, the admission of said State into the Union shall be considered as complete. Said State Legislature shall be convened by the territorial Governor within thirty days after the passage of this act to act upon the conditions submitted herein.

So that the amendment of Mr. BROWN, if amended as proposed, will read:

Provided, That this act shall not take effect except upon the fundamental condition that within the State of Nebraska there shall be no denial of the elective franchise or of any other rights to any person by reason of race or color, excepting Indians not taxed; and upon the further fundamental condition that the Legislature of said State, by a solemn public act, shall declare the assent of said State to the said fundamental condition, and shall transmit to the President of the United States an authentic copy of said act, upon receipt whereof the President, by proclamation, shall forthwith announce the fact, whereupon said fundamental condition shall be held as a part of the organic law of the State, and thereupon, and without any further proceeding on the part of Congress, the admission of said State into the Union shall be considered as complete. Said State Legislature shall be convened by the territorial Governor within thirty days after the passage of this act to act upon the conditions submitted herein.

Mr. WADE. I hope that will not be agreed to.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, I have tried hard, very hard to keep out of this debate during all the last session, and so far during this, and I think I should have succeeded if the Senate had ever come to a vote before I got to be old and garrulous. [Laughter.] But as the vote has been postponed so long I think I shall have to surrender to the appetite I have to say something; and all the guarantee I can give the Senate as to how much I shall say is the promise that there are several subjects in politics, ethics, and religion that I shall not discuss on this occasion. [Laughter.] I have heard it remarked by somebody—

Mr. SUMNER and others. Let us adjourn.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wisconsin has the floor and must not be interrupted without his consent.

Mr. HENDRICKS. If the Senator will consent, I will move an adjournment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Wisconsin give way to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. HOWE. I do to a motion to adjourn.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Then I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. WADE. I hope not. I call for the yeas and nays on the motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and being taken, resulted—yeas 11, nays 22; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Cowan, Dixon, Doolittle, Henderson, Hendricks, Johnson, Norton, Patterson, Sherman, Sumner, and Van Winkle—12.

NAYS—Messrs. Cattell, Chandler, Conness, Cragin, Creswell, Edmunds, Fessenden, Foster, Frelinghuysen, Howard, Howe, Kirkwood, Lane, Morgan, Morrill, Poland, Ross, Stewart, Trumbull, Wade, Willey, and Williams—22.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Buckalew, Davis, Fogg, Fowler, Grimes, Guthrie, Harris, McDougall, Nesmith, Nye, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Riddle, Saulsbury, Sprague, Wilson, and Yates—19.

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

Mr. HOWE. I was about to remark, Mr. President, that I have some time or other heard it said that this Government of the United States is a Government of delegated powers. Indeed, I have heard it said so often that I sometimes think I never heard anything else, [laughter;] but I agree to the truth of the observation. The only comment I have to make upon it now is simply to say that because its powers are delegated it does not follow that they should not be exerted. I have also heard it asserted that all powers not delegated to the Government of the United States are reserved to the States or to the people; and I agree to that, simply remarking that I do not conceive a power to be any more sacred because it is reserved than it would be if it were delegated.

When we speak of admitting a State into the Union, which is the specific work on which we are employed at the present time, I understand it to mean simply this: to clothe a community with two great political prerogatives or rights. One is the right to exert a certain share of the power which, under the Constitution, belongs to the United States, and the other is to exert all the powers which, under the Constitution, are reserved to the States. The powers which are delegated to the United States are those mainly which pertain to the defense of the national authority. To participate in the Government of the United States, therefore, it is only essential that one should love the United States better than any other sovereignty; should be willing to uphold and defend the United States against all other sovereignties. What we call loyalty, therefore, seems to me to be the great prerequisite to the admission of a people to a share in this Government. I believe no one denies this sentiment to the people of Nebraska. So far as I know that constituency I believe they are as loyal as the people of any other portion of the country. Why not then admit them to this participation in the Government of the United States?

It is said that the people of Nebraska are few in numbers, and if we admit them we must allow to them two Representatives in this Chamber and one in the other House; and it is said that that is a larger representation than they are entitled to upon the score of numbers. That is true; and if the Constitution intended that representation in the legislative department of the Government should be in proportion to numbers, it would not be just for the people of Nebraska to demand admission at this time; but we know, on the contrary, that such is not the intention of the Constitution; that those who framed the Constitution deliberately, considerably ignored that idea; and we know that, let them come into the Union when they will, they will not be represented in the legislative department of the Government equally with other States in proportion to their numbers. This disparity we find in representation between all the States, and the Constitution contemplated, or those who made the Constitution contemplated, that States would be admitted into the Union having a population less than that prescribed by law by your statutes for the choice of representatives, and contemplating that, anticipating that, it was provided that every State should have at least one vote in the House of Representatives. I do not regard, therefore, this disparity of numbers to be a serious objection. I do not regard it to be an objection at all, so far as our interests are concerned. It is one that concerns mainly the people themselves. If they feel that they are able to maintain the expense of a State government, and are willing to take upon themselves that burden, and to take upon themselves the obligations which the Constitution imposes upon every State, I am perfectly willing to concede that right to them at the present time.

What other objection is there, then, to the admission of Nebraska? The Senator from Maryland [Mr. JOHNSON] the other day started the most serious objection which I have heard urged in the course of this debate, and it was mainly to reply to that objection that I sought this opportunity to address the Senate. The Senator from Maryland reminded particularly the Senators from the eastern or Atlantic States that the western States were fast gaining an ascendancy, and he seemed to feel, at least he seemed to urge, that that ascendancy was likely to prove injurious to the interests of the Atlantic States. He reminded us that the western States were growing rapidly; and he recited to us a portion of the argument of one of those who participated in framing the Constitution of the United States, who urged that the Constitution should restrict the number of representatives from the western States so that they never should exceed the number of representatives from the Atlantic or sea-board States. I was very sorry, for one, to hear that argument introduced. I was very sorry to see, at this stage in our history, a new attempt to inaugurate a sectional controversy. For years we have witnessed a very systematic effort to imbrue the northern and southern portions of the country in a sectional controversy. We have just emerged from the worst stages of that controversy. For the last six years those two portions of the country have had each other by the throat. They have but just let go of each other; and I hope no Senator on this floor enjoys the spectacle they present to-day. Both of them have bled deeply, and are bleeding still; and in view of that terrible struggle and of its results, I do not think any statesman of to-day ought to be ambitious of inaugurating a new controversy between the eastern and the western portions of the Union, and I am sure there is no need of any such controversy.

And I want to say right here that, if the argument has any validity at all, if it be valid to-day, it is valid always: if the eastern States think it important for them to protect themselves against the growth of the West, then they have but one duty to do, and that is to resist from this time forward the admission of any more States into the Union; to say that they will admit not another one to participate in the powers belonging to the Government of the United States. I do not think they are prepared to take that position. I do not think the honor or the interests of the country will warrant them in assuming that position, and I do not think the honor or the interests of the Atlantic States would warrant them in assuming it.

Sir, it is not so very extraordinary that Mr. Gouverneur Morris, standing as he did in the Convention which framed the Constitution, in the very morning of the Republic, in the dim twilight which hung over that early hour in its history, should have supposed then that a necessary rivalry might exist between the East and the West, and that he, as an eastern representative, should have thought it incumbent upon him to do something, to put something into the Constitution, to protect the East against the day when that rivalry might spring up; but I think it very extraordinary that any statesman standing in the light of to-day should find any wisdom in the suggestions of Mr. Gouverneur Morris, should think the lessons of that hour were worth repeating in the light of to-day. I am sure I cannot find any wisdom in that suggestion, and I do not believe the country will recognize its wisdom.

I do not believe the Atlantic States are prejudiced by the growth of the western States. I do not believe they have proved injurious to the welfare of the eastern States. Certainly we were of no detriment to you of the East, sir, during the late struggle. We performed, I think, our full share of the labor which has been found necessary to save the integrity of the country. We contributed our full share of money, of blood, and of life. When the battalions of the West moved down the valley of the Mississippi, through Vicksburg and Port Hudson, and sent the commerce of that great stream tumbling on its way to the Gulf, I do not think that that was felt to be an injury to the Atlantic States or to any portion of the country; and when those same battalions took up their march to the East and struck the Atlantic coast at Savannah, I do not think that that march to the sea was felt to be any serious detriment to the Atlantic States; and when those victorious battalions turned their faces to the North and swept through the Carolinas, clearing out every one of those forts on the sea-board held still under the rebel flag, I do not believe that the growth of the West was felt in any portion of the country to be detrimental or prejudicial to the whole.

What, then, is this danger that threatens the Atlantic States from the growth of the West?

The Senator has not left us to surmise what it is; he has pointed us to it. He has told us that when the Constitution was framed the Atlantic States were engaged in commercial pursuits; that they believed those pursuits were to be the permanent pursuits of the country. He tells us that those interests have already been sacrificed. He tells us that the eastern States have been forced, by no fault of their own, in a great measure to drop the business in which they were then engaged, and which they supposed would constitute their principal business in all time to come, and to engage in the business of manufactures. Thus then the States of the West are arraigned here upon the charge of having wrested the commerce of the eastern States from their hands. Sir, it is true that the commerce of that day is gone. Perhaps, before we lament too much over that fact, we had better consider for a moment what that commerce was. In 1791 the domestic and foreign tonnage entering the Atlantic ports amounted to six hundred and four thousand three hundred and two tons. The value of commodities exported during that year was $19,012,041. The value of the goods imported during the same year was $29,200,000. That was the commerce of the year 1791. That was the commerce of the country at the time the Constitution was framed. That was the commerce to which the Senator from Maryland supposes that the States which formed the Constitution dedicated themselves to the protection and to the nurture of.

Where did these exports come from? Mr. Tench Coxe has preserved a table, and as I think it full of instruction on this very point I shall produce it. I read from a table, not for the year 1791, but for the year 1793:

Value of goods, wares, and merchandise exported from each State:

New Hampshire.....	$181,407
Massachusetts.....	2,839,922
Rhode Island.....	698,084
Connecticut.....	749,925
New York.....	2,528,085
New Jersey.....	23,524
Pennsylvania.....	3,820,646
Delaware.....	133,972
Maryland.....	2,550,258
Virginia.....	3,549,499
North Carolina.....	503,294
South Carolina.....	2,917,979
Georgia.....	458,973

Total.....$21,005,568

Thus you see that at that day each State was exporting its own products. They were drawn to the sea-board by wagons mainly. A pair of stout horses could make a journey from the sea-coast to your frontiers. It will be seen that then the State of New York, instead of being the first State in the Union in the matter of its exports, was, as I think, either the fifth or the sixth State of the Union.

That was the commerce of that day. That commerce is indeed gone. They have dropped it, says the Senator from Maryland; they have been forced to drop it, says the Senator from Maryland. Yes, Mr. President, they have been forced to drop it. If you hold your hand full of marbles you would be forced to drop them in order to pick up the koh-i-noor diamond. By no fault of their own, says the Senator from Maryland, have they been forced to drop this commerce. No, Mr. President, I do not attribute any fault to them for dropping it. I think the country and the world will hold them justified in dropping it when you consider for a moment what they have picked up in lieu of it. If we have not that commerce we have another one. In lieu of that commerce we had one in the year 1866 which employed a foreign tonnage of 7,821,560 tons, and a domestic tonnage of 7,782,484 tons, and that fleet exported from this country a value amounting to $565,426,394, and imported $437,640,354. Of these exports more than $19,000,000—more than the whole export of 1791—were in wheat, and more than $27,000,000 were in flour. And where does this commerce come from? It is not produced in the States which framed the Constitution; it is not brought to the sea-board with ox-teams nor with horse-teams. There are long lines of canal and railway reaching far beyond what were the frontiers of the Union at the time Mr. Gouverneur Morris gave his advice to the country.

At the time that Mr. Gouverneur Morris made the suggestion which was repeated to us by the Senator from Maryland the other day the city of Chicago had not been heard of; old Beaubien had not begun to keep tavern there then: there is quite a town there now. It sends off annually more than fifty million bushels of cereals to the sea-board to swell the commerce of the United States. The city of Chicago sends a commerce annually over the St. Clair flats amounting to about one hundred and thirteen million dollars—more than twice the whole commerce of the country which Mr. Gouverneur Morris thought the country ought to nurse as its peculiar business. The State of Minnesota, one among the last of the States admitted into the Union, sends off more wheat every year than the whole United States exported in 1791. Some thirteen or fourteen years after Mr. Gouverneur Morris made this suggestion a party of exploration started from the Missouri river to cross the continent to the Pacific. They were some two years in making that journey. During the last season a railroad construction train has traveled almost as far between the Missouri and the Pacific as that party of exploration traveled in 1804.

Considering what the West has contributed to the new commerce of the country, I do not think that the Atlantic States have any occasion to regret the growth of the West or to lament the loss of that commerce which they possessed in 1791; and I like the sentiment avowed on one occasion by the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. WILSON.] He said they were not alarmed about the West; they regarded us all as their children. That is the true paternal feeling. We are the children of the eastern States; we are not at all likely to devour our mother; that is no part of our purpose. I have heard of some barbarous statesmen who were in the habit of putting female children to death in their infancy; but that was not because they promised to be strong; it was because they promised not to be strong; not because they promised to add too much strength to the State, but because they did not promise to bring strength enough to the State. Never till this late day have I read or heard anywhere of a statesmanship which would put children to death because they promised to be strong.

So, Mr. President, if I were an eastern representative instead of a western representative as I am, I think I would still insist upon the old policy of admitting States into the Union when they feel themselves capable of taking upon themselves the obligations of a member of the Union; when they manifest a disposition to discharge the duties which belong to every State in the Union. I am perfectly satisfied with the disposition entertained by the people of Nebraska toward the Government of the United States, and am willing to admit her as she stands to a participation in this Government; but if she comes in at all, she must not only, as I said, exercise a part of the power which belongs to the Government of the United States, but she must exercise all the powers which belong to a State. It is not only necessary that she should be animated by that sentiment of loyalty which will induce her to be faithful to the demands of the General Government, but she should be animated by that sentiment of justice which should secure to all the people of her own borders the protection which every people must have from some Government, and which, under our system of laws, they must get from the government of the State wherever a State exists.

Are the people of Nebraska animated by that sentiment of justice toward each other which entitles them to take upon themselves the exercise of those powers which belong to a State? In looking at the organic law which the people of that State are said to have adopted for the regulation of the home government, I find it provided that all colored people are excluded from the right to vote under that government, and that the ballot is conceded only to white persons. I am told there are colored persons there. It is said there are but few. Just how many there are I do not know; and in asking for the colored people a right to vote in Nebraska, I do not hold myself to be the advocate simply of the colored people who are in Nebraska; I hold myself to be the advocate of the whole colored population of the United States. There are four millions of them who want the right to vote: in Nebraska when they are in Nebraska; in Wisconsin when they are in Wisconsin, and in other States when they are in other States; and if you deny this right to those who are now in Nebraska, you deny it to all who may hereafter wish or seek to go to Nebraska; you say to the whole colored race of the United States, "You cannot enter within the borders of Nebraska without leaving behind you the right to vote, provided you live in any portion of the Union where you enjoy that right to-day."

Now, Mr. President, I have never said a word on this floor in reference to the question of negro suffrage. I have voted upon it repeatedly here and elsewhere. It is either right or wrong, just or unjust, that colored men should vote in Nebraska. If it is just, the responsibility is with the Congress of the United States if they do not see that that justice is secure. If it is unjust that they should vote there, then we have to-day committed a fatal mistake, because if it is unjust for them to vote in Nebraska it is unjust for them to vote in the District of Columbia. We have to-day, by a very large majority, as on another occasion, declared it to be our opinion that it was just, and not unjust, for them to vote in the District of Columbia. I did not vote to put the ballot into the hands of the colored men of the District of Columbia by way of penalty upon the District; I had no wish to punish anybody, white or black, by the vote I gave; I voted to secure them that right here in the District as I had uniformly voted to secure them that right in Nebraska, and as I should vote to secure them that right in Virginia or in New York, whenever and wherever I find myself entitled to vote upon a specific question. Upon the question as to who shall and who shall not vote in the Territory of Nebraska the Congress of the United States has exclusive control. If they are debarred from the privilege of voting there, as I said before, we are responsible for it, not the people of Nebraska alone, but the Congress of the United States, which assents to that exclusion. To be consistent with myself, Mr. President, I must insist, it seems to me, upon their right to vote in Nebraska.

We have heard it said to-day upon this general question of the right of negroes to vote, as we have heard it said often elsewhere, that they are unfit to vote. That is true; God knows how true that is, and I think He alone knows how true it is. But it is not only true of the negro race in the United States; it is true of the white race; it is true of the body of the American people that they are not fitted by intellectual culture for the exercise of the right of suffrage. The American citizen, with the ballot in his hands, in the estimation of the American people, is a sovereign. Once a year he passes judgment upon you and me, upon President, upon judges, upon laws, upon policies, upon measures; and to be fitted for that great work he should comprehend them all; measures and men he should be familiar with; and to be really fitted to exercise the right of suffrage he should be better endowed than we are. We can be intrusted here to vote on specific laws, but when we come to review and criticise and pass judgment upon great policies, the best of us are hardly equal to that great work.

All that can be said in favor of our right to the ballot is this: that we can handle it for ourselves, we the people, better than anybody else can handle it for us. And that is not only true of the best educated and of the half educated, but it is true, as I solemnly believe, of those who are not educated at all. They can handle it for themselves better than anybody else can handle it for them. Whenever you come to vote for a class, a large class of people, with whom you have no interests in common, for whom you have no affection, that class will suffer. The history of the world proves that. It is not because I think this colored race is fitted for the right of suffrage that I now demand their admission to it; it is because I feel and know they never will be fitted for it, and they never will be allowed to become fit for it until you put the ballot into their hands.

Why, Mr. President, the white race, for the last fifty years, have had the ballot in their hands exclusively; they have had the whole authority and power of Government. What have we got to show for it? What is the net result? You are taunted every day that you have four million colored people who are not fit to vote; who cannot read and write, it is said. You have more than that. You have in those ten communities down here lately in rebellion against the authority of the State, almost half a million of white adult males and females who cannot read or write. Mr. President, we cannot boast very loudly of the achievements of the white race in the matter of government when they have only such fruits as these to produce. I believe, sir, the only way in which we are ever to raise up and to fit these men to exercise the right of suffrage is to put them at the work now; put the ballot into their hands. I do not think your institutions will be particularly stronger for that single act; but I believe that when the American people see that every man has the ballot in his hands they will be made to see the common, public, urgent necessity of fitting every one of them for the use of it; and that we shall take hold of the work of education when we have completed the work of emancipation. I believe that will be necessary; I believe it ought to be done.

But what is the great danger, in the meantime of putting the ballot into their hands? The most ignorant man you can find on the continent cannot by possibility vote worse than the most cultivated men have voted within the last six years. Every man of them will be identified with one or the other of the two great parties. In each of the great parties and in all of the great parties we have ever had we have had men of high culture; and they will not vote worse than one or the other of these two parties. Why, Mr. President, take a man who is utterly stupid, insensate, and with the ballot in his hands there is just an even chance that he will vote on the right side. There are only two ways he can vote, the wrong side and the right side, and it is just an even chance that he will vote right; and where there is one chance in two of his going right the odds are not very much against you.

But after all, Mr. President, ignorance is not the thing which disqualifies a man most from voting. I would rather trust the ballot to-day or any day in the hands of a man who does not know what to do with it, than to trust the ballot in the hands of men who do know what ought to be done with it, but who do what they know ought not to be done with it; rather trust it in the hands of ignorant men, who are true to such convictions as they have than trust it, as you see it every day, in the hands of men whose convictions are clear enough, but who will sacrifice their convictions for some purpose of personal, present interest. I believe there is much more ignorance among the people of the United States than there ought to be; but I am bound to say that, in my judgment, ignorance is not the worst difficulty we have got to contend with, and it is a difficulty that we can remove more readily than some others that we do have to contend with.

And so, Mr. President, I think these colored men ought to be allowed to vote in Nebraska. I thought last winter they ought to be allowed to vote in Colorado, and because that right was denied to them in the constitution of Colorado, as it is denied in the constitution of Nebraska, I once voted against the admission of Colorado. But subsequent to that vote I found the country confronted by a very grave emergency. The people of the United States had sent to these Halls a body of representatives equal in numbers to the enactment of laws even against the veto of the President; they had put into the presidential chair also one whom they supposed to be in harmony with themselves and in harmony with that great majority they sent here; but we found in the course of the last session that that harmony no longer existed between the Executive and the majority in Congress or the majority of the people which sent us here and placed him there. Had he still been in harmony with us we could have sacrificed a few members of this Senate and a few members of the House of Representatives, and yet have taken care of the interests of the country; but when we found that the President was no longer in line with us, it became the more necessary that we should preserve our majority in the two Houses. But the same calamity which took from our ranks the President of the United States took from our ranks also one, two, three, or perhaps four members of this body; "erring brethren," as I really think, of this House; and so at one time I really thought that we had not the power, this Union, this Republican, this loyal party of the country and its Representatives had not the power to enact a law without the assent of the President, and his assent we could not get. So it happened to me, as I dare say it happened to others, that I began to look about for reinforcements. I did not see exactly where they were to come from unless we drew on the West, on which we had been in the habit of drawing very freely during the late struggle.

Here was one loyal constituency, with loyal representatives standing at our doors, willing to come to our aid and help us to carry on the great work which we had taken upon our shoulders, but under which for a little while we did stagger a little, and you know it. I thought, stricken as we were, we had better seize the greater good even at the sacrifice of a temporary evil; and I reconsidered the vote which I first gave on the question of admitting Colorado and voted finally for her admission. It was urged then, and with a good deal of force, that Colorado had adopted her constitution before the new dispensation had ever been proclaimed to her people. I thought there was some weight in the argument, but it did not influence me to any great extent. It was the necessity resting upon me which finally induced me to vote for the admission of Colorado.

But that emergency has passed by. The Senator from Maryland—and I am very sorry he is not in his seat this afternoon, since I have to allude to him so often—really thought we were urging in Nebraska to-day for partisan purposes. Why, sir, he must have a very extraordinary opinion of us to suppose that we are still craving more strength in the Senate or in the House or in the country. The vetoes of the President have no sort of influence, as we have seen this afternoon, on the legislation of the country now. We have two thirds of both Houses assured men. We can do business by ourselves and as it ought to be done. What do we want of any more votes? Beside, it is only two years before we shall go to the people again, and then the small remnant of opposition which is still here will give way and loyal representatives will take their places; plenty of time to reinforce in the ordinary methods, even if we needed any reinforcements, but we do not.

I said that emergency had passed by. You remember of old, when Judea was looking in all directions for a Saviour. He at last appeared to them very unexpectedly from Nazareth. While we were looking about our frontiers for reinforcements to the Legislatures of the country, lo, our savior came from New Jersey. I scarcely looked for a savior from that quarter any more than Judea for hers from Nazareth; but then we recognized ours when they came, which was more than Judea did of hers. They are here; the necessity has passed by; and now I think justice remains to be done.

But, Mr. President, because I think that we should not permit our sanction to rest upon this constitution as it stands, I do not think we should formally exclude Nebraska from the Union. That does not to me seem necessary. If we invite the people of Nebraska to remove this objection from her constitution, I do not doubt that the people of Nebraska will gladly do it. I think the invitation should go to them. Several propositions have been made to the Senate having that object in view. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. Brown] offered the first one, the one which I am inclined to support; that submits the question to the people of Nebraska. It invites the people of Nebraska to reconsider this question and to strike that clause from her constitution. There can be no possible doubt but what, if we take that course, and the people of Nebraska assent to that act, the constitution will be as valid in every respect as it would if the constitution had been originally presented to us in that form. It matters not at all who submits a constitutional proposition to a people seeking admission into the Union if the people assent to it, and then Congress approves, and sanctions the act; there is a State, and the constitution is beyond all question a valid instrument.

It is said it will impose some inconvenience upon the people of Nebraska. So it will. It will require her citizens to go to an election upon some one day and give a vote upon this question. That is not a very great hardship. It need not postpone the admission of the State for more than sixty days. The election can be ordered on a specific day, and there need be no subsequent action of Congress. It does seem to me that this is an inconvenience to which the people of Nebraska ought to be entirely willing to submit, rather than to require that we, in this stage of our history, should assent to the exclusion which now stands in their constitution.

A shorter method of attaining the same thing is proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. Wilson.] He proposes to require, not the assent of the people of Nebraska, but the assent of the Legislature of Nebraska. I do not like that proposition, yet I will not undertake to say that that would not make a valid change in the constitution; but it is a work that we ought not to impose upon the Legislature of Nebraska. They were not selected for any such purpose; they have not been instructed upon that point; they ought not to be required to vote upon such a measure as that at the dictation of the General Government. They are, like ourselves, representatives, and prefer, as we do, to represent the known wishes of their people rather than to guess at their wishes upon any subject on which they are not well informed.

The Senator from Vermont [Mr. Edmunds] has offered another provision looking to the same object. He proposes that, without reference to the people of Nebraska, and without reference to their representatives in the Legislature, we, the representatives of the people of the United States, shall admit that State into the Union with this declaration: "That this act shall take effect with the fundamental and perpetual condition that within said State of Nebraska there shall be no abridgment or denial of the elective franchise, or of any other right to any person by reason of race or color, excepting Indians not taxed." Now, Mr. President, I do hold it to be a very grave question whether we can insert a clause in the constitution of Nebraska or any other incoming State, or whether we can override a clause in their constitution by this mode of proceeding. That question of constitutional power I do not mean to argue on this occasion. I know there are good lawyers who doubt and deny it: I think there is grave reason to doubt it myself; but if we had the clearest authority in the world for doing it, it does not seem to me a right thing to do. We have an undoubted right to say to the people of Nebraska as a Territory, "The ballot shall be put into the hands of all your citizens, white and black." That we can say to them as a Territory, and we can say that the several agencies which they are authorized to choose in a territorial condition they shall choose by the votes of all their people. That we can say; that I think we ought to say; that is a proper thing to say. But they have chosen representatives to wield entirely different powers from what are intrusted to the Legislature of a Territory or to the Governor of a Territory. They have undertaken to say that they will not permit colored people to participate in the choice of these agencies; and we undertake to say that they shall. That is the force of the amendment offered by the Senator from Vermont. They have asked us to admit them with a constitution such as it stands, and with a government selected to wield the powers conferred by that constitution. We are called upon by this amendment to accept the State, to accept that government, to set them up in the exercise of the powers belonging to a State; making them responsible, however, to a radically different constituency from what their own constitution does. That it seems to me, in brief, is substantially the Lecompton question over again. If we have the right to impose such a condition upon the people of that State, it seems to me we ought not to do it. The precedent is a dangerous one. Certainly we could not compel them to come into the Union; certainly we could not compel them to assent to a constitution; that is not attempted to be done. But we take a constitution which they say is satisfactory to them; we take a government which they have selected; we clothe that government with the powers of a State; but in the same act by which we confer these powers upon that government we make a radical change in the organic law presented to us by the people selecting the government. It does not seem to me just; it does not seem to me necessary. It seems to me a great deal better that we should put the people of Nebraska to the slight inconvenience of once more passing upon this question of putting the ballot into the hands of their colored men; and therefore, Mr. President, I shall be compelled to vote against the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts; I shall be compelled to vote against the amendment proposed by the Senator from Vermont, and I shall vote with great pleasure for the amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri; and if it is adopted, I shall vote with great pleasure for the passage of the bill.

Mr. WADE. Mr. President, I hope the friends of the bill will not vote for this amendment.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. Hendricks in the chair.) The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. Wilson] to the amendment of the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. Brown.]

The question being put, a division was called for.

Mr. WADE. Let us have the yeas and nays; that is the way to tell whether we have a quorum or not.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. It seems to me we can undoubtedly come to a vote on this bill to-morrow. The Senate is not very full; there is hardly a quorum here.

Mr. WADE. Well, let us see whether there is a quorum.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas none, nays twenty-four; as follows:

YEAS—0.

NAYS—Messrs. Cattell, Chandler, Conness, Cragin, Creswell, Doolittle, Edmunds, Fogg, Fowler, Frelinghuysen, Hendricks, Howard, Howe, Kirkwood, Lane, Morgan, Morrill, Ross, Stewart, Sumner, Van Winkle, Wade, Wiley, and Williams—24.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Buckalew, Cowan, Davis, Dixon, Fessenden, Foster, Grimes, Guthrie, Harris, Henderson, Johnson, McDougall, Nesmith, Norton, Nye, Patterson, Poland, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Riddle, Saulsbury, Sherman, Sprague, Trumbull, Wilson, and Yates—23.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is not a quorum voting.

Mr. SUMNER. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, &c., That it is hereby made the duty of the Postmaster General to allow Senators and Representatives in Congress to examine all papers and recommendations for office appertaining to all postmasters, post offices, and other postal matters in their several States and congressional districts.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. MOULTON demanded the previous question on the passage of the joint resolution.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the joint resolution was passed.

Mr. MOULTON moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that during the last Monday when the House was in session the call rested with the State of Illinois during the entire morning hour. No gentleman who offered a resolution during that call can offer another now except by unanimous consent.

Mr. MOULTON. I desire to offer a resolution and to demand the previous question upon it.

Mr. LOAN. I raise the point of order that the gentleman has already offered one resolution under this call.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point of order. The gentleman has introduced one resolution under this call, and but one resolution can be introduced by a member on the call of States.

SALE OF COIN AND BULLION.

Mr. INGERSOLL introduced a bill to regulate the sale of coin and bullion by the Secretary of the Treasury; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. LOAN. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois introduced two resolutions on the last Monday when the House was in session.

Mr. WENTWORTH. I asked to offer them by unanimous consent, and not under the call.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri objects.

Mr. WENTWORTH. I wish the Speaker to state the facts.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that the gentleman introduced two resolutions on the last Monday when the House was in session.

Mr. WENTWORTH. Did I do it under the call?

The SPEAKER. One was introduced under the call and the other by unanimous consent.

The gentleman from Missouri (Mr. LOAN) objects, and the gentleman from Illinois can offer no further resolutions.

Mr. CULLOM. I ask unanimous consent to offer a resolution. I think I offered one the last Monday the House was in session, but I am not certain.

Mr. LOAN. I make the point of order on the gentleman.

Mr. CULLOM. I ask that my resolution may be read for information.

Mr. LOAN. I have no objection to that.

The resolution was read, and is as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to report a bill providing for the repeal of all laws and parts of laws giving the Secretary of the Treasury authority to withdraw any of the national legal-tender currency from circulation, except the compound-interest notes, which shall be funded in the bonds of the United States as they mature.

Mr. LOAN. I object.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. COBB, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled an act (H. R. 828) to repeal section thirteen of an act to suppress insurrection, to punish treason and rebellion, to seize and confiscate the property of rebels, and for other purposes, approved July 17, 1862, when the Speaker signed the same.

COMPENSATION FOR SLAVES ENLISTED.

Mr. McCLURG. I offer the following preamble and resolution, upon which I demand the previous question:

Whereas under the provisions of section twenty-four of an act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes,'" approved February 24, 1864, the Secretary of War was required to appoint a commission in each of the slave States represented in Congress to award to each loyal person to whom a colored volunteer may have owed service a just compensation, payable out of the fund derived from commutations; and whereas under the provisions of section two of an act approved July 28, 1866, entitled "An act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1867, and for other purposes," so much of any money in the Treasury known as the commutation fund as may be necessary was appropriated for payment to such claimants of the amounts before or thereafter to be awarded upon the final reports of such commissions on all such claims; and whereas also it is represented that so vague and deceptive are the interpretations of the word "loyal," and so perverted the consciences of those who sympathized with the late rebellion, that oaths are unscrupulously taken, and proofs made which will compel the most watchful commissioners now in session to award millions of dollars to the most guileful enemies of the Government, contrary to the spirit of the acts before mentioned; Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire into the constitutionality and expediency of a repeal of these laws, and to report to this House by bill or otherwise.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered, being upon agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. HARDING, of Kentucky, demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 107, nays 30, not voting 54; as follows:

So the resolution was agreed to.

The question recurred upon agreeing to the preamble.

Mr. McCLURG. Upon that I call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the preamble was agreed to.

Mr. McCLURG moved to reconsider the votes by which the preamble and resolution were agreed to; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

IMPEACHMENT OF THE PRESIDENT, ETC.

Mr. LOAN submitted the following resolution, upon which he called the previous question:

Resolved, That for the purpose of securing the fruits of the victories gained on the part of the Republic during the late war, waged by rebels and traitors against the life of the nation, and of giving effect to the will of the people as expressed at the polls during the recent elections by a majority numbering in the aggregate more than four hundred thousand votes, it is the imperative duty of the Thirty-Ninth Congress to take without delay such action as will accomplish the following objects:

1. The impeachment of the officer now exercising the functions pertaining to the office of President of the United States of America, and his removal from said office upon his conviction, in due form of law, of the high crimes and misdemeanors of which he is manifestly and notoriously guilty, and which render it unsafe longer to permit him to exercise the powers he has unlawfully assumed.

2. To provide for the faithful and efficient administration of the executive department of the Government within the limits prescribed by law.

3. To provide effective means for immediately reorganizing civil governments in those States lately in rebellion, excepting Tennessee, and for restoring them to their practical relations with the Government upon a basis of loyalty and justice; and to this end,

4. To secure by the direct intervention of Federal authority the right of franchise alike, without regard to color, to all classes of loyal citizens residing within those sections of the Republic which were lately in rebellion.

Mr. BINGHAM. I would inquire in what manner this resolution comes before the House?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LOAN] offers it under the regular call of States for resolutions, and demands the previous question upon its adoption.

Mr. BINGHAM. I hope the previous question will not be seconded.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. Will the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LOAN] withdraw his call for the previous question until I offer an amendment, when I will renew the call for the previous question?

Mr. LOAN. I will hear the amendment read.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman must either withdraw or insist upon his call for the previous question. If it is withdrawn, and any member rises to discuss the resolution, it must go over under the rule.

Mr. LOAN. Then I insist upon the call for the previous question.

Mr. ANCONA. I move that the resolution be laid upon the table.

Mr. LOAN and Mr. CHANLER called for the yeas and nays upon the motion to lay the resolution upon the table.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I desire to ask the Chair whether, if the previous question should not be seconded, it will then be in order to move to refer this resolution to the Committee on the Judiciary?

The SPEAKER. If the motion to lay on the table be disagreed to, and the call for the previous question be not seconded, then a motion to refer will be in order, unless some member rises to debate the resolution, when it will go over under the rule.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I would inquire if the caucus of Saturday night did not determine that this and similar resolutions should be sent to the Committee on the Judiciary without debate? [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. That is not a parliamentary inquiry. The question was upon laying the resolution on the table.

Mr. HILL. I desire to inquire of the Chair whether, under the rule, this resolution does not go to the joint committee on reconstruction without debate, as it relates to representation from the lately rebellious States?

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. LOAN. I ask leave to modify my resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman cannot do that; now the point of order is raised. The Chair will explain the reason for his decision sustaining the point of order. The third clause of the resolution provides that it is the imperative duty of Congress—

To provide effective means for immediately reorganizing civil governments in those States lately in rebellion excepting Tennessee, and for restoring them to the practical relations with the Government upon a basis of loyalty and justice.

During the last session of Congress the Chair ruled, upon a resolution offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. ELDRIDGE], alluding to the practical relations of a State with the General Government, that it included the question of representation, and therefore the resolution should go to the joint committee on reconstruction without debate under the rule. That decision was appealed from, and the decision of the Chair was sustained. According to that ruling, this resolution must go without debate to the joint committee on reconstruction.

Mr. WENTWORTH. Is it in order to move to lay this resolution on the table?

The SPEAKER. The resolution has already gone, under the rule, to the joint committee on reconstruction.

Mr. LOAN. I would inquire if any part of the resolution goes to the joint committee on reconstruction except the portion which the Chair rules has relation to representation from the lately rebellious States?

The SPEAKER. It all goes together.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I rise to a question of order, whether it is not too late to raise this question, the previous question having been seconded and the main question ordered. I think that during the last session, when a similar question was raised by Mr. Voorhees, then a member from Indiana, the Speaker allowed the resolution to be debated.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the question of order. The previous question has not yet been seconded.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. The yeas and nays have been ordered.

The SPEAKER. The yeas and nays have been ordered upon the motion to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. LOAN. I ask leave to withdraw the third and fourth propositions.

Mr. WARD, of New York. I object.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. Has not the gentleman the right to modify the resolution?

The SPEAKER. The resolution is not now before the House; it has been referred, under the rule, to the joint committee on reconstruction.

PRINTING SPECIFICATIONS OF PATENTS.

Mr. BENJAMIN submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be instructed to inform this House if any contract has been entered into with any person or persons for the printing of the specifications of patents, and if so, by virtue of what law the same was made; and that he furnish a copy thereof, with the amount of expenditures incurred in carrying it into effect.

The SPEAKER. This being a call for executive information, unanimous consent is necessary for its consideration on this day.

There being no objection, the resolution was considered and agreed to.

Mr. BENJAMIN moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to:

IMPEACHMENT OF THE PRESIDENT.

Mr. KELSO. I submit the following resolution, on which I demand the previous question:

Resolved, That for the purpose of securing the fruits of the victories gained on the part of the Republic during the late war, waged by rebels and traitors against the life of the nation, and of giving effect to the will of the people, as expressed at the polls during the late election by majorities numbering in the aggregate more than four hundred thousand votes, it is the imperative duty of the Thirty-Ninth Congress to take, without delay, such action as will accomplish the following objects:

1. The impeachment of the officer now exercising the functions pertaining to the office of the President of the United States of America, and his removal from office, upon his conviction, in due form, of the crimes and high misdemeanors of which he is manifestly and notoriously guilty, and which render it unsafe longer to permit him to exercise the powers he has unlawfully assumed.

2. To provide for the faithful and efficient administration of the executive department within the limits prescribed by law.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I rise to a question of order. Is not this precisely the same document that was just offered by the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. LOAN?]

The SPEAKER. It is not. It is quite different, as it omits several things which were in the other.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Was not the other resolution referred to the joint committee on reconstruction?

The SPEAKER. It was.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Is not this the precise paper that was referred?

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. CHANDLER. I call for the yeas and nays on the question of adopting the resolution.

Mr. DAVIS. I move to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. WENTWORTH. I call for the yeas and nays on the motion to lay on the table.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to inquire of the Chair whether, if this motion be not agreed to, it will not be in order to move to refer the resolution to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The SPEAKER. It will be, unless the resolution should give rise to debate, in which case it will go over, under the rule.

Mr. GARFIELD. Then let us refer it.

Mr. WENTWORTH. No; let us pass it to-day.

The question was taken on the motion to lay the resolution on the table; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 40, nays 104, not voting 47; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ancona, Delos R. Ashley, Baldwin, Bergen, Campbell, Chanler, Cooper, Davis, Dawson, Eldridge, Finck, Glossbrenner, Aaron Harding, Hawkins, Hise, Hogan, James R. Hubbell, Humphrey, Hunter, Kerr, Kuykendall, Latham, Leftwich, McCullough, Niblack, Nicholson, Neill, Phelps, Samuel J. Randall, William H. Randall, Ritter, Ross, Shanklin, Strouse, Taber, Nathaniel G. Taylor, Nelson Taylor, Trimble, Andrew H. Ward, Whaley, and Winfield—40.

Van Horn, William B. Washburn, Woodbridge, and Wright—47.

So the House refused to lay the resolution on the table.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour has expired, and the resolution goes over till Monday next.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message in writing was received from the President of the United States, by his Private Secretary, Mr. ROBERT JOHNSON.

OCCUPANCY OF SAN JUAN.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a message from the President of the United States, transmitting, in compliance with a resolution of the House, the report of the Secretary of State of certain correspondence relating to the joint occupancy of the Island of San Juan, in Washington Territory; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

ARREST OF JOHN H. SURRATT.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a message from the President, transmitting an additional report of the Secretary of State relating to the discovery and arrest of John H. Surratt; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary and ordered to be printed.

IMPEACHMENT OF THE PRESIDENT.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I rise to perform a painful but, nevertheless, to me an imperative duty; a duty which I think ought not longer to be postponed, and which cannot, without criminality on our part, be neglected. I had hoped, sir, that this duty would have devolved upon an older and more experienced member of this House than myself. Prior to our adjournment I asked a number of gentlemen to offer the resolution which I introduced, but upon which I failed to obtain a suspension of the rules.

Confident, sir, that the loyal people of this country demand at our hands the adoption of some such proposition as I am about to submit, I am determined that no effort on my part shall be wanting to see that their expectations are not disappointed.

Mr. FINCK. I rise to a point of order. I want to know what the question is.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I will state it.

Mr. FINCK. I have not heard it.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman insists, the question must be stated.

Mr. FINCK. I do insist.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. Then, sir, on my responsibility as a Representative, and in the presence of this House, and before the American people, I charge Andrew Johnson, Vice President and acting President of the United States, with the commission of acts which, in contemplation of the Constitution, are high crimes and misdemeanors, for which, in my judgment, he ought to be impeached. I therefore submit the following—

Mr. FINCK. I propose another question of order. Is that a question of privilege?

The SPEAKER. It is. In the Twenty-Seventh Congress, by the then Speaker, it was decided, on the point raised by Horace Everett, of Vermont, that it was a question of privilege.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Is there not a special order for to-day?

The SPEAKER. The unfinished business, which is the regular order, cannot interfere with this proposition.

The Clerk read the proposition of Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio, which is as follows:

I do impeach Andrew Johnson, Vice President and acting President of the United States, of high crimes and misdemeanors.

I charge him with a usurpation of power and violation of law:

In that he has corruptly used the appointing power;

In that he has corruptly used the pardoning power;

In that he has corruptly used the veto power;

In that he has corruptly disposed of public property of the United States;

In that he has corruptly interfered in elections, and committed acts which, in contemplation of the Constitution, are high crimes and misdemeanors: Therefore

Be it resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be, and they are hereby, authorized to inquire into the official conduct of Andrew Johnson, Vice President of the United States, discharging the powers and duties of the office of President of the United States, and to report to this House whether, in their opinion, the said Andrew Johnson, while in said office, has been guilty of acts which are designed or calculated to overthrow, subvert, or corrupt the Government of the United States, or any department or office thereof; and whether the said Andrew Johnson has been guilty of any act, or has conspired with others to do acts, which, in contemplation of the Constitution, are high crimes and misdemeanors, requiring the interposition of the constitutional power of this House; and that said committee have power to send for persons and papers, and to administer the customary oath to witnesses.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I demand the previous question.

Mr. SPALDING. I move it be laid upon the table.

Mr. FINCK. I demand the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 39, nays 105, not voting 47; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ancona, Bergen, Campbell, Cooper, Davis, Dawson, Dodge, Eldridge, Finck, Glossbrenner, Griswold, Aaron Harding, Hawkins, Hise, Hogan, James R. Hubbell, Humphrey, Hunter, Kerr, Leftwich, McCullough, Niblack, Nicholson, Phelps, Samuel J. Randall, Raymond, Ritter, Ross, Shanklin, Spalding, Strouse, Taber, Nathaniel G. Taylor, Nelson Taylor, Trimble, Andrew H. Ward, Whaley, and Winfield—39.

NAYS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, Arnell, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Baker, Banks, Barker, Baxter, Beaman, Benjamin, Bidwell, Bingham, Boutwell, Brandegee, Bromwell, Broomall, Buckland, Bundy, Chanler, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Cook, Cullom, Culver, Darling, Deftrees, Delano, Deming, Dixon, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Farnsworth, Farquhar, Ferry, Garfield, Grinnell, Abner C. Harding, Hart, Hayes, Henderson, Higby, Hill, Holmes, Hooper, Chester D. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Julian, Kasson, Kelley, Kelso, Kuykendall, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, Loan, Longyear, Lynch, Marston, Marvin, Maynard, McClurg, McKee, McRuer, Mercur, Miller, Moorhead, Morrill, Moulton, Myers, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Patterson, Perham, Plants, Price, William H. Randall, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Sawyer, Schenck, Scofield, Starr, Stevens, Stokes, Thayer, John L. Thomas, Francis Thomas, Trowbridge, Upson, Van Aernam, Hamilton Ward, Warner, Elihu B. Washburne, Henry D. Washburn, Welker, Wentworth, Williams, James F. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, and Windom—105.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Anderson, Baldwin, Blaine, Blow, Boyer, Conkling, Dawes, Denison, Dumont, Eggleston, Eliot, Goodyear, Hale, Harris, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, Demas Hubbard, Edwin N. Hubbard, Hulbard, Johnson, Jones, Ketcham, Koontz, Laffin, Latham, Le Blond, Marshall, Marston, McIndoe, Morris, Newell, Neill, Pike, Pomeroy, Radford, Rogers, Rollins, Rousseau, Shellabarger, Sitgreaves, Sloan, Stilwell, Thornton, Burt Van Horn, Robert T. Van Horn, William B. Washburn, Woodbridge, and Wright—47.

So the House refused to lay the resolution upon the table.

The question recurred on seconding the demand for the previous question.

Mr. BINGHAM. I wish to inquire if the demand for the previous question is not seconded whether it will not then be in order to move to refer the resolution.

The SPEAKER. It will.

Mr. BINGHAM. Then I hope it will not be seconded.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I hope it will be. [Laughter.]

The question being taken on seconding the demand for the previous question, there were—aye 67, noes 49.

Mr. BINGHAM demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chair appointed Messrs. BINGHAM and ASHLEY, of Ohio.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—aye 75, noes 46.

So the previous question was seconded.

The main question was then ordered.

Mr. FINCK. I demand the yeas and nays on the passage of the resolution.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. MYERS called for the reading of the resolution.

The resolution was accordingly read.

Mr. HUBBELL, of Ohio. I wish to inquire whether a motion to refer the resolution to the Committee on the Judiciary would at this time be in order.

The SPEAKER. It would not, the previous question having been seconded, and the main question ordered. It could only be done by first reconsidering the vote by which the main question was ordered.

Mr. HUBBELL, of Ohio. Can the motion to reconsider that vote be made by a member who voted in the negative?

The SPEAKER. It would be in order for any member to make the motion from the fact that the yeas and nays were not ordered upon it.

Mr. HUBBELL, of Ohio. Then I move to reconsider the vote by which the House ordered the main question, and I will notify the House—

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio, and others. I object.

Mr. HUBBELL, of Ohio. That I intend to move to refer the resolution to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. WENTWORTH. I object to debate. I want to make a speech myself. [Laughter.]

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I move to lay the motion of my colleague on the table.

Several MEMBERS. Oh, no.

Mr. ASHLEY of Ohio. I withdraw it.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I demand the yeas and nays on the motion to reconsider.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. WENTWORTH. I rise to a point of order. I understood the Speaker to decide that the House could not take the yeas and nays on seconding the demand for the previous question.

The SPEAKER. It can on ordering the main question.

Mr. WENTWORTH. The motion I understand is on reconsidering the vote by which the previous question was ordered. Now, if on the original question you cannot have the yeas and nays, you cannot on the other.

The SPEAKER. There are two questions. On seconding the previous question the yeas and nays cannot be taken; on ordering the main question the yeas and nays can be taken. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HUBBELL] moves to reconsider the vote by which the main question was ordered.

Mr. WENTWORTH. I think this is not the motion of the gentleman.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that it is.

Mr. HUBBELL, of Ohio. That was my motion.

Mr. BINGHAM. I wish to inquire if the House reconsiders the vote and then refuses the demand for the previous question, whether the resolution will not then be open for amendment and debate.

The SPEAKER. It would.

Mr. STEVENS. I move to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. On that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 94, nays 47, not voting 50; as follows:

YEAS—Allison, Arnell, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Baker, Banks, Barker, Baxter, Beaman, Benjamin, Bidwell, Bingham, Boutwell, Brandegee, Bromwell, Broomall, Buckland, Bundy, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Cook, Cullom, Deffrees, Delano, Deming, Dixon, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Farnsworth, Farquhar, Ferry, Garfield, Grinnell, Abner C. Harding, Hart, Hayes, Henderson, Higby, Hill, Holmes, John H. Hubbard, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Julian, Kelley, Kelso, Ketcham, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, Loan, Longyear, Lynch, Marvin, McClurg, McKee, McRuer, Mercer, Miller, Moorhead, Morrill, Moulton, Myers, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Patterson, Perham, Pike, Price, William H. Randall, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Sawyer, Schenck, Scofield, Starr, Stevens, Stokes, Thayer, John L. Thomas, Trowbridge, Upson, Van Aernam, Hamilton Ward, Warner, Elihu B. Washburn, Henry D. Washburn, Welker, Wentworth, Williams, James F. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, and Windom—44.

NAYS—Messrs. Alley, Ames, Ancona, Baldwin, Bergen, Campbell, Chanler, Cooper, Davis, Dawson, Eldridge, Finck, Glossbrenner, Griswold, Aaron Harding, Hawkins, Hise, Hogan, Chester D. Hubbard, James R. Hubbell, Humphrey, Hunter, Kerr, Kuykendall, Latham, Lettwith, Maynard, McCullough, Niblack, Nicholson, Noel, Phelps, Plants, Samuel J. Randall, Raymond, Ritter, Ross, Shanklin, Spalding, Strouse, Taber, Nathaniel G. Taylor, Nelson Taylor, Trimble, Andrew H. Ward, Whaley, and Winfield—37.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Anderson, Bingham, Blaine, Blow, Boyer, Conkling, Culver, Darling, Davies, Denison, Dodge, Dumont, Eggleston, Eliot, Goodyear, Hale, Harris, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, Demas Hubbard, Edwin N. Hubbell, Hulburd, Johnson, Jones, Kasson, Koontz, Laffin, Le Blond, Marshall, Marston, McIndoe, Morris, Newell, Pomeroy, Radford, Rogers, Rollins, Rousseau, Shellabarger, Sitgreaves, Sloan, Stillwell, Francis Thomas, Thornton, Burt Van Horn, Robert T. Van Horn, William B. Washburn, Woodbridge, and Wright—50.

So the motion to reconsider was laid upon the table.

The question recurred upon agreeing to the resolution, upon which the yeas and nays had been ordered.

Mr. NIBLACK. I rise to a question of order. I submit whether the laying of the motion to reconsider upon the table does not carry the resolution with it.

The SPEAKER. It does not, by the express language of the Digest:

"In general, whatever adheres to the subject of this motion [to lay upon the table] goes on the table with it; as for example, where a motion to amend is ordered to lie on the table, the subject which it is proposed to amend goes with it. But it is not so with the Journal, where it is voted to lay upon the table a proposed amendment thereto." "Nor with the bill or other proposition, where the motion to reconsider is laid upon the table."—Barclay's Digest, page 109.

The question was taken on agreeing to the resolution; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 107, nays 39, not voting, 45; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, Arnell, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Baker, Baldwin, Banks, Barker, Baxter, Beaman, Benjamin, Bidwell, Bingham, Blaine, Boutwell, Brandegee, Bromwell, Broomall, Buckland, Bundy, Chandler, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Cook, Cullom, Culver, Darling, Deffrees, Delano, Deming, Dixon, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Farnsworth, Farquhar, Ferry, Garfield, Grinnell, Abner C. Harding, Hart, Hayes, Henderson, Higby, Hill, Holmes, Hooper, Chester D. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Julian, Kasson, Kelley, Kelso, Ketcham, Kuykendall, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, Loan, Longyear, Lynch, Marston, Marvin, Maynard, McClurg, McKee, McRuer, Mercer, Miller, Moorhead, Morrill, Moulton, Myers, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Patterson, Perham, Pike, Price, William H. Randall, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Sawyer, Schenck, Scofield, Starr, Stevens, Stokes, Thayer, John L. Thomas, Trowbridge, Upson, Van Aernam, Hamilton Ward, Warner, Elihu B. Washburn, Henry D. Washburn, Welker, Wentworth, Williams, James F. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, and Windom—108.

NAYS—Messrs. Ancona, Bergen, Campbell, Cooper, Davis, Dawson, Dodge, Eldridge, Finck, Glossbrenner, Aaron Harding, Hawkins, Hise, Hogan, James R. Hubbell, Humphrey, Hunter, Kerr, Latham, Lettwith, McCullough, Niblack, Nicholson, Noel, Phelps, Samuel J. Randall, Raymond, Ritter, Ross, Spalding, Strouse, Taber, Nathaniel G. Taylor, Nelson Taylor, Trimble, Andrew H. Ward, Whaley, and Winfield—38.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Anderson, Blow, Boyer, Conkling, Davies, Denison, Dumont, Eggleston, Eliot, Goodyear, Griswold, Hale, Harris, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, Demas Hubbard, Edwin N. Hubbell, Hulburd, Johnson, Jones, Koontz, Laffin, Le Blond, Marshall, McIndoe, Morris, Newell, Plants, Pomeroy, Radford, Rogers, Rollins, Rousseau, Shanklin, Shellabarger, Sitgreaves, Sloan, Stillwell, Francis Thomas, Thornton, Burt Van Horn, Robert T. Van Horn, William B. Washburn, Woodbridge, and Wright—45.

So the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate, by Mr. McDONALD, its Chief Clerk, notifying the House that that body had passed without amendment a joint resolution (H. R. No. 221) authorizing certain medals to be distributed to honorably discharged soldiers free of postage.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed a bill (S. No. 459) suspending the payment of moneys from the Treasury as compensation to persons claiming the service or labor of colored volunteers, and for other purposes.

Also, a joint resolution (S. R. No. 154) to provide for the exhibition of cereal productions of the United States at the Paris Exposition in April next; in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

EXPLORATION OF ISTHMUS OF DARIEN.

Mr. BENJAMIN. Has the morning hour expired?

The SPEAKER. It has.

Mr. BENJAMIN. Then I move to proceed to business upon the Speaker's table.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The first business upon the Speaker's table is the joint resolution of the Senate No. 149 to extend aid and facilities to the citizens of the United States engaged in the survey of a route for a ship-canal across the Isthmus of Darien.

The joint resolution was read a first and second time.

The question was upon ordering the joint resolution to be read a third time.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I move to refer this joint resolution to the Committee of Commerce.

Mr. BANKS. I move to amend that motion so as to refer the joint resolution to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I ask that the joint resolution be read.

The joint resolution was read. It authorizes and requests the Secretary of the Navy to furnish such aid and facilities to citizens of the United States who are undertaking an exploration and survey of the Isthmus of Darien for the purpose of discovering a favorable line for a ship-canal to connect the Atlantic and Pacific oceans as he may be able to furnish without prejudice to the naval service, and without additional expense to the Government of the United States.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I think, upon hearing that joint resolution read, that it properly belongs to the Committee on Naval Affairs. Therefore I withdraw my motion to refer it to the Committee of Commerce.

Mr. BANKS. I move to refer it to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I move to amend so as to refer it to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. BANKS. I ask the Chair to decide to which committee it properly belongs.

The SPEAKER. That is a question for the House to decide. The Chair is of opinion that it can properly go to either committee.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I ask that the rule be read establishing the Committee on Naval Affairs. I think that will determine the question.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the rule establishing the Committee on Naval Affairs, and also the rule establishing the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

The Clerk read as follows:

"It shall be the duty of the Committee on Naval Affairs to take into consideration all matters which concern the naval establishment, and which shall be referred to them by the House, and to report their opinion thereupon; and also to report, from time to time, such measures as may contribute to economy and accountability in the said establishment."

"It shall be the duty of the Committee on Foreign Affairs to take into consideration all matters which concern the relations of the United States with foreign nations, and which shall be referred to them by the House, and to report their opinion on the same."

Mr. BANKS. I think that, under the rule, this joint resolution clearly belongs to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. BIDWELL. I ask for the present consideration of this joint resolution.

The SPEAKER. The question is now upon the motion to refer. If that motion should be voted down, the question will be upon the third reading and passage of the joint resolution.

Mr. SCOFIELD. As a compromise between the different committees, I propose that the resolution be not referred at all, but that it be taken up and passed at once. It is a measure that everybody can understand, and the passage of which the interests of the country demands.

Mr. BANKS. I will agree to that.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I think it should take the usual course, and be referred to a committee.

Mr. BANKS. Then it should go to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. CHANLER. I rise merely to say a word in behalf of the commercial interests of the country. I do not know that the gentleman from California [Mr. BIDWELL] or the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOFIELD] is better entitled to speak for the commercial interests of the country than a Representative from the great city of New York. Now, while I am in favor of the most extended facilities for commerce, I certainly think that to meet those interests properly and justly, and to carry out properly the dignity of this body, it should be referred to and acted upon by a committee. If the commercial interests of the country demand the passage of this joint resolution, that demand will come with more force from a committee of this body than it will by any immediate and unconsidered action asked for by any individual member of this body.

Mr. BANKS. I withdraw my motion to refer, and trust that this joint resolution will be acted upon now.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I do not believe this House is prepared to pass this joint resolution without any further hearing or debate. I desire to call the attention of members to what this joint resolution is, which they seem to be in such hot haste to pass without reference to any committee. It is for the assistance of certain persons. What persons? The Secretary of the Navy is to be authorized and requested to furnish such aid and facilities to citizens of the United States who are undertaking an exploration and survey of the Isthmus of Darien for the purpose of discovering a favorable line for a ship-canal to connect the Atlantic and Pacific oceans which he may be able to furnish without prejudice to the naval service, and without additional expense to the Government of the United States.

Now I desire to know upon what ground we are asked to legislate in this way. Why should we call upon the Navy Department or any other Department to give these special privileges to these private individuals? Sir, I am opposed to this proposition; at least I am opposed to its being put upon its passage at the present time. I want to know something more about it; I want to know who these individuals are, and all about the matters involved in the consideration of this question. I do not see why there should be objection to having this bill take the usual reference, so that the appropriate committee may report all the facts in regard to this canal. It is, in my judgment, a mere matter of speculation.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I would like to ask the gentleman who has charge of this bill what is the character of the aid which the resolution proposes to give—whether the resolution contemplates an appropriation of money for the purpose of assisting these private individuals. The proposition of the gentleman from Illinois who has just taken his seat appears to me a very proper one. In the absence of full information on this subject it is nothing more than reasonable that the bill should take the accustomed course and be referred to the appropriate committee.

Mr. SCOFIELD. In answer to my colleague from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL,] I will say that I am not advised as to who has charge of this bill, or whether anybody has charge of it. All the information I have on the subject I derive from the debate in the Senate, which I suppose most of the members have read.

It is alleged that there has been discovered a new route over the isthmus far preferable to any heretofore known, and which it is claimed will be of more advantage to this country and the world than all our Navy put together. Ten gentlemen have associated themselves together and have contributed $1,000 each to pay an engineering party to go down and explore this route. They ask that the Secretary of the Navy, who has Government vessels lying about the isthmus doing nothing, may be authorized to detail one of those ships to carry this party of engineers up the river, until they start out upon the overland route. The matter is to be left to the discretion of the Secretary of the Navy. He felt inclined, without any special authority of Congress, to grant the use of a vessel for this purpose; but upon consideration it was thought best to ask the passage of this resolution. That is all there is in this proposition, as I understand it. I can assure the gentleman from Illinois, from the best knowledge I have, that this is no private speculation.

Mr. MAYNARD. Mr. Speaker, the organization of Congress contemplates the investigation of all questions of legislation by both Houses. The Senate have doubtless acted upon what they thought was a sufficient reason for their action. It is our business to investigate the matter and decide for ourselves. We have all of us seen too much of hasty legislation, put through upon first impressions, especially while the war was in progress, when hasty legislation was oftentimes very imperative. There is no such imperative necessity now. Without having any opinion whether or not this is a just measure, one which ought to be passed, I do think it most manifest that we ought to refer the proposition to one of the standing committees for examination. If, as the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOFIELD] seems to suppose, the bill is one proper to be passed, its reference to a committee will delay its passage for only a few days at farthest. Although I have no particular preference as to the committee to which the bill should be referred, I will move its reference, at the suggestion of gentlemen around me, to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and on that motion I demand the previous question.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I have no objection to the reference of the bill, if that course shall accord with the wishes of the House.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and, under the operation thereof, the motion of Mr. MAYNARD was agreed to, and the joint resolution was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was referred; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CHARLES CLARK.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the joint resolution (S. R. No. 146) for the relief of Charles Clark, marshal of the United States for the district of Maine; which was read a first and second time, and, on motion of Mr. BLAINE, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

WISCONSIN.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the joint resolution (S. R. No. 102) construing and giving effect to the joint resolution entitled "A resolution for the relief of the State of Wisconsin," approved July 1, 1864; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. PAINE. I move to amend that it be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 58, noes 60.

So the amendment was disagreed to.

The motion of Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, was agreed to.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PAYMENT FOR SLAVES.

The next business upon the Speaker's table was Senate bill No. 459, suspending the payment of moneys from the Treasury as compensation to persons claiming the service or labor of colored volunteers or drafted men, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time.

The bill, which was read, declares that the final report of the commissioners provided for in the second section of the act of Congress entitled "An act making appropriation for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1867, and for other purposes," approved July 28, 1866, shall be made, through the Secretary of War, to Congress; and no money shall be paid from the Treasury, or from any fund therein, upon the same, or otherwise, to any claimant under the provisions of section twenty-four of the act approved February 24, 1864, entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes,'" approved March 3, 1863, until such report shall be approved and confirmed by Congress.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I desire that the bill shall be put on its passage. I will merely say that at the last session of Congress an amount was appropriated to pay the owners of certain slaves who had entered the service of the United States. The terms of the act are, that loyal owners shall receive compensation not exceeding $300; and it is made the duty of the Secretary of War to appoint a commissioner for each of the slave States then represented in Congress to pass upon these claims. The commissioner has been appointed and is now at work. I am informed by numerous letters I have received from the State of Missouri that the very worst rebels in that State are proving themselves loyal men for the purpose of getting the $300 allowed to them. I suppose it is the same in other States. To give Congress an opportunity to look into this matter the Senate have passed this bill, suspending payment until the report of the commissioner has been received and passed upon. That is the whole of the case.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. It is very nearly the same proposition I submitted at the last session on one of the appropriation bills; and I think it ought to pass.

Mr. BENJAMIN demanded the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I demand the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. MAYNARD. I should like to inquire whether this bill if passed precludes the payment of any such persons as Congress hereafter may on investigation agree ought to be paid, or merely suspend payment until we can have an opportunity to examine the report?

Mr. BENJAMIN. This merely suspends payment of any one until Congress has an opportunity to examine the report of the commissioners sent out to investigate these claims.

Mr. RITTER demanded the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 107, nays 26, not voting 58; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, Arnell, Delos R. Ashley, James M. So the bill was passed.

Mr. BENJAMIN moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PARIS EXPOSITION.

The next and last business on the Speaker's table was Senate joint resolution No. 154, to provide for the exhibition of several productions of the United States at the Paris Exposition in April next; which was read a first and second time.

The joint resolution was read in full. It instructs the Commissioner of Agriculture to collect and prepare as far as practicable, and with as little delay as possible, suitable specimens of the cereal productions of the several States of the Union for exhibition at the Paris Exposition and forward the same in proper order and condition for shipment to J. C. Derby, agent for the United States Government for the Paris Exposition, at New York.

Mr. BIDWELL. I hope this bill will be passed at once.

Mr. SPALDING. I would like to propose a slight amendment by providing that we shall incur no further expense than we have already appropriated money for.

Mr. BIDWELL. Why, this does not require any further appropriation.

Mr. SPALDING. Ah, but it will require it.

Mr. BIDWELL. I certainly would have no objection to the amendment only it involves the necessity of returning the joint resolution to the Senate, which will cause delay. It is important, since the United States are to be represented in the Paris Exposition, that we should without delay take every necessary step to be well represented. This resolution merely authorizes the Commissioner of Agriculture to prepare and forward to New York certain cereals.

Mr. SPALDING. I hope the gentleman will allow me to offer this slight amendment.

Mr. BIDWELL. I will not object.

Mr. SPALDING. I move to amend by adding the words "provided it shall require no further appropriation."

Mr. KASSON. Will the gentleman from California yield to me a moment?

Mr. BIDWELL. Yes, sir.

Mr. KASSON. I am opposed to the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SPALDING.] This joint resolution does not make any appropriation. But even if it should require a small appropriation every member of this House representing an agricultural constituency ought to sustain it. I hope my friend from California will insist upon the passage of the resolution in its present form. The matter needs prompt action. I know the northwestern States are particularly desirous to have a comparison of their cereals with those of other countries; and in my judgment the result will be to save us from incurring unnecessary expense in the future by enabling us to ascertain by comparison what foreign cereals will be useful for introduction into this country.

Mr. BIDWELL. As I said before, I do not object to the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio, but the amount of cereals necessary to be placed in the hands of the agent of the United States at New York in order to properly represent the different portions of the country cannot be very large. A very few bushels of grain from each State will be amply sufficient, and the cost of transportation cannot amount to anything serious, therefore I do not oppose the amendment. I would, however, appeal to the gentleman, who certainly must have the interest of his country at heart and who desires undoubtedly that we shall be well represented in the Paris Exposition, to withdraw his amendment and let us act upon the joint resolution at once. What amount of grain will it take to represent all the States of the Union? What will it cost to transport it to New York? It does seem to me that it will be so small a sum that it will be better not to add the proviso. Let us leave it as it is, and let us be well represented in that important exhibition. If there is anything that deserves to be represented at Paris it is the staff of life, of which our country is so great a producer that it is becoming the granary of the world. I demand the previous question.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Will the gentleman yield a moment?

Mr. BIDWELL. Certainly.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I hope the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio will be adopted. As the resolution now stands it leaves entirely to the discretion of the Commissioner of Agriculture how much shall be selected for transportation to Paris. Of course the Government will be called upon afterward to make appropriation for the transportation of these cereals. How much that appropriation may be nobody knows. Now, sir, the agriculturists of my own State are themselves without any assistance from the Government (they do not ask any) for collecting such products as they desire to have exhibited, and so I think it is throughout the northwestern States. The agricultural societies and men of wealth, if they think it necessary or important to their section of the country to be represented at Paris by the exhibition of seed, will send them over. I am entirely opposed to giving the discretion to the Commissioner of Agriculture as to what and how much shall be selected. He may send over ten ship-loads.

Mr. BIDWELL. I wish to state to the gentleman from Illinois that there is an understanding between the agent of the United States for the Paris Exposition in New York and the Commissioner of Agriculture here that certain States have furnished proper specimens, and perhaps certain other States will do it; but the idea is to secure uniformity and universal representation there. It seems that this can only be done through some great central agency, and the Department of Agriculture seems to be the proper agency. Whenever it is found that specimens have been offered from any State, of course there will be no expense incurred in obtaining other specimens from that State; but we desire to have the entire country represented.

Mr. STEVENS. I desire to ask the gentleman from California a question.

Mr. BIDWELL. I will yield for that purpose, although I desire to call the previous question.

Mr. STEVENS. I desire to know whether he understands by this resolution that the expenses are to be taken out of the present appropriation for the Agricultural Department.

Mr. BIDWELL. Yes, sir; whatever expenses may be incurred.

Mr. TROWBRIDGE. The gentleman from California will allow me to answer the question of the gentleman from Pennsylvania. I saw the Commissioner of Agriculture this morning, and he said that this expense would be taken out of the appropriation already made for his Department.

Mr. STEVENS. It happens that no appropriation has been made this year.

Mr. BIDWELL. We have passed the appropriation this year.

Mr. STEVENS. No, sir; the gentleman is mistaken. The appropriation is hung up now on an amendment to cut down the appropriation for the Agricultural Department. If that amendment is to prevail and then we are to withdraw this amount—which, I understand, cannot amount to less than five or ten thousand dollars—I do not know that I shall object; but I think we should decide what the Department shall get before we impose this additional expense upon it. A large appropriation has already been made for this purpose, under the eloquent persuasion of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BANKS.] and I had hoped that that would be the end of the expenditures for this foreign Exposition. I do not begrudge what has been already voted, because the knowledge we may acquire will probably be worth that much money; but I do object to taking this additional amount out of the funds appropriated to the Agricultural Department. I have a notion to send my own potatoes over there, and my friend from Connecticut [Mr. HUBBARD] would send his onions.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Connecticut. I gave my friend some onion seed this morning.

Mr. STEVENS. I acknowledge the receipt of it; but I would really like to know what is to become of the appropriation for the Department before I vote to exhaust it in this way.

Mr. BIDWELL. It is well known that the Commissioner of Agriculture has many ways in which to procure what is desired by this resolution without any great amount of expense. I presume he will have merely to request the different agricultural societies with which he is in communication to get nearly everything which he would require; but if he should have to purchase a small amount, I want to know if the gentleman expects him to get it for nothing. The sum would be so small, if there should be anything to pay, that no one could object to it.

Now, sir, as we have determined to be represented in this great Exposition, I hope the American people will insist, through their Representatives in this Congress that they shall be so represented as to have their country not surpassed by any nation under Heaven. If there is anything that would benefit this country by imparting information across the water, it would be to show the capacity of this country for producing the cereals, and for one I hope that we will do everything in our power to be represented at least in that important feature.

Mr. SPALDING. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him one question?

Mr. BIDWELL. I will; but I am occupying too much time.

Mr. SPALDING. How much have we already appropriated for this Paris Exposition? Did we not appropriate money for this very purpose?

Mr. BIDWELL. I understand that we appropriated $100,000.

Mr. SPALDING. We appropriated $250,000, and my object is to keep the expenditure within that amount.

Mr. BIDWELL. I now yield for five minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BANKS.]

Mr. BANKS. The expenditure for this purpose will be very slight indeed. The Agricultural Department can pay it out of its appropriations without interfering at all with the working of the office; or if the Commissioner cannot now do it, and the appropriations to be made for that Department hereafter shall be such as not to justify it, then he will not do it. It is left entirely to his discretion. Most of the States have already forwarded specimens of their cereals; and agricultural and other societies interested in grain in the principal States have collections which can be forwarded with very little expense. I hope the resolution, with the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SPALDING,] will be allowed to pass.

Mr. BIDWELL. I now call the previous question.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. As the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SPALDING] will not change the joint resolution, I move to lay it on the table.

The question was taken; and upon a division there were—ayes 47, noes 50.

Before the result of the vote was announced, Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, called for the yeas and nays upon the motion to lay the joint resolution on the table.

The question was taken upon ordering the yeas and nays; and upon a division there were—ayes 12, noes 70.

So, one fifth not voting in the affirmative, the yeas and nays were not ordered.

The motion to lay on the table was accordingly not agreed to.

The question recurred upon seconding the call for the previous question; and being taken, upon a division there were—ayes 63, noes 38.

So the previous question was seconded.

The main question was then ordered.

The first question was upon the amendment of Mr. SPALDING, to amend the joint resolution by adding to it the following words:

Provided, That it shall require no further appropriation from the public Treasury.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution, as amended, was then read the third time.

The question was upon the passage of the joint resolution as amended.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Upon that question I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 84, nays 48, not voting 58; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ancona, Baldwin, Banks, Barker, Baxter, Bergen, Bidwell, Blaine, Boutwell, Broomall, Buckland, Bundy, Chanler, Reader W. NOT VOTING—Messrs. Alley, Ames, Anderson, Arnell, Delos R. Rice, Rogers, Rollins, Rousseau, Shellabarger, Sitgreaves, Sloan, Stillwell, Nathaniel G. Taylor, Francis Thomas, Thornton, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Robert T. Van Horn, William B. Washburn, Woodbridge, and Wright—58.

So the joint resolution was passed.

Mr. BIDWELL moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

Mr. TROWBRIDGE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled a joint resolution of the following title:

Joint resolution (H. R. No. 221) authorizing certain medals to be distributed to honorably discharged soldiers free of postage; when the Speaker signed the same.

RIO GRANDE LAND GRANTS.

The Speaker laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Territory of New Mexico, transmitting a joint resolution of the territorial Legislature regarding Rio Grande land grants; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands and ordered to be printed.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. HENDERSON asked and obtained indefinite leave of absence for Mr. DENNY, Delegate from Washington Territory.

ABOLITION OF SLAVERY.

Mr. KASSON. I ask unanimous consent to introduce a joint resolution declaratory of the meaning of the thirteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States of America. If objection be made I shall move to suspend the rules.

Mr. THAYER. I move that the House adjourn.

Mr. KASSON. I think the gentleman will withdraw that motion if he will hear the joint resolution reported.

Mr. THAYER. I insist on the motion.

The motion was not agreed to; there being—ayes 40, noes 70.

Mr. KASSON. I move to suspend the rules to introduce the joint resolution which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas the Congress of the United States at the second session of the Thirty-Eighth Congress, proposed to the several States for adoption the thirteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which has now, by the ratification of three-fourths of the States of the Union, become part of the Constitution, and which by its terms forever prohibits slavery or involuntary servitude "except as a punishment for crime whereof the party shall have been duly convicted," and whereas in some parts of this Union it is asserted and maintained that, notwithstanding said amendment, it is lawful to sell or otherwise commit into unofficial subjection to slavery persons who may be convicted of offenses against the law, by reason whereof certain inferior tribunals have adjudged free citizens of the United States to be so disposed of as to reestablish chattel slavery for life or for years, against the principles of the Christian religion, of civilization, and of the Constitution of the United States, which now recognizes no involuntary servitude, except to the law and to the officers of its administration: Now therefore,

Be it resolved, &c. That the true intent and meaning of said amendment prohibits slavery or involuntary servitude forever in all forms, except in direct execution of a sentence imposing a definite penalty according to law, which penalty cannot, without violation of the Constitution, impose any other servitude than that of imprisonment or other restraint of freedom under the immediate control of officers of the law and according to the usual course thereof, to the exclusion of all unofficial control of the person so held in servitude; and that all orders, judgments, or decrees authorizing or directing the sale or other disposition into servitude of any person within the jurisdiction of the United States otherwise than as above declared to be lawful, are and shall be taken and held to be in violation of the thirteenth constitutional amendment aforesaid, and therefore void.

Mr. KASSON. Mr. Speaker, I suppose it is known to every gentleman in the House that in certain States of this Union, notwithstanding the constitutional amendment referred to in this joint resolution, men are being, perhaps every month, sold into perpetual slavery, under a form of law by which inferior tribunals order that a man shall be sold at public auction, and call that an execution of a legitimate sentence of the law. This seems to me to have arisen from the fundamental error of supposing that when we abolished slavery throughout the United States—

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I rise to a question of order. Is debate in order upon a motion to suspend the rules?

The SPEAKER. It is not, if any member objects.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I object.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion to suspend the rules.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. On that motion I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 111, nays 26, not voting 54; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Arnell, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Baker, Baldwin, Banks, Baxter, Beaman, Benjamin, Bidwell, Bingham, Blaine, Boutwell, Bromwell, Broomall, Buckland, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Cook, Cullom, Darling, Davis, Deftrees, Delano, Deming, Dixon, Dodge, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Eliot, Farnsworth, Farquhar, Garfield, Grinnell, Griswold, Abner C. Harding, Hart, Hawkins, Hayes, Henderson, Higby, Hill, Holmes, Hooper, Chester D. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, James R. Hubbell, Hunter, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Julian, Kasson, Kelley, Kelso, Ketcham, Kuykendall, Latham, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, Loan, Longyear, Lynch, Marston, Maynard, McClurg, McRuer, Mercer, Miller, Moorhead, Morrill, Moulton, Myers, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Patterson, Perham, Pike, Plants, Price, William H. Randall, Raymond, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Rollins, Sawyer, Schenck, Scofield, Spalding, Starr, Stevens, Stokes, Thayer, John L. Thomas, Trowbridge, Upson, Van Aernam, Hamilton Ward, Warner, Elihu B. Washburne, Henry D. Washburn, Welker, Wentworth, Williams, James F. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, and Windom—111.

NAYS—Messrs. Ancona, Bergen, Campbell, Cooper, Dawson, Eldridge, Finck, Glossbrenner, Aaron Harding, Hogan, Humphrey, Kerr, Leftwich, McCullough, Niblack, Phelps, Samuel J. Randall, Ritter, Shanklin, Strouse, Taber, Nathaniel G. Taylor, Nelson Taylor, Trimble, Andrew H. Ward, and Winfield—26.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Alley, Anderson, Barker,

Blow, Boyer, Brandegee, Bundy, Chanler, Conkling, Culver, Dawes, Denison, Dumont, Eggleston, Ferry, Goodyear, Hale, Harris, Hise, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, Demas Hubbard, Edwin N. Hubbell, Hulburd, Johnson, Jones, Kuntz, Lafin, Le Blond, Marshall, Marvin, McIndoe, McKee, Morris, Newell, Nicholson, Neell, Pomeroy, Radford, Rogers, Ross, Rousseau, Shellabarger, Sitgreaves, Sloan, Stillwell, Francis Thomas, Thornton, Burt Van Horn, Robert T. Van Horn, William B. Washburn, Whaley, Woodbridge, and Wright—54.

So (two thirds voting in favor thereof) the rules were suspended.

The joint resolution was accordingly introduced and read a first and second time.

Mr. KASSON. Several gentlemen desire to get the attention of the House for a few moments, and some desire the House to adjourn. As this is now before the House, if I can retain it as the first business for to-morrow, I am willing to yield to any gentleman. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

RECONSTRUCTION.

Mr. STEVENS. I desire to make a motion in reference to House bill No. 543, which relates to the subject of reconstruction. As I propose to be absent from the city for a few days, I move that the bill be postponed temporarily, for one week after the adjournment to-morrow, and to be taken up immediately after the reading of the Journal.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. STEVENS. I wish to modify my substitute so that the modification may be printed before it again comes up for consideration. I move to add after the fourth section the following:

And no person shall be deprived of the right to vote or otherwise disfranchised by reason of conviction or punishment for any crime other than for insurrection or treason or misprision of treason.

I propose to add that as a modification of my substitute, that conviction for crime except for treason shall not take away the right to vote. And if the House will indulge me, I will give reason for it now, so that gentlemen may understand it. I have received information from gentlemen connected with the Freedmen's Bureau—I knew it for weeks past, but only yesterday received the information officially—that in North Carolina and other States where punishment at the whipping-post deprives the person of the right to vote, they are now every day whipping negroes for a thousand and one trivial offenses; and one of the lieutenants now there—I need not name him, because as he fears it might be fatal to him—told me last Saturday that they are taking them up in the different counties, and in one county before he left they had whipped every adult male negro whom they knew of. They were all convicted and sentenced at once, and he ascertained by intermingling with the people that it was for the purpose of preventing these negroes from voting under the bills which have been passed.

I now move that the substitute, as modified, be ordered to be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

NATIONAL BANK CIRCULATION.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. I ask unanimous consent to introduce the following resolution:

Resolved, That it is not expedient to increase the circulating notes of the national banks beyond the amount of $300,000,000, as now prescribed by law; and any such notes required for organizing additional capital in national banks should be provided by reducing the proportion of circulating notes which the several banks are now entitled to receive from the Comptroller of the Treasury.

And I ask that the resolution be put upon its passage.

Mr. THAYER. I object.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. I move to suspend the rules.

The SPEAKER. That motion is not now in order.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania to withdraw his objection.

Mr. THAYER. I object to such hasty legislation, and I shall insist on my objection. This, sir, is not the way for this House to act upon a question of such importance.

AMENDMENT TO THE TARIFF BILL.

Mr. ALLEY. I ask unanimous consent to introduce the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to report a bill, if in their judgment expedient, to repeal immediately so much of the tariff act of July 1, 1864, as is contained in the following clause of section five of that act: "On lastings, mohair cloth, silk twist, and other manufactures of cloth, woven or made in patterns of such size, shape, and form, or cut in such manner as to be fit for shoes, slippers, boots, booties, gaiters, and patterns exclusively not combined with India-rubber, ten per cent, ad valorem."

Mr. THAYER. Does that instruct the committee? Does it give the committee discretion, or is it peremptory?

A MEMBER. It is peremptory.

Mr. THAYER. Then I object.

Mr. ALLEY. It is merely a resolution of inquiry.

Mr. THAYER. Then I withdraw my objection.

The resolution was adopted.

FRASER, TRENHOLM AND COMPANY.

Mr. DEMING, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, by the House of Representatives, That the President is hereby requested, if in his judgment not incompatible with the public interest, to communicate to the House all correspondence between the State Department and Messrs. Adams, minister at the Court of St. James, Dudley, consul at Liverpool, Morse, consul at London, Gibbs, Treasury agent, or with any other persons respecting the compromise of certain suits instituted in the English courts in behalf of the United States against Fraser, Trenholm & Co., alleged agents of the so-called Confederate government.

SINKING FUND.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to authorize the issue of Treasury notes not bearing interest to be used in providing a sinking fund for the extinguishment of the national debt; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, and ordered to be printed.

ABOLITION OF SLAVERY—AGAIN.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I demand the regular order of business.

Mr. KASSON. I move to adjourn, in accordance with the understanding I have that the pending joint resolution will be the unfinished business of to-morrow.

Mr. THAYER. I object to the gentleman's making any condition with the House. If that be the legal status of the joint resolution if we adjourn now, very well.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has already stated if the House now adjourns this will be the first business to-morrow.

MURDER OF UNION SOLDIERS.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the special committee appointed to investigate the murder of Union men in South Carolina be instructed to inquire into the facts concerning the murder of Edward M. Knowles, first lieutenant company K, forty-second Indiana regiment, at Augusta, Georgia, in December, 1864, while a prisoner of war.

SOLDIERS' BOUNTY.

Mr. MILLER, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill supplementary to an act granting additional bounty to certain enlisted soldiers, approved July 28, 1866; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

And then, on motion of Mr. KASSON, (at three o'clock and forty-five minutes p. m.,) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, January 8, 1867.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. E. H. GRAY. The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Interior and Acting Postmaster General, transmitting the report of the commissioner appointed under the joint resolution of May 16, 1866, entitled "A joint resolution relative to the courts and post office of New York city," to select a proper site for a building for a post office and for the accommodation of the United States courts in the city of New York; which, on motion of Mr. RAMSEY, was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has received, and been requested to present to the Senate, the memorial of Major General Hooker and a number of officers of the United States Army, praying Congress that when officers of the Army who have honestly and faithfully served their country are placed on the retired list under existing laws, they may, in addition to the mere pittance now granted to them, be allowed to retain their service or longevity rations, which is one ration per day for every five years of service. If there be no objection, this memorial will be received and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. LANE. I am requested by the Soldiers' and Sailors' Union, of Washington city, to present their memorial praying for an investigation into the affairs of the Public Printing office. I know nothing of the facts in the case except as stated in the memorial. These gentlemen are gentlemen of the highest character for intelligence, integrity, and patriotism, and I hope that their memorial will receive proper consideration. I ask its reference to the Committee on Printing.

It was so referred.

Mr. CHANDLER. I present the memorial of the Board of Trade of the city of Detroit, Michigan, protesting against the further granting of American registers to foreign-built ships or vessels of any kind, stating in conclusion:

"Your committee deem it expedient for this board to send a remonstrance to Congress against granting any further concessions to the owners of foreign-built ships or vessels of any kind or description, and a recommendation that all articles of American manufacture required for the building and equipping of steam or sailing ships shall be free from excise or internal revenue taxes."

I move the reference of this memorial to the Committee on Finance.

It was so referred.

Mr. CHANDLER presented the memorial of citizens of Louisiana, praying for aid to rebuild and repair the broken and dilapidated levees on the banks of the Mississippi and other rivers in that State; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. MORGAN presented two memorials of consumers of steel, remonstrating against an increase of the duty on imported steel as proposed by House bill No. 718, to provide increased revenue from imports, and for other purposes; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. HENDERSON presented additional papers in relation to the petition of William N. Smith, praying for damages for the destruction of property by Federal troops in the town of Glasgow, Missouri; which were referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. SHERMAN presented a petition of citizens of Ohio, praying for the passage of House bill No. 718, to provide increased revenue from imports, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. PATTERSON presented a paper to accompany Senate bill No. 454, for the relief of the widow of Jacob Harmon; also a paper to accompany Senate bill No. 476, for the relief of William A. Hinshaw and Jacob M. Hinshaw, minor children of Jacob M. Hinshaw, deceased; and also a paper to accompany Senate bill No. 455, for the relief of the widow of Henry Fry; which were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. HOWE presented two petitions of citizens of Wisconsin, praying for the passage of House bill No. 718, to provide increased revenue from imports, and for other purposes; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I present a petition of citizens of Swanton, Vermont, praying that Congress will refrain from the passage of any act authorizing the curtailment of the national currency or having in view the return within a limited time to specie payments, and setting forth the reasons therefor. It is proper that I should say that I entirely disagree on that subject with the sentiments of this portion of my constituents. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SUMNER. I present the petition of William Wells Brown and others, colored citizens of Massachusetts, in which they respectfully remonstrate against the admission of Nebraska as a State, with a constitution which disfranchises citizens on account of color, and they proceed to assign reasons therefor. As the question is now before the Senate, and there is no opportunity of this petition having the consideration of a committee, I think I shall not err if I call the attention of the Senate especially to the reasons which they assign:

"First. Denial of political rights for the accident of color is founded on the assumption of the power by a class or classes to disfranchise a class or classes of citizens numerically inferior, and this involves the disfranchisement of all inferior classes by their numerical superiors—a doctrine which is inconsistent with the fundamental ideas of our Government.

"Second. Because the experience of the last six years has taught the lesson that political power can safely be entrusted only to loyal citizens, and that it must be equally entrusted to all loyal citizens; and this same experience has proved that the colored citizens of the country have shown more uniform loyalty than any other class of people.

"Third. Because it is unjust that loyal citizens should bear the burdens of taxation without representation.

"Fourth. Because the results of the late elections show that the people of the loyal States have reached the conclusion that political power in the rebel States shall be entrusted only to loyal citizens, and because speedy and permanent peaceful reconstruction of those States can be effected only by enfranchising the loyal citizens without distinction of color.

"Fifth. Because the admission of any State with a constitution disfranchising colored citizens will prove the entering wedge to the admission of rebel States with the same proscriptive provision.

"Sixth. Your memorialists appeal to the record of their own race in this Commonwealth as proof that they may safely be entrusted with the elective franchise. For generations they have exercised all the rights of citizenship in this State, and they confidently claim that no portion of this people, as a class, have better conducted themselves as law-abiding subjects and as liberty-loving citizens; and until the contrary is proved by trial, they claim that colored citizens of other communities will prove equally good citizens if endowed with the elective franchise. In a democratic Republic all good citizens are entitled to vote."

They then conclude as follows:

"For the above reasons and many others which might be added, they earnestly pray that Congress, in the organization of all new States, will see to it that all power is derived from the consent of the governed."

I desire especially to call attention to one of the reasons assigned in this petition why Nebraska should not be admitted as a State with a constitution which disfranchises citizens on account of color. It is as follows:

"Because the admission of any State with a constitution disfranchising colored citizens will prove the entering wedge to the admission of rebel States with the same proscriptive provision."

I entreat the Senate to consider that principle. I solemnly ask the Senate to weigh it and to ponder it before they act finally on the question before them. As this question, however, is now before the Senate, I shall not move the reference of this petition to any committee, but ask that it lie upon the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That order will be entered, no objection being made.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. SHERMAN, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred a memorial of the Winona and St. Peters Railroad Company, of Minnesota, praying that certain additional duties on railroad iron imported in 1863 be refunded, submitted a report accompanied by a bill (S. No. 494) for the relief of the Winona and St. Peters Railroad Company. The bill was read and passed to a second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

RETRENCHMENT COMMITTEE EXPENSES.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am instructed by the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred a joint resolution (S. R. No. 151) appropriating money to defray the expenses of the joint select committee on retrenchment, to report it back and recommend its passage, and I ask for its present consideration.

By unanimous consent, the joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to appropriate $15,000, or so much of that sum as may be necessary, to defray the expenses of the joint select committee on retrenchment. The money is to be drawn from the Treasury as required, upon the order of the Secretary of the Senate; and money allowed by the committee to witnesses attending before it or to persons employed in its service and paid by the Secretary of the Senate in pursuance of its orders, is to be credited and allowed by the accounting officers of the Treasury.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. HOWARD asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 495) authorizing the payment of the rewards offered by the President of the United States and the officers of the War Department in April and May, 1865, for the capture of Jefferson Davis; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. RAMSEY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 496) to establish certain post roads in New Mexico; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

VIOLATION OF CIVIL RIGHTS BILL.

Mr. WILLIAMS submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the President be requested to inform the Senate if any violation of the act entitled "An act to protect all persons in the United States in their civil rights and furnish the means of their vindication" have come to his knowledge, and if so what steps if any have been taken by him to enforce the law and punish the offenders.

PENSION AGENTS.

Mr. CRAGIN. I move to take up Senate bill No. 69, which was under consideration during the morning hour yesterday.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate resumed the consideration of the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. No. 69) to provide for the payment of pensions, the pending question being upon the first amendment reported by the Committee on the Judiciary to the House amendment, which was in line eleven of the House amendment to strike out the word "January" and insert "October."

Mr. SUMNER. Before the vote is taken, if I can have the attention of the Senator who has this bill in charge, I would ask him whether it would not be well to extend the same principle to other officers. The bill confines it to pension agents; but it seems to me there are many other offices which are filled by the Departments that, under the circumstances of the hour, it would be well for the Senate to place, to a certain extent, under the protection of law. I have not applied my attention particularly to this bill to see whether it can be amended in that respect; but I think that there are appointments which are made—for instance, in connection with the customs and in connection with marine hospitals—which it would be well to bring in some way under the protection of the Senate. Would it not be well, I would ask the Senator from New Hampshire, to extend the application of the bill to other officers?

Mr. CRAGIN. The Senator from Massachusetts is mistaken in supposing that I have special charge of this bill. The pending amendments to it were reported by the Committee on the Judiciary, the chairman of which committee is now out of his seat; but I think the Senator from Indiana [Mr. LANE] has more information on this subject than I have. I have a special reason why I desire that this bill should pass at an early day. I suppose that the general bill introduced by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] would cover the point suggested by my friend from Massachusetts.

Mr. LANE. The history of this matter, as I understand, is this: at the last session of Congress the Senate passed a bill taking the appointment of pension agents from the Interior Department and placing it with the President, subject to the confirmation of the Senate. That bill failed to be acted upon by the House of Representatives. At the beginning of the present session it was passed by the House of Representatives with the amendment to which the attention of the Senate is now called. They propose in that amendment to limit the number of pension agents so as not to exceed three in any one State, and also to provide that the term of office of those appointed after the 1st of January, 1866, shall expire within thirty days after the passage of this act, and that it shall be the duty of the President at once to nominate others to fill their places. When the bill came back to the Senate with this amendment it was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and they have reported an amendment to the House amendment, extending further back the time at which the pension agents' offices shall expire, unless reappointed and confirmed by the Senate, so as to apply to all appointed since October 1, 1865. That is the present condition of the bill.

At the last session of the Senate, upon a letter of the Secretary of the Interior, Mr. Harlan, this subject was referred to the Pension Committee. They then reported a bill providing simply that hereafter the appointment of pension agents should be by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. Prior to that time the appointment was exclusively with the Secretary of the Interior, and there was no limit as to the number which he might appoint. It was thought necessary that the nominations to offices which had grown so important should pass under the supervision of the Senate. At present there are forty-nine pension agents, and not exceeding three in any one State. It is the opinion of the Department that no additional officers are necessary. This bill restricts the appointment so as not to exceed three in any one State.

The history of the appointment of pension agents is simply this: on the passage of the act granting pensions to revolutionary soldiers those persons were paid and disbursed by the War Department, and they appointed generally bank officers without compensation, supposing that the use of the funds in the interim would pay them for their trouble in the disbursements; but when pensions were increased growing out of the Mexican war and the Interior Department was established, the payment of pensions was given to the Interior Department and pension agents were appointed whose salary was limited by the regulations of that Department. In 1862 a law was passed making the maximum payment $2,000. Afterward another law was passed making the maximum $4,000, but still leaving the appointment unrestricted in the hands of the Secretary of the Interior. We thought at the last session, and I think now, that officers so important should pass the supervision of the Senate, and the Senate with great unanimity passed the bill, but it failed, as I before remarked, to be acted upon by the House of Representatives. They send it here now, with certain amendments, and those amendments have been submitted to the Judiciary Committee, and they report a bill which I think perfectly proper in all its terms.

The addition made by their amendments, the only important addition, is, that the terms of officers appointed after a certain date shall expire within thirty days from the passage of this law; and as I desire to deceive no man, and I will do nothing by indirection which I will not do directly, I will state my object at least in voting for these amendments. Honest, faithful, and competent men, simply because they have stood by the policy of Congress and refused to bow to executive dictation, have been removed. We propose now that the offices of the recently appointed officers put in their places shall expire within thirty days from the passage of this bill; and Congress surely has a perfect right to limit the number of officers, to fix the duration of their office, and the compensation for that office; and I propose to do just that by this amendment, no more and no less, so that the men who have received their reward from the President shall not have the sanction of the Congress of the United States, at least for any such arrangement or agreement. I doubt not in many instances worthy men have been appointed to these vacancies; but they have displaced men equally honest, equally competent, and equally worthy, and for no other cause than simply the fact that they have been Republicans and Union men, and have opposed the policy of the President. I propose by this amendment to vacate those offices after thirty days, and that the President shall nominate to the Senate others in their place, and that the Senate shall pass upon them. This, is as I understand, the object and scope of the bill and the amendments.

Mr. JOHNSON. I am not sure that my friend from Indiana will accomplish his purpose if the bill shall pass in the shape in which it is now upon our table. Why the President has dismissed those persons who formerly held these situations and appointed others is a matter of which I know nothing. I take it for granted he has appointed competent men, for I have not heard that there was any charge of incompetency for the duties of the office on the part of anybody. But the House amendment, if I heard it correctly read at the desk, provides that the persons who are in office are to remain in office until their successors are appointed.

Mr. LANE. The Senator will pardon me one moment. That is the very thing that the Judiciary Committee have proposed to strike out. That is the amendment that I favor.

Mr. JOHNSON. Then the object will not be accomplished, because the President can nominate the same men.

Mr. LANE. But we can pass upon them. Mr. JOHNSON. We can pass upon them, and he will continue to nominate. It is not the question what the President should do. I have a very decided opinion upon that question myself; but that is not before us now. We are not now considering what the President should do in the case of an appointment of his during the recess, which, upon its being presented to the Senate by a nomination, has been rejected by the Senate, and he has reappointed the same man after the Senate has adjourned. As the law stood at the time these appointments were made, and as it stands now, the President had a right to appoint these officers, or the Secretary of the Interior had, which is the same thing, for he acts under the advice of the President, without consulting the Senate at all. This is not, therefore, such a case as my friend from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] would seem to suppose from a side remark he dropped to me; but it is a very different case. The only question here is whether the men who are in office now shall go out of office at the expiration of a certain number of days after the passage of this bill. As I said before, I do not see that that object will be accomplished, because the President can appoint them again. We can reject them, of course, but he can go on appointing, and we go on rejecting, and the office in the mean time will not be filled. My own impression is, and it was under that impression that I voted for the original bill when it passed the Senate, that these appointments should be made with the consent of the Senate. They are now much more important than they ever were before. The officers are intrusted with a large amount of money, and their competency, therefore, is a question upon which I think the Senate should have the authority to pass.

Mr. SHERMAN. If I understand the purpose of the bill, it is simply to carry out the idea expressed by the Senator from Maryland. As these pension agents have now become very important, as they disburse something like twenty-five million instead of one or two million a year, it is proper that their nomination should be communicated to the Senate and passed upon by the Senate. They are no longer "inferior officers" in the sense of the Constitution, but they are important officers, their disbursements being equal to the entire expenses of the Government thirty years ago. The main object of the bill, therefore, is clearly right—to require the nominations of these officers to be sent here. But the object of the Senator from Indiana is to have the existing officers legislated out of office at the expiration of thirty days, so that their names or those of their successors may be sent to the Senate for confirmation. I think that is perfectly proper.

While the Senator from Maryland was speaking, I made a remark to him to which he alluded. It was, that if the President would still insist upon appointing men whom the Senate had rejected, I would make the contest with him on that point. Sir, I say that if the President of the United States seeks to overthrow the authority of the Senate, clearly conferred upon it by the Constitution of the United States, I would make the point upon him. I introduced in the early part of this session a bill, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and which I hope will be acted on, to make it a criminal offense to seek thus to violate the Constitution of the United States and to override the judgment of the Senate. The Senate have the same constitutional power to pass upon nominations that the President has to make them. If the President can ignore and repudiate the deliberate judgment of the Senate, it is better to change the Constitution at once and give him the sole appointing power. If he seeks a contest or a point of that kind I am perfectly willing to accept it.

When the President makes a nomination to the Senate he has exhausted his power; and when the Senate reject that nomination there is an end to that appointment; and he cannot, after the close of the session, renominate that person to the same office without violating the spirit of the Constitution and in a measure violating his oath of office. And, in considering a question of this kind in the case of a conflict between the Senate of the United States and the President of the United States, I will not regard the opinion of the Attorney General or any other officer. We are to pass upon it ourselves, as we have the constitutional right to do. That is all I desire to say.

Mr. JOHNSON. I suppose nothing that I said could have induced the honorable member from Ohio to think that I concurred in the propriety of reappointing a person whom the Senate had rejected. I said that I had a very decided opinion upon that question, and that is, that it is an abuse of the power of the President. Whether he has the power is a matter about which, until lately, there has been no doubt, because not only one Attorney General, but all the Attorneys General to whom the questions have been submitted, and all the Presidents since the days of Washington, have concurred in the doctrine that the President is at liberty to reappoint one who has been rejected by the Senate. My own opinion is, irrespective of that construction of the Constitution, that the Constitution warrants no such thing; and I am perfectly willing to go as far as the Senator from Ohio, if it can be accomplished by legislation, to legislate upon that subject so as to prevent what, in my judgment, is an abuse of the power if the power exists. But that is not the question here, for the reason I stated just now. The President is under no obligation to consult the Senate on these appointments.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is the Senate ready for the question on the proposed amendment to the amendment?

Mr. HOWE. I was going to suggest, in accordance with the opinions of several Senators with whom I have conferred, that July would be a better time to introduce there than October; but I suppose the action of the Senate is confined now to either accepting or rejecting that specific word, is it not? Would it be in order to move now to amend that proposition?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks not. It is an amendment to an amendment.

Mr. HOWE. I supposed so. I think we had better not agree to that amendment, and I will then move to amend by inserting "July" instead of "January."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The decision just announced was hasty, inadvertent. The Chair is of opinion that under the rule the amendment of the House becomes a part of the text of the bill, and being a part of the text of the bill an amendment to it stands upon the same ground as an amendment to an ordinary bill, which is susceptible of an amendment to it as an amendment; so that the motion of the Senator from Wisconsin, if he chooses to make it, will be in order.

Mr. HOWE. Very well, sir. I move then to amend the amendment by inserting "July" instead of "October."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Then the question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin to the amendment.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I should like to have it stated what is the effect of that amendment to the amendment, or have the amendment read as it will stand if amended.

The SECRETARY. The amendment, if amended as proposed, will read as follows:

And provided further, That the term of office of all pension agents appointed since the 1st day of July, A. D. 1865, shall expire at the end of thirty days from the passage of this act.

Mr. SUMNER. Is the pending question on adopting the whole amendment as it comes from the House?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is only on the question of striking out the word "October" and inserting "July" at the present time.

Mr. SUMNER. Very well.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I am indifferent what day shall be fixed; but now that the purpose of this amendment has been so explicitly stated by my colleague, I suppose every Senator understands exactly what he is voting upon. It is the naked proposition of legislating men out of offices—offices to which they have been appointed according to law. Where party friends were to be provided for there have been instances where officers have been legislated out of existence, and then the office legislated into existence again with a view to provide for dependent partisans; but I think this is about the first time the Congress of the United States has undertaken, in direct terms, to legislate a class of men out of office that other men of more satisfactory views might be appointed to their offices. In other words, it is simply a question of "bread and butter." The Administration has been charged with giving some little attention to that question. It cannot now be disguised, after the very explicit statement of my colleague, that Congress proposes to give attention to the question of "bread and butter."

I am not going into any vindication of the President on the question of removals and appointments. If he intended to maintain the force of his Administration in the State which I represent, along with my able colleague, by placing the offices in the hands of his friends, he has made but a very limited effort in that direction. Compared with the entire number of office-holders in the State, those who have been appointed by him to maintain his policy are very few indeed, so far at least as I know. Of the pension agents in the State of Indiana I know of but one change; so that I do not know of any abuse of power by the President, if the President is to have the appointing power at all, that we are called upon to correct.

I am not sure that the number of agents ought to be limited, as this bill proposes. I understand that the agents are compensated by a commission, and that it makes but a very trifling difference to the Treasury whether there are three or six agents in a State; but it may make a very great difference so far as the convenience of the pensioners is concerned. I can look over the State that I represent and can see, in my judgment, that there ought to be more than three agencies there. I think my colleague will agree with me in that. The northeastern portion of the State should have an agency at Fort Wayne. There is one there now I know very well. The central portion of the State should have an agency at the capital. The southern portion of the State one at New Albany. The southwestern portion of the State one at Evansville. The northern portion of the State one at Laporte or some other convenient point. These are matters of convenience to the pensioners. But my colleague has the main responsibility of this question, he being the chairman of the Committee on Pensions. I would not, with my judgment of what will tend to the convenience of the pensioners themselves, vote to restrict the number of agencies in the State of Indiana to three. I think it will prove a matter of great inconvenience to the pensioners, and necessarily throw them into the hands of private agents to whom they will have to pay money to transact their business. If the public agencies are at remote points they must transact their business through private agents or else be at the expense of traveling a distance. That is not well; it is not necessary. It is not necessary when there is no economy to the Treasury by decreasing the number of these agencies. It is not necessary to increase the inconvenience to the pensioners when there is no saving to the Treasury. The general proposition now, because the amount of money paid out by these agents has increased to so great an extent, of subjecting them to the confirmation of the Senate I agreed to at the last session when my colleague brought the question up. I have no objection to that. I think it is proper enough.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour having expired, it becomes the duty of the Chair to call up the unfinished business of yesterday, which is the bill for the admission of the State of Nebraska into the Union.

Mr. LANE. I move to postpone the unfinished business for the purpose of getting a vote on this matter. I think it can be disposed of in a few moments.

Mr. WADE. I believe this subject is going to lead to a long debate, and I can hardly consent to a postponement of the bill for the admission of Nebraska which I have been endeavoring now for nearly six weeks to urge to a conclusion. I do not like to interpose an objection to the bill of the Senator from Indiana, but really it seems to me I ought not to permit the bill which was under consideration yesterday to be postponed. I am satisfied this subject will lead to a debate. I hope we shall proceed with the unfinished business of yesterday.

Mr. LANE. If this subject leads to debate I shall not object to its postponement.

Mr. WADE. If it is not going to lead to debate, I am very willing to let the special order lie over informally.

Mr. JOHNSON. I do not propose to debate it, but I suggest to the Senator from Indiana that he had better let the bill lie on the table for the present. It seems to me to be very defective. It would involve the most of the soldiers to whom pensions are due at times to very great inconvenience. The present pension agents, if we pass this bill, go out at a certain time, must go out, no matter what the Senate shall do.

Mr. LANE. If Senators wish to look at it further I shall not object. I withdraw my motion.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a letter from the Secretary of War, communicating, in compliance with the requirements of the acts of April 21, 1808, and March 8, 1809, statements by the chief of ordnance showing the orders given and purchases made by the ordnance office during the calendar year ending December 31, 1866; which, with the accompanying documents, was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, communicating, in compliance with the requirements of the acts of April 21, 1808, and July 17, 1862, the Quartermaster General's statement of the contracts made by his department from July 1 to December 31, 1866; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (S. No. 459) suspending the payment of moneys from the Treasury as compensation to persons claiming the service or labor of colored volunteers or drafted men; and for other purposes; and the enrolled joint resolution (S. R. No. 154) to provide for the exhibition of the cereal productions of the United States at the Paris Exposition in April next; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore of the Senate.

SUFFRAGE IN THE DISTRICT—VETO.

The message also announced that the House of Representatives, having reconsidered its action on the bill (S. No. 1) to regulate the elective franchise in the District of Columbia, agreeably to the Constitution of the United States, had passed the bill by a vote of two thirds of the members of that body, the objections of the President to the contrary notwithstanding.

Mr. MORRILL. I desire to ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to introduce the following resolution, which is necessary to perfect the legislation of yesterday:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be directed to present to the Secretary of State the bill entitled "An act to regulate the elective franchise in the District of Columbia," together with the certificates of the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House of Representatives, showing that the said act was passed by a vote of two thirds of both Houses of Congress after the same had been returned to the Senate by the President with his objections, and after the reconsideration of said act by both Houses of Congress, in accordance with the Constitution.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

ADMISSION OF NEBRASKA.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 456) for the admission of the State of Nebraska into the Union.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WILSON] to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. BROWN.]

Mr. GRIMES. I ask for the reading of the amendment to the amendment.

The Secretary read the amendment to the amendment, which was to strike out all after the word "color," in line five of the amendment of Mr. BROWN, and in lieu thereof to insert:

Excepting Indians not taxed; and upon the further fundamental condition that the Legislature of said State, by a solemn public act, shall declare the assent of said State to the said fundamental condition, and shall transmit to the President of the United States an authentic copy of said act; upon receipt whereof the President, by proclamation, shall forthwith announce the fact, whereupon said fundamental condition shall be held as a part of the organic law of the State; and thereupon, and without any further proceeding on the part of Congress, the admission of said State into the Union shall be considered as complete. Said State Legislature shall be convened by the territorial Governor within thirty days after the passage of this act, to act upon the condition submitted herein.

Mr. WADE. This is the same amendment that was up when the Senate adjourned yesterday. I hope it will be rejected.

Mr. SUMNER. In the absence of my colleague I moved that amendment. I believe I called last evening for the yeas and nays. I am mistaken; the Senator from Ohio called for the yeas and nays. I suggest to him to withdraw the call.

Mr. WADE. I have no desire to have them. I called for them because I wanted to ascertain whether there was a quorum present, and I found there was not.

Mr. SUMNER. By unanimous consent the call can be withdrawn.

Mr. WADE. If I can have permission to withdraw the call I will do so.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio asks leave to withdraw the call for the yeas and nays. It can only be withdrawn by the unanimous consent of the Senate. Is there any objection? No objection being made, the call is withdrawn. The question is on the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. SUMNER. I would say at this stage that I should prefer to take a vote on that amendment, if possible, without bringing it in conflict with any other proposition. I think it would be better, therefore, that we should vote, if the Senate is so disposed, on each of the pending propositions without antagonizing one with the other; therefore I shall be glad to have this amendment for the present out of the way so that we can proceed at once to the consideration of the amendment of the Senator from Missouri, who is not now in his seat.

Mr. WADE. Let it be rejected, then.

Mr. SUMNER. Very well; I have no objection.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is on the amendment of the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. BROWN.]

Mr. SUMNER. I ask to have it reported.

The Secretary read the amendment, which was to insert at the end of the second section of the bill the following proviso:

Provided, That this act shall not take effect except upon the fundamental condition that within the State of Nebraska there shall be no denial of the elective franchise, or of any other rights, to any person, by reason of race or color, and upon the further condition that this fundamental condition shall be submitted to the voters of the Territory of Nebraska at an election to be held on the first Tuesday of next. And at such election said voters shall declare their assent to or dissent from the condition aforesaid in such form as shall be prescribed by the Governor of said Territory. And all votes given at such election shall be returned to such Governor within days from the day of the election, who shall forthwith canvass the same. And if a majority of such votes shall be for this condition, the Governor shall certify that fact to the President of the United States, who shall by proclamation announce the fact; whereupon, without further proceedings on the part of Congress, this act shall take effect.

Mr. WADE. I hope the friends of the bill will not vote for this amendment, because it is equivalent to rejecting the constitution. It will have to go back before the people, and will be equivalent to making a new constitution. Those who are in favor of the bill I presume will vote against this amendment.

Mr. GRIMES called for the yeas and nays on the amendment, and they were ordered.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I should like to know how this amendment stands with reference to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS.]

Mr. WADE. That has not been offered.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Is it not on the table?

Mr. WADE. No; it has not been offered. It was only presented informally. He proposes to offer it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If this amendment of the Senator from Missouri shall not be agreed to, then I propose to offer the amendment which has been printed, and which I submitted on the 20th of December; but I do not wish to offer it as a substitute for the pending amendment, because either of them intrinsically would produce practical justice. I prefer my own to that of the Senator from Missouri, because I believe it puts the authority of Congress over this subject on its true ground.

Mr. SUMNER. Mr. President, I shall vote for each of the propositions that have been offered to the Senate by the Senator from Missouri, my colleague, and the Senator from Vermont. But, sir, the course of the Senate on this bill fills me with anxiety. Since the unhappy perversity of the President nothing has occurred which seems to me of such evil omen. It passes my comprehension how we can require Equal Rights in the rebel States when we deliberately sanction the denial of Equal Rights in a new State, which is completely within our jurisdiction and about to be fashioned by our hands. Others may commit this inconsistency; but I will not. Others may make the sacrifice; but I cannot. "No more States with the word white." Such is the rule I have adopted, and to this I shall adhere. Let Congress adopt this rule and the future of the Republic will be secured forever.

It seems as if Providence presented this occasion in order to give you an easy opportunity of asserting a principle which is of infinite value to the whole country. Only a few persons are directly interested; but the decision of Congress now will determine a governing rule for millions. Nebraska is a loyal community, small in numbers, formed out of ourselves, bone of our bone and flesh of our flesh. In an evil hour it adopted a constitution which is bad in itself and worse still as an example. But neither the tie of blood or the fellowship of party should be permitted to save it from judgment. At this moment Congress cannot afford to sanction this wrong. Congress must elevate itself if it would elevate the country. It must be itself the example of justice, if it would make justice the universal rule. It must be itself the model which it recommends to others. It must begin "reconstruction" here at home.

It is with pain that I differ from valued friends around me, and see a line of duty which they do not see. Such is my deference to them that, if the question were less clear or less important, I should abandon my own conclusions and accept theirs. But when the question is so plain and duty so imperative I have no alternative.

Let me add that, in taking the course I do, I have nothing but friendly feelings for the Territory of Nebraska, or for the men whom she has sent to represent her in the Senate. I wish to see Nebraska populous and flourishing, and the home of Human Rights secured by irrevocable law. And as for her Senators, I know them now so well that I shall have peculiar pleasure in welcoming them on this floor. But there are voices from Nebraska which I wish you to hear. I have in my hand letters, only recently received, from which, with your permission, I will read. Here is one:

NEBRASKA, December 4, 1866.

SIR: You will pardon me for the liberty I take in addressing you when I state that I do it in the interest of republicanism and fair dealing. The admission of Nebraska as a State will doubtless come before Congress during the session just commenced, and the action of the same will doubtless determine the question whether we are to become a State under a constitution made by a Copperhead Legislature, the provisions of which would come fully up to the prospective aristocratic idea of any southern rebel State on the continent.

When I consider that Republican counties, Nebraska for instance, which gave 350 Republican majority at the October election, gave 143 majority against the constitution; and, further, when it is remembered that many Republicans, who are in favor of its becoming a State, but were unwilling to endorse this proscription of rebel constitution, stayed at home, thereby allowing it to be adopted by default on their part; if, as is claimed, that it is desired by the people to become a State, give us an enabling act; let us make a constitution that is republican in form, and use the great desire to become a State as a lever to adopt a constitution founded upon just principles. If you admit Nebraska with her present constitution, what can you consistently demand of the rebel States, when it is a noted fact that Nebraska is cursed with a large number of the most damnable rebels and bushmen that ever cursed America? Sir, should your honorable body admit Nebraska with her present constitution, we, as a Republican party, in our efforts to amend the constitution, are to be met with your acts as a standard of republican doctrine, which will set us back ten years in elevating the republican standard to its logical and rightful point. If you reject this constitution, I will venture to say that within twelve months Nebraska will knock for admission into the Union with the first republican constitution ever offered to the Congress of the United States by a State asking admission.

HON. CHARLES SUMNER.

Mr. WADE. Who is that from?

Mr. SUMNER. A good Republican of Nebraska.

Mr. WADE. What office does he hold in the Territory?

Mr. SUMNER. None that I am aware of. Sir, these are noble words, declaring the noble ambition that Nebraska should take the lead in the file of republican States. Here is another letter:

December 20, 1866.

HON. CHARLES SUMNER: I desire to express to you and those Senators who think, talk, and act like yourself on the admission of Nebraska, with her present constitution stained with cutaneous distinctions, my warm and profound regard and admiration; and to assure you, as a citizen of Nebraska, that I most sincerely hope that Territory will be kept in her present condition until she exhibits a clean breast or chart for your approval.

Principle is ever paramount to any temporizing policy; therefore, for the honor of a just and patriotic Senate, and the present and future welfare of Nebraska, I earnestly desire that she may be taught to acknowledge equality before the law. Beside, it seems to resemble arrogant presumption, not to say insult, for her people to "knock for entrance" on any other principle, especially in view of the impressive lesson of the age and the stern logic of events.

I have had no conversation with her Senators-elect on this subject, both of whom I know personally, and whom I can indorse as radical; but I must confess that if Gabriel were asking for admission with such a stigma I would say, "Depart from me; I know you not."

Now, honorable sir, since nothing good, even on the low plane of expediency, in view of the present radical majorities in Congress, can result from the admission of Nebraska at present; and since it would save the people of that Territory from future political discussions and dissensions, and since it would prevent the Senate from the sanction of injustice and the establishment of a reprehensible precedent, I most sincerely trust that your honorable body will sanction and sustain the cause of justice and humanity by keeping Nebraska "out in the cold" until she can pronounce the American shibboleth, "Liberty and equality."

Very respectfully.

Mr. HOWARD. I beg to inquire of the honorable Senator from Massachusetts whether he is acquainted with the writer of that letter, either personally or by reputation?

Mr. SUMNER. Yes, by reputation; not personally.

Mr. WADE. Tell us who he is.

Mr. SUMNER. I think I ought not.

Mr. WADE. Then we ought to pay no attention to it.

Mr. SUMNER. Very well; the Senator will do as he pleases. He is a gentleman in the public service.

In looking at this question we are met at the threshold by the fact that in a vote of nearly seven thousand, there were little over three thousand, with a majority of only one hundred in favor of the constitution which you are now asked to accept. It is at the call of little more than three thousand voters that you are to recognize a State government which begins its independent life by defiance to the fundamental truths of the Declaration of Independence. For myself, I am at a loss to understand the grounds on which this can be done, unless in your anxiety to gratify the desires of a few persons and to welcome the excellent gentlemen from Nebraska, you are willing to set aside great principles of duty at a critical moment of national history. It is pleasant to be "amiable," but you have no right to be amiable at the expense of Human Rights. It is pleasant to be "lenient," as the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. WADE,] who is pressing this bill, expresses it; but take care that in lenity to this Territory you are not unjust. There can be no such thing as "lenity" where Human Rights are in question. The language is entirely inapplicable.

The Senator from Ohio, over the way, [Mr. SHERMAN,] does not leave any room for discretion. He says we are bound by the enabling act passed some time ago, authorizing proceedings to form a State government. Very well; assume that the Senator is right, and that the enabling act will create an obligation on the part of Congress, all of which I deny. I insist that there has been no compliance with the enabling act, either in form or substance. I repeat there has been a failure both in form and substance.

If we look at the enabling act we shall find that it has not been complied with in form. This can be placed beyond question. By this act, which I now hold in my hands, it is provided that a "Convention" of the people of Nebraska shall be chosen by the people; that the election for such "Convention" shall be held on "the first Monday in June thereafter;" and that "the members of the Convention thus elected shall meet at the capitol of said Territory on the first Monday in July next." Now, in point of fact, such Convention was duly chosen, and it met, according to the provisions of the enabling act. Thus far all was right. But after meeting it voluntarily adjourned or dissolved without framing a Constitution. Afterward the territorial Legislature undertook to do what the Convention had failed to do. The territorial Legislature adopted a Constitution and submitted it to the people; and this is the Constitution now before you. Nothing can be clearer in this statement than this; there has been no compliance with the provisions of the enabling act, so far as they prescribe the proceedings for the formation of a Constitution. The act positively prescribes a Convention at a particular date. Instead of a Convention at the date prescribed we have the Legislature acting at a different date; so that there is plainly a failure in the proceedings for the adoption of the Constitution. The enabling act is in no respect complied with. It is vain, therefore, to refer to it. As well refer to Homer's Iliad or the Book of Job.

But the failure in substance is graver still. By that enabling act it is further provided that the Constitution, when formed, shall be "republican, and not repugnant to the Constitution of the United States and the principles of the Declaration of Independence." Mark especially these latter words, introduced for the first time into an enabling act. Here are essential conditions which must be complied with: the Constitution must be "republican." Now, I insist that a Constitution which denies Equality of Rights cannot be "republican." It may be "republican" according to the imperfect notions of an earlier period, or even according to the standard of Montesquieu, but it cannot be "republican" in a country which began its national life in disregard of received notions and the standards of the past. In fixing for the first time an authoritative definition of this requirement, you cannot forget the new vows to Human Rights uttered by our fathers; you cannot forget that our Republic is an example to mankind. Here is an occasion which must not be lost of acting, not only for the present time and place, but for the distant also.

But there is another consideration, which, if possible, is more decisive. I say nothing now of the requirement that the new Constitution shall be "not repugnant to the Constitution of the United States;" but I call attention to the positive condition that it must be "not repugnant to the principles of the Declaration of Independence." And yet, sir, in the face of this plain requirement, we have a new Constitution which disfranchises persons on account of color, and establishes what is compendiously called "a white man's government." This new Constitution sets at naught the great principles that all men are equal, and that Governments stand on the consent of the governed. Therefore, I say confidently that this new Constitution now before us is not according to the "principles of the Declaration of Independence." Is this doubted? Can it be doubted? You must raze living words, you must kill undying truths, before you can announce any such conformity. As long as those words exist, as long as those truths shine forth in that Declaration, you must condemn this new Constitution. I remember gratefully the electric power with which the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. WADSWORTH], on a former occasion, not many years ago, confronting the representatives of slavery, bravely vindicated these principles as "self-evident truths." "There was a Brutus once who would brook the eternal devil" as soon as any denial of these "self-evident truths." Would that he would speak now as then, and insist on their practical application everywhere within the power of Congress, and thus set up a wall of defense for the down-trodden!

Thus the question stands under the enabling act. This act has not been complied with in any respect, whether of form or substance. In form it has been openly disregarded; in substance it has been insulted. The failure in form may be pardoned; the failure in substance must be fatal, unless in some way corrected by Congress.

Nobody doubts that Congress, in providing for the formation of a State Constitution, may affix conditions. This has been done from the beginning of our history. There is no instance where it has been omitted. Search the enabling acts of all the new States, and you will find these conditions. There they are in your statute-book, constant witnesses to the power of Congress, unquestioned and unquestionable.

Thus, for instance, the enabling act for Nebraska requires three things of the new State as conditions precedent:

First. That slavery shall be forever prohibited.

Secondly. That no person shall be molested in person or property on account of religious worship.

Thirdly. That the unappropriated public lands shall remain at the sole disposition of the United States, without being subject to local taxation.

Read the enabling act, and you will find these conditions. Does any Senator doubt their validity? Impossible.

But this is not all. In addition to these three conditions are three others, which in order, if not in importance, stand even before these. They are contained in words which I have already quoted, but which have been strangely forgotten in this debate. Here they are:

"That the Constitution when formed shall be republican, and not repugnant to the Constitution of the United States and the principles of the Declaration of Independence."

Consider this clause; you will find it contains three conditions, each of vital force.

First. The Constitution must be "republican." It does not say "in form" merely, but "republican;" of course "republican" in substance and reality.

Secondly. The Constitution must be "not repugnant to the Constitution of the United States." But surely any Constitution which contains a discrimination of rights on account of color must be "repugnant" to the Constitution of the United States, which contains no such discrimination. The text of the national Constitution is blameless; but the text of this new Constitution is not blameless; hence its repugnancy.

Thirdly. The Constitution must be "not repugnant to the principles of the Declaration of Independence." These plain words allow no equivocation. Solemnly you have required this just and noble conformity. But is it not an insult to the understanding when you offer a Constitution which contains a discrimination of rights on account of color?

Now in all these three requirements, so authoritatively made as the conditions of the new Constitution, Nebraska fails—wretchedly fails. It is vain to say that the people there were not warned. They were warned. These requirements were in the very title-deed under which they now claim.

Mr. President, pardon me, I entreat you, if I am tenacious in my position. At this moment there is one great question in our country on which all other questions pivot. It is justice to the colored race. Without this I see small chance of security, tranquillity, or even of peace. The war will still continue. Therefore, as a servant of truth and a lover of my country, I cannot allow this cause to be sacrificed or discredited by my vote. Others will do as they please; but if I stand alone I will hold this bridge.

Mr. COWAN. Mr. President, I am in favor of the amendment, which is, I believe, to submit this question to the people of Nebraska hereafter. I do not know that there is any necessity for such haste in the admission of Nebraska as a State that we should not take this precaution in order to be certain that we are right, especially when we find such a difference of opinion among those who have a clear claim to orthodoxy upon a subject of this kind.

I trust, too, that my brethren will take advantage of the peculiar contingency which the Senator from Massachusetts says Providence now furnishes, and that they will respond to it in the proper spirit. If I caught the drift of his remarks at that particular point, it was this: that for a long period of years Providence, for some reason or other, had not given to us an opportunity to be just to black people; had not given an opportunity to recognize the equality of black people; not given an opportunity to admit black people to coöperate with our own race in the government of sublimary things here, but that contingency has at last happened. If that be so, Mr. President, I must confess that I have had very confused views of Providence heretofore. I supposed that the world was governed by Providence, and I supposed that the word came from the fact that He did provide for the government of the affairs of men. I was perfectly willing that His ways were mysterious, very mysterious indeed. I could not understand why He allowed certain things to prevail in the world which to my mind were wrong and improper. But from the best lights that I could get, and from the closest observation I could make of things, in the end they generally came out right.

Now, if, as the Senator says—and I use his own words, in quoting the Declaration of Independence—"all men are equal," it does seem to me that Providence could have fixed that fact, if He had desired it, with such certainty as to prevent any very great mistake about it. My honorable friend, the Senator from Massachusetts, is six feet three inches in height, and weighs two hundred and twenty pounds. I am six feet three inches in height and weigh one hundred and ninety pounds, if you please. That is not equality. My honorable friend from Maine here is five feet nine inches—

Mr. FESSENDEN. And a half. [Laughter.]

Mr. COWAN. I beg the honorable Senator's pardon. I would not diminish his stature an inch or half an inch, nor take a hair from his head; and he weighs one hundred and forty pounds if you please. Is that equality? The honorable Senator from Massachusetts is largely learned; he has traversed the whole field of human learning; there is nothing, I think, that he does not know that is worth knowing—and this is no empty compliment that I desire to pay him now—and he is so much wiser than I am that at the last elections he divined exactly how they would result and I did not. [Laughter.] He rode triumphantly upon the popular wave, and I was overwhelmed and came out with eyes and nose suffused and hardly able to gasp.

Mr. SUMNER. You ought to have followed my counsel.

Mr. COWAN. Why should I not? What was Providence doing in that? If Providence had made me equal to the honorable Senator I should not have needed his counsel, and I should have ridden, too, on the topmost wave. [Laughter.] If Providence rules the world, if Providence is acting in all these things, I should like to ask my honorable friend what Providence has been doing about this negro business for the last ten thousand years. As far as we can go back they have been terribly neglected; and even to-day in Africa, where they live, what is their condition? I suppose that Dr. Livingstone is authority, an orthodox gentleman, a clergyman, a kind of divine man who goes over there moved by the most benevolent purposes, and he gives the most terrible account of those people, who are free, one would think, there if anywhere, to act according to the dictates of Providence and to carry out the will of Providence, if He had any especial will in this matter.

There was another gentleman who went there through terrible tribulation and suffering, a certain Mr. Baker, who had a wife lovely beyond her sex; I think enduring beyond any of the sex of whom I have ever read. She accompanied Mr. Baker, and they gave us accounts of these people in Africa.

If the honorable Senator now insists upon the equality of men, the actual equality of men—I do not mean their equality as to personal rights; I agree to that; they all have a personal right to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness; I think that is all true; but if this equality is to extend everywhere, if they have a right to govern, if they have a right to be equal socially, I should like to know if Providence rules the world and if Providence is over all, as He unquestionably is, how the honorable Senator explains the condition of Africa to-day. How can that be done? His ancestors and my ancestors, thousands of years ago perhaps, before development had progressed as it has to end in such specimens as we are of the stock—from all we can learn I am apprehensive perhaps that they were not in a much better condition than the negroes of Africa. We cannot tell exactly that they were. Their history is lost in the mists of remote antiquity; but if they did work themselves on, if they did work themselves up and produced such a result as we see in the United States of America, as we see in France, as we see in England, as we see as the result of the race everywhere, I should like the honorable Senator to explain why it was that the race in Africa during these thousands of years did not make the same progress. Can the honorable Senator tell why they never invented an alphabet? Can he tell why they never built a city, why they never had a nationality, why they never had a history, why they never had traditions, why they never had a literature, why they never had anything of that kind which characterizes the man of progress, the civilized man? All that has been going on under the eye of Providence; but Providence now, at the prompting of Massachusetts philanthropy, I suppose, has waked up to the necessity of, at a single bound, lifting this barbarous people upon the same elevation with the advanced races in the struggle of civilization.

God knows I wish as heartily as anybody else that could be done. But, Mr. President, when that is done, and when it is done actually, really, in good faith, and according to the laws of Providence, it will be done by that slow development which has brought this race, our race, the vanguard of civilization, to its present position; and that will be through struggle and toil and suffering, and slavery, if you please. There are a great many collar marks about our civilization of to-day. Mr. President, you are a lawyer, and you know that the language of the law even to-day is not divested of the symbols of the slavery of our race at a former period. We still retain the word "servant" and the word "villain." We still retain a knowledge at least of the tenures by which the men of our race held their lands and their rights, too, in former times.

Now, Mr. President, I am opposed to the admission of Nebraska as a State because she is not a State. That is the reason of it. Not because she has chosen for herself to exclude people of a different race from being among her governing classes; I am opposed to her admission because she is not a State. What is a State, Mr. President? A State consists of a number of distinct, independent people inhabiting over a certain Territory which they themselves own, which they have a right to own, and over which they have a right to make laws.

The people of Nebraska, if I understand it, do not form such a people. They do not own the State of Nebraska, to start with. The State of Nebraska, the large mass of it, is yet owned by the people of the United States. There are fewer people in the State of Nebraska to-day than there are in the county in which I inhabit in Pennsylvania. All the people of the United States have a right to go to Nebraska and settle there if they choose. Certainly they have a right to go there from all parts of the States of the United States, and if they go there have they not a right to form the institutions of Nebraska, to determine upon their character, to fix and mold them according to such a result as would be produced by all the people of the several States going into a new Territory? I think it was Mr. Calhoun who once asked what right has the first handful of squatters who go into a Territory to fix its institutions? No right, especially when it is not necessary for their protection, for their security; but it may be exceedingly detrimental to the old States.

Now, I might ask upon what principle of fairness is Nebraska here with fewer people than inhabit Westmoreland county, Pennsylvania? Upon what principle are they to be constituted a State? Are they not in the enjoyment now of all that which we call American liberty? Have they not courts and juries and the means of enforcing just laws? Have they not just laws themselves? Are they not safe and secure? Why do they want to be a State? Not that they are to gain anything in the way of securing their rights, but that they are to become a governing portion of the people of this Union. The same plea precisely is set up for the few people in Nebraska which my honorable friend from Massachusetts sets up with regard to the negro. There are two or three dozen negroes in the Territory, and he says they must belong to the governing class, they must have their share in the government of the country. There are fifty or sixty thousand people in Nebraska, and my honorable friend from Ohio says the people of Nebraska must have a share in the government of the country. Why? Is it because their numbers entitle them to that share? Not at all. Is it because it is necessary for their security and their welfare? Not at all. What is it for? The truth of the matter is, and that is about the whole of it, that it is to have here a member of Congress and two Senators. If you were to take away that tempting, glittering bait from the leading men of Nebraska, I very much question whether anybody there would want it to be a State; I rather incline to think from the vote they took some time ago that the majority would be against being a State.

And what are these Senators to do when they come here on the floor of the Senate? What interest will they represent? What great interest can sixty or seventy thousand people have to be represented here upon the floor of the Senate? What are these men to do? Really do nothing except to interfere perhaps in the policies of the older States. I represent the State of Pennsylvania. Pennsylvania is a tariff State. Pennsylvania thinks that a protective tariff is essential to her interests. Whether she is right or wrong I do not stop here to discuss; but that is her belief; that is the belief of both parties in the State of Pennsylvania. What if the sixty or seventy thousand people of Nebraska have no interest in the tariff question at all, care nothing about it, do not care whether you have tariff or no tariff, and if they have any interest in it are rather interested against it? They are to come upon the floor here and to weigh in the determination of that question as much as the three and a half millions of Pennsylvania do. Is that fair? Is it according to the terms of the original compact? Is that fair in any sense of the word? Is it fair even according to the Declaration of Independence, where it is said all men are equal? That is not my reading; that is my brother's reading. I believe the language is that they were created equal.

Mr. SUMNER. In rights.

Mr. COWAN. They were created equal; that is at the very outstart the cytolast, the primal cell of all individual, was about and about. I suppose it was. I doubt whether the best microscopes would detect any difference there. But it unfortunately happened that after they left that primal stand-point, after they had progressed from the corpuscular monads, they became very unequal. And it seems this is an exceeding stretch of equality upon the part of this Government to allow a few people in Nebraska Territory to have the same weight upon this floor that New York has and that Massachusetts has, and which may be wielded to the detriment of New York and Massachusetts, and wielded without any detriment to the people of Nebraska. When the Territory of Nebraska shall have been reached by people from all parts of the United States, when it shall have that kind of society which is known to publicists as a State, when they shall become a State in fact, when they shall have such an organization as constitutes a State, I shall be willing to receive them as such. It is well known, Mr. President, to you and to others of us that it is not every collection of people which constitutes a State. A State is a thing which is not made by legislative enactment; a State is a thing which is the growth of time and the growth of society. That that exists in Nebraska I should hardly think was pretended on the part of any of those who advocate her immediate admission.

Then, as it is evident and must be evident to Senators that the admission is simply for the purpose of putting two more Senators on the floor of this body, I would appeal to the dominant majority to know what is the necessity for that. Clearly you have enough already. You have enough for all possible legislative purposes. You have enough to override the veto of the President. You have enough to carry any measure, no matter how wild, how strange, how dangerous it may seem to be to some of us. You have enough to carry it without resorting to anything of this kind, and therefore I cannot see the necessity of it. I think that those who represent here the States, the actual States of the Union, are as much interested as I am to prevent anything of this kind until we are absolutely certain that it is necessary and proper, proper not only for the people of Nebraska, but proper for the people of the Union, too. If I understand this question correctly, it is exceedingly doubtful whether there is even any great majority of the people of Nebraska in favor of it. So far as I remember the election returns, there was but a majority of simply one hundred, and that majority was contested on the ground that some precinct had been thrown out which had given more than a hundred of a majority the other way. If this is the case, and only half the people of the Territory desire this change in their condition, it is still another reason why we should pause and not be overhasty in our action. I trust, therefore, that this question at least, in pursuance of the amendment, will be submitted to the people of the proposed State in order that we may have fairly their sense. Who knows but that this one hundred of a majority may be one hundred the other way next time, and what then? We are not to force sovereignty upon these people if they do not desire it and do not desire to pay the expenses of it.

Mr. GRIMES. Mr. President, that there may be no misunderstanding among the very few people who may feel an interest in the manner in which I shall vote on the various propositions now under consideration in the Senate, I desire to say a single word.

I shall vote with great pleasure for the amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri, now absent, and if that shall be adopted, although I have many doubts as to whether there be a sufficient number of people in the Territory of Nebraska to entitle her to a representation in Congress, yet I shall forego those doubts and vote for the passage of the bill. If that amendment be not adopted, I, like the Senator from Massachusetts, shall not vote for the bill even with the amendment of the Senator from Vermont. I apprehend, Mr. President, that that amendment of the Senator from Vermont will amount to nothing. It is a mere declaration on the part of Congress, and a declaration, I apprehend, which Congress has no more right to make than it has to make an entirely new constitution for the State of Nebraska. At any rate, its friends—the Senator from Vermont himself as well as the chairman of the Committee on Territories, who believes it is illegal and unconstitutional, and made an argument to the Senate to prove it to be so—admit that in any event it is a legal question that must be carried before the judicial tribunals to be settled, and therefore we abandon the power which confessedly we have to put this question entirely beyond a doubt, by adopting that amendment and letting it go finally to the Supreme Court of the United States, which has recently rendered some decisions that I apprehend a majority of this body do not approve.

Mr. President, it is said—I think it has been said here to-day, I have certainly heard it in the conversation—that propositions of this kind have been submitted to other States when they have been admitted into the Union; but in every such instance there has been an ordinance of the State admitted agreeing to the terms fixed by Congress, upon which they were admitted. I agree that whenever the State of Nebraska shall have agreed to this condition it will be binding upon the State of Nebraska. But what assurance have we that Nebraska will do that? Are we willing to sacrifice the principle that we have established, and for which we contended yesterday, by passing a bill over the President's veto; are we willing, upon a mere matter of expediency, to abandon that principle which our constituents hold so dear, when it is in doubt whether or not the people of Nebraska will ratify this condition? Is there any such great pressing public necessity, any such great exigency resting upon us to-day that Nebraska should be admitted into the Union, as will justify us in giving a vote here which will be in future like Banquo's ghost, that "will not down."

Mr. President, there is not any doubt as to our power to legislate in regard to the District of Columbia, and we have exercised that power. There is not any doubt as to our power to control the constitution of the State of Nebraska and to determine the manner and form in which the constitution shall be presented to us. There is some doubt in the minds of a great many men as to our power to control the subject in some of the States that have lately been in rebellion. It may be that before we adjourn we shall deem it to be important and necessary that we shall undertake to exercise that power in those States about which a doubt is entertained and expressed by a great many good and wise men; and are we going to foreclose ourselves to-day by saying that we will not undertake to control this question in a State where confessedly we have the power? I appeal to Senators here to decide whether they believe there is any such a necessity, any such demand on the part of the people of this Territory, for immediate admission as to require such action on our part? Do their interests imperatively demand it? Is there a sufficiency of population to require it? Do we need the votes of the men from Nebraska in the Senate and in the House sufficiently to justify us to sustain our principles and to strain the precedents that have been set heretofore in regard to this question? For my own part, having as a matter of principle voted the other day for the right of free suffrage in the District of Columbia, and having voted for it again over the presidential veto yesterday, I am not to-day to be hurried by a consideration of expediency to ignore and turn my back upon that vote and to say that I was wrong then.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I am not one of those who are in the least degree disposed to abandon a particle of principle in a question of this kind, or of any other kind, to save any emergency whatever. I will never, any more than the Senator from Iowa, "sell the truth to save the hour," however important or urgent may be the exigencies of that hour, because the truth and justice is, in the long run, the highest possible expediency. If I believed as the Senator from Iowa believes, that there were any doubt in respect to the efficacy of the amendment which I have proposed to control the rights of the citizens in the State of Nebraska irrespective of her constitution and irrespective of the will of her people, I should agree with him that we ought to adopt the amendment of the Senator from Missouri and not the amendment which I have had the honor to propose. But inasmuch as it appears to me to be as plain a legal proposition as any that can be asserted, that Congress, in passing an act of legislation, has a right to affix such qualifications to, and conditions upon, that act of legislation as shall seem fit to it, I have no hesitation in proposing the amendment which I shall offer as a substitute for that of the Senator from Missouri; and I do it in accordance with the idea which I entertained that, in proposing this method of legislation and putting it into the form of law, we stand upon the true constitutional grounds in exercising our duty as the guardians of the nation.

We have a right to create States; we have a right to govern Territories; we have a right to sweep them away. Now, if we think it fit to erect the people of this Territory into a State we can say on what conditions they shall be a State. That people may propose to us a constitution for their local government which may not in some of its respects agree with our notions of what is right and just; for example, they may not provide for a trial by jury in the usual form, but may organize a kind and species of jury which they may choose to prefer. In such a case we have a right to declare that anything in their laws or constitution to the contrary, if we erect them into a State at all, shall be disregarded, and that our will in these respects shall be the paramount law of the land, and the reason why we have this right is because it grows out of the necessary and essential paramount power of Congress to erect the State or not, as it pleases. It was asked the other day, suppose these people do not choose to act under it, suppose they do not choose to be a State of that description, hampered and qualified by these conditions which we impose upon them, what is their position? I say, then, let them go without being a State. It is only by the voluntary will of the people in any State that they keep up a State organization. We have no power under the Constitution or without the Constitution to enforce specific performance of political duties.

If a man does not choose to go to the polls to vote we have no power to send the sheriff to compel him to vote or to compel him to vote one way rather than another; but we have the power to declare that if he does exercise the functions of a State which we and by our will only authorize him to execute, what shall be the terms on which he shall exercise those functions. That is the distinction. We are therefore not making a constitution for the people of Nebraska; we are not altering a constitution for the people of Nebraska, but we are declaring that anything in their constitution or their laws to the contrary notwithstanding, the practical exercise of certain fundamental political rights shall never be interfered with. That is what we do.

I do not claim the credit, Mr. President, of having discovered any new invention in respect to this proposition, for I undertake to declare that a majority of the instances in which Territories have been erected into States will show on investigation that in some respect, not always a fundamental respect, not always an important respect, but in some respect or other the paramount authority of Congress in declaring what shall and what shall not be in that State has been asserted in the very act of admission, and after the act of admission no ordinance of the State has been required or adopted agreeing to these propositions. Where the act of admission and the enabling act went together, an ordinance has sometimes been required and has frequently been adopted; but when the act of admission itself has come to be passed, as in this case it is about to be I hope, and in others it has been, there has almost always been incorporated some provision touching public rights, touching public lands, touching the navigation of rivers.
